I have only time to write a few lines by the express which goes out to Point Isabel this evening. - Whether he succeeds in getting there or not is doubtful as the Mexican army, about 4 or 5,000, are encamped about seven or eight miles from here. I suppose you have seen by the papers that the war has commenced and we are expecting re-enforcements of troops from New Orleans, &c. On the 1st May Gen. Taylor left here for Point Isabel with the greater part of his army, and my regiment (the 7th infantry) with two companies of artillery, &c.; about 600 men were left to garrison the fort, then nearly finished. Yesterday morning the Mexicans opened their batteries from the town, which was returned from our 18 pounders and a brisk fire was kept up for an hour or more, during which time one of their batteries was silenced by our guns and a number of shots fired on the town. My station being in one of the batteries opposite the fort I could sometimes hear the shot crashing through the houses. Our guns stopped firing about 10 or 11 o'clock, as we were only wasting our ammunition and did but little injury except to the town. They kept on firing through the day and part of the night to-day; they however do us but little injury as they have killed but one man of our garrison. They have a mortar, and annoy us considerably with their shells - no one can tell where the confounded things are going to fall - several have fallen in the fort and exploded, but did no serious injury. We are hourly expecting an attack from their forces, and are prepared to make a vigorous defence. I will write you again by the first opportunity. * * * * *

Yours, &c.

P.S. - The Mexicans will probably attack Gen. Taylor on his return from Point Isabel with supplies, and if they do, I have no doubt the general will give the Yellow Skins a sound drubbing. [GLP]

NNR 70.180 May 23, 1846 SURPRISE AND SURRENDER OF CAPTAIN THORNTON'S COMMAND.

In our last number amongst the list of killed and wounded in the affair of Captain Thornton's detachment with the Mexicans, two distinguished names were included as killed, that we are delighted to find still amongst the living. Captains THORNTON and HARDEE and Lieut. KANE, all of the 2d dragoons, have reported themselves to Gen. Taylor, by letter, as prisoners to the Mexicans, by whom they are kindly treated. They are in good health. We subjoin an account of the affray in which they were overpowered.
On the evening of the 23d ult., General Taylor’s spies brought in intelligence to the effect that about two thousand five hundred Mexicans had crossed the Rio Grande to the Texas side above the American Fort and that about fifteen hundred of the same had crossed below. Gen. T. immediately despatched a squadron of dragoons to each place of crossing for the purpose of reconnoitering them and ascertaining their position. The squadron ordered below was in command of Captain Ker; the one above was commanded by Captain Thornton and composed of Captain Hardee, Lieut’s. Kane and Mason, with sixty-one privates and non-commissioned officers.

The former commander, Capt. Ker, on arriving at the point where it was supposed they had crossed found that the report was false, that they had not crossed there but had all crossed above, which was afterwards proved by Capt. T.’s command being surprised, in which Lieut. Geo. Mason with nine men were killed and two wounded. The wounded were sent to Gen. Taylor's camp; the army having no hospital in the field. Capt.’s Thornton, Hardee, and Lieut. Kane miraculously escaped together with the balance of the non-commissioned officers and men, but were captured and are now prisoners of war in Mexico.

The circumstances which led to the surprise are these: After Capt. T.’s command had proceeded up the Rio Grande about twenty-four miles, and as was supposed, to within about three miles of the Mexican camp, the guide refused to go any further, and stated for his reason that the whole country was infested with Mexicans. Capt. T. however, proceeded on with his command about two miles when he came to a farm house, which was enclosed entirely by a chapparal fence, with the exception of that portion of it which bordered on the river, and this was so boggy as to be impassable.

Capt. T. entered this enclosure through a pair of bars and approached the house for the purpose of making some inquiry, his command following him. So soon as his command had all entered the enclosure, the enemy having been concealed in the chapparal, about two thousand five hundred in number, completely surrounded him and commenced firing upon his command. He then wheeled his command thinking that he could charge through the enemy and pass out where he had entered, not however without a considerable loss. This he attempted but did not succeed, the enemy being too strong.

At this instant, Capt. Hardee approached him for the purpose of advising him how to extricate themselves. The firing of the enemy still continuing, Capt. Thornton’s horse having doubtless received a shot, ran away with him and leaped the chapparal fence and plunged into a precipice, where he fell, with Capt. T. under him, where the latter remained insensible for five or six hours. This casualty placed Capt. Hardee in command, who attempted with the residue to make his escape by the river, intending on arriving at its margin to swim it. In this he failed, finding it so boggy that he could not get to it. He then returned, taking the precaution to get out of distance of musketry, dismounted and examined the arms of his men, determining to sell their lives as dearly as possible.

Before he had succeeded, however in the inspection of his arms, a Mexican officer rode up and asked him to surrender. Capt. H. replied that he would surrender on one condition, which was, that if the Mexican general would receive them as prisoners of war, and treat them as the most civilized nations do, he would surrender, but on no other conditions. - The Mexican officer bore this message to the general commanding, and returned with the assurance that he would. Captain H. then surrendered. Captains Thornton and Hardee, with Lieut. Kane and the residue of the non-commissioned officers and privates of Capt. T.’s command are now prisoners of war in Mexico. The enemy treat them remarkably well.

Lieut. Geo. Mason was a fine young officer, and his death is much regretted. His sabre belt was recognized among some articles that were subsequently captured from the enemy. [GLP]

Capt. Walker’s detachment and its engagement with the Mexicans

CAPT. WALKER’S DETACHMENT.- The N. Orleans Picayune, of the 9th May, furnishes the following account brought by the Ellen and Clara, Capt. Griffin, which sailed from Point Isabel on the 29th ult.-“We learn from Capt. Griffin, and Dr. N. Briggs, a passenger, who has been several months with the army, that Capt. Walker, formerly of the Texan revenue service, who has been stationed between Point Isabel and Gen. Taylor’s camp, with a body of twenty four volunteer Texan Rangers, found several of the teams which had started from the point for the camp were returning, and reported that the Mexicans were on the road. He started from his camp on the 28th with his whole force to reconnoiter, and, if possible, open a communication with Gen. Taylor. He had proceeded as far as about midway between Point Isabel and the camp, when an overwhelming Mexican force appeared very suddenly. A portion of his troops were raw; the he instructed to keep on his right, and gave orders to the whole to retire under cover of a chaparelle in view."

But his raw troops, panic stricken, scattered in confusion, and the Mexicans advancing in overwhelming numbers, he was compelled to retreat.-He was followed by the Mexicans within a mile of Point Isabel, where he arrived with only two of his men. Six others subsequently came in.

Captain Walker estimated the number of Mexicans he encountered at 1500, and he supposes that at least 30 of them fell, during the fifteen minutes he engaged them. This force is supposed to be a portion of that which had the last accounts crossed the Rio Grande some 20 or 25 miles above Matamoros, and which is estimated at 3000 men. It is believed that they had arrived at the position they occupied by taking a circuitous rout on the eastern side of Gen. Taylor’s camp.

No communications had been had with General Taylor at Point Isabel, for three days previous to the departure of the Ellen and Clara. At the last accounts it was reported that he had but ten days’ provisions. Captain Walker, immediately after his arrival, gallantly tendered his services to Major Monroe, the commander at Point Isabel, if four men would accompany him, to make his way to General Taylor with despatches, or die in the attempt. His offer was accepted, and accordingly he started at daylight on the morning of the 29th. During the nights of the 27th and 28th the troops at Point Isabel were in constant expectation of being attacked, and dispositions were made accordingly.-The masters and crews of vessels in the harbor were called on, on the 28th, and spent the night under arms. On that night, 500 men were furnished with arms, of which about 50 were seamen.

The works were as perfect as it was possible to make them under the circumstances, and it was generally believed that should but fifteen hundred Mexicans attack the place, they could be at least, held at bay until reinforcements arrived. Messrs. Monroe and Saunders, it is started, deserve great praise for the manner in which they have fortified Point Isabel.

Capt. Griffin and Dr. Briggs informs us that the officers of the army speak of the Mexicans as being in a very high state of discipline- the cavalry particularly. Besides the three thousand who have crossed the Rio Grande, it is intimated that there are about five thousand at Matamoros, and it is supposed that the Mexicans general has not yet displayed his full strength, but has kept a large reserve back of Matamoros.

It is believed that the Mexicans have possession of an island at the mouth of the Brazos, which commands the entrance. If so, it is apprehended that the troops by the New York will not be able to get in. The island is laid down on some of the maps as “Brassos Village” It is a natural fortification.

A small schooner, the Aurora, sailed from Point Isabel on the 28th for this port, with dispatches=The weather has been very severe on the coast, and it is to be feared that she has been driven ashore.

The extras from the offices of the Times, Tropie, and Picayune all concur in stating the number of men with Capt. Walker, when he encountered the Mexican force, at 75. The Picayune says:"The Mexicans pursued Capt. Walker in his retreat till they came within range of the guns of the post, when they in turn immediately retreated. There are now about 3000 Mexican on the American side of the Rio Grande-one half above and one half below Gen. Taylor’s camp. [JEB]"
Headquarters, Army of Occupation,
Camp near Matamoros, April 25, 1846.

The commanding general has the painful duty of announcing to the army that the doubt which has so long prevailed in regard to the fate of the late Col. CROSS, has at length, been resolved into the melancholy certainty of his death, and, there is too much reason to fear, by violent hands.

The high rank of the deceased, and the ability and energy which he carried into the discharge of the important duties of his office, will cause his loss to be seriously felt in the service, while the untoward circumstances of his demise will render it particularly afflicting to his family and personal friends.

The remains of the late colonel will be interred, with military honors, at 4 o'clock P.
M. to-morrow. The funeral escort will be composed of a squadron of dragoons and eight companies of infantry; the latter to be taken from the 2d brigade, and the whole to be organized and commanded by Colonel Twiggs.

The necessary arrangements for the funeral ceremony will be made by Lieut. Col.
Payne, inspector general.

All officers off duty are respectfully invited to attend the funeral. By order of BRIG. GEN. TAYLOR.

NNR 70.180 May 23, 1846 GILBERT DUDLEY’S CAPTURE OF TWO MEXICANS

GILBERT DUDLEY, a youth of 19, attached to the army under Gen. Taylor according to a letter from an officer, published in the Newark Adviser, must be a brave fellow.
The letter says:

"Returning two days ago from one of our most advanced pickets, whither he had sent to convey orders, he came unexpectedly upon two Mexican soldiers, who had, apparently, just rowed across the river, and were refreshing themselves in a cool shade, having placed their muskets in thoughtless security against a neighboring tree. Gilbert was equal to the emergency; he sprang to the muskets, threw one upon the ground, and stepped upon it, while with the other he menaced the lives of his opponents. And thus marched them into camp. [ GLP]

NNR 70.181 May 23, 1846 official orders as to organizing the volunteers in US service

ORGANIZATION OF VOLUNTEER CORPS FOR THE UNITED STATES SERVICE- War Department, May 19, 1846

Sir:—In reply to the inquiries contained in the letter of Major General Steuart, and in other communications, submitted by you to this Department, I have the honor to inform you that the rule adopted, is to call for the volunteers that are required from any particular State, through the Governor. This is an act of respect to the Executive of the State, due as well to his position, as to his generally superior knowledge of the character and efficiency of the volunteers throughout the State, the sections from which it is most advisable to take them, and which of them can, with the greatest facility and least expense be embodied for the service for which they may be required. Circumstances, may, however, occur to render it expedient to accept offers of service direct without the intervention of the Governor, when an application to him might cause delay. Applications of companies, regiments, &c. To enter the service may therefore be made direct to this Department.

The law, a copy of which is enclosed, provides that the officers of the volunteers shall be appointed by the proper State authority, in the manner prescribed by the State laws; and the accompanying memorandum shows the number of officers, non-commissioned officers and privates, and the organization of companies and

The law also requires that the volunteers furnish their own clothing, and if cavalry, their own horses and horse equipage. Such as are already uniformed need not change such as are not, and contemplate uniforming, are at liberty to adopt such as they think proper but it is advisable that all who may be called into the service adopt their dress as nearly as circumstances will permit, to the nature of the service that may be required of them, and to the character of the country and climate where they may have to serve. Those that shall be accepted will be armed and equipped at the expense of the United States, and will be inspected and mustered into the service by an officer of the army, or by one appointed by the Governor, at such times and places, as will be specified when their services are called for. Very respectfully, your ob't serv't

Hon. Wm. F. Giles W.L. Marcy
House of Rep. Secretary of War

Head Quarters, Western Division,
New Orleans, May 2, 1846.

Sir:-By a letter which I have this morning received from Brig. Gen. Gen. The General, in concluding his requisition, says: "I cannot doubt that the gallant State of Louisiana will respond with alacrity to this call upon the patriotism of her sons."

The State of Louisiana has never hesitated at any call on her patriotism or spirit, and is now as she ever has been, ready to devote her energies and her blood for our common country, and the honor of its arms.

Assured that the call now made will be responded to by the citizen soldiers of the State without resorting to a draft, four regiments of Volunteers will be received and mustered into the service of the United States for the term of six months, unless sooner discharged, and as fast as any regiment or company is organized for the purpose, its commanding officers will report to the Adjutant General at the State House in Canal Street.

It is desireable that the Companies should each be 100 strong.

NNR 70.192 May 30, 1846 remarks and statements on US finances in light of the war with Mexico, possibility of a loan, of issuance of treasury notes, of postponement of revision of the tariff

National Finances. War has commenced. – Ten millions of dollars have been promptly voted towards commencing operations. One and a half millions have been voted to pay expenses already incurred, and which the annual appropriations of last year fell short of defraying. Two millions in addition to the treasurer's estimates, to feed and clothe the 7 or 8000 men, voted last week as additional to the regular army. Their bounty and pay have been provided for in the annual appropriation bill passed last week. Munitions and transportation will accumulate military expenditures rapidly. The naval expenses will also be largely increased. Additional ships are to be put in commission. Crews are to be enlisted, stores to be provided. Transports are to be in service.

The National Intelligencer, noticing an article in a New York paper which intimates that "it may be necessary for congress to authorize a loan to meet these extras," says—"Doubtless congress will find itself under the necessity, before adjourning, of providing money, in addition to the current revenue, to defray the expenditure which will attend the now inevitable operations of the government. The reduction of the tariff of duties on imports, had it been carried into effect, would equally have induced the necessity, now or not long hereafter, of supplying revenue from some other source. But. The late act of congress—and, indeed, independently of the movement of congress, the preceding action of the executive—requiring an expenditure probably far to exceed the surplus in the treasury, may be considered as an indefinite postponement of the treasury scheme for a general reduction of the tariff. We take it for granted, however, that for any immediate purpose, the administration will first resort to the expedient of an issue of treasury notes; the necessity for resorting to which will in connexion with the existence of a foreign war requiring the transportation to great distances of large sums of money, render the sub-treasury scheme wholly impracticable, and probably cause that as well as the anti-tariff project to be deferred. Should the war unhappily be prolonged, however, loans must be necessarily recurrent to, and will constitute the chief source of revenue for defraying the expenses of the war. Whenever loans are to be authorized, in any considerable amount, congress will find itself obliged to lay direct taxes and excises, and pledge the proceeds of them to pay the interest and provide a sinking fund for their redemption. We do not suppose therefore, that any loan, in the shape of an issue of government stock, will be resorted to at the present session of congress.” [JEB]

NNR 70.192 May 30, 1846 accounts from New Orleans of extravagant expenditures for military supplies

The New York Journal of Commerce says—“The accounts from N. Orleans and Mobile are very bad. The produce of the west and south is coming down in one great arid endless avalanche, but the circulation of business is stopped. This rates of freight have advanced materially; merchants are unwilling to take the hazards of making shipments; the northern merchants, unwilling to advance on property which must encounter the risks of the gulf, have withdrawn their credits; and so the produce is piling up beyond the capacities of all the warehouses—How can merchants meet their engagements, when all their property is suddenly rendered unavailable? Great inconvenience and damage must be the consequence.”

Another New Orleans letter, published in the Philadelphia U.S. Gazette, says—“The government have not a dollar of funds here—are buying everything on credit, and paying enormously through the nose—the certificates of the quarter master, for amounts due for supplies, payable on demand so soon as funds arrive, are hawking out at every shaving shop at eight to ten per cent. Discount on the face.—I saw one today for $1,700 which was offered for $1,550, and no doubt $1,500 would have been accepted. Last week a heavy purchase of pork was made (1,000 barrels) at 13½ when the same quality could have been bought for cash at $10¾—other things in proportion—and this state of things with $12,000,000 of surplus funds in the treasury. Steamboats and transports are chartered in the same way—6 and $8,000 paid to a steamboat to the “Brassos St. Iago,” a run of 60 or 80 hours, and $500 per day demurrage.”

Another letter from New Orleans, dated the 10th inst. Says—“It will hardly be credited that with the large force in Texas, requiring constant and heavy supplies, and with the emergency now existing, the quarter master’s department is entirely destitute of funds, and it has to buy supplies, charter steamboats, and make all its arrangements on credit, of course paying an exorbitant addition in the price of every thing; and the quarter master’s certificates for money due, are hawking about in the streets and at every shaving shop in the city, at a heavy discounts, disgraceful to the credit of the government, who boast of having some 10 or 15 millions of surplus funds in the treasury!! These certificates, though payable on demand so soon as funds are received, are selling at 8 and 10 percent discount, and if they accumulate much longer will be at a still heavier rate. [JEB]

NNR 70.193 May 30, 1846 map of the seat of war

Seat of war map

Matamoros and entrenchments

Into the shoal at the south west extremity of Laguna Madre, another channel of the Rio Grande enters, which is not delineated on the chart. It starts from the main channel at a point (Pondo), between Barita and Matamoros, and when the river is very high this channel has some eighteen inches of water. In common it is converted into expanded marsh. When the river is very low, it is entirely dry.

The Laguna Madre, or Logo del Santander—is about 90 miles in length, and has generally about two feet depth of water. It is bounded on the east by the Island Padre Vayin, or Padre Bayin, or as generally called, Padre Island. Besides the Olmos and Rio or Sal Colorado, other streams flow into it, the San Fernando, the St. Gertrude, &c. &c.

Brassos Santiago, is about 5 miles from Point Isabel, and in lat 25 degrees 16 mites long. 97 degrees 12 minutes west from Greenwich, or 20 degrees 12 minutes west of Washington city, as represented in the chart. There are from three to six feet water within, and 7 ½ to 8 feet without its bar. There is from three to six feet water from thence to.

Point Isabel, from which two routes are sketched upon the chart, to Matamoros. By the southern road distance is 27 miles, by the other 35 miles. The former pursued by general Taylor’s army, is intersected by one or two small streamlets flowing into the Rio Grande.

Bocca Chica, (the narrow mouth), at the south end of Brassos Island, has approaching it, successively 3,2 and 8 feet water. From this point three roads diverge, viz. One southwardly to Las Taraesas,—one southwestwardly 6 miles to Barita and whence it passes 30 miles more, to Matamoros, and one due west, a wagon route, which after crossing the 2d pass to the Rio Grande is a direct line to Matamoros, follows the northern shore of that river to the point where now stands the American entrenchments.

The Rio Grande, at its first pass, or main outlet, has five feet water. We have stated above, that even at high water the second pass has but 18 inches. The territory or Delta between the two passes, is separated from the Island of Brassos, by the Bocca Chica.

Matamoros is situated in the latitude 25 degrees 53 minutes and long. 21 degrees west of Washington.

Letters from officers of the army represent their march from Corpus Christi to Matamoros to have been one of 120, and in some cases as high as 150 miles. Whether gen. Taylor pursued what is called the old direct road,—which is sketched upon the map,—or whether, as we apprehend, he took another route which led him to Isabel and thence to Matamoros thus by sinuosities increasing the distance, we are not confident. The Nueces is stated to be generally about 90 miles from the Rio Grande. West of Reynoso is Monterey. [JEB]

NNR 70.194 May 30, 1846 course of the Rio Grande (Rio del Norte or Rio Bravo)

The Rio Grande, Rio Del Norte or Rio Bravo, different names by which the same river is known, rises in the Southern Slope of the Rocky Mountains, near the head waters of the Arkansas river, pursues a course nearly due South for a distance of 2000 miles, to the Gulf Of Mexico. Its course is in good part through a thinly peopled desert, in some places mountainous, in others composed of wide sterile plains. Valuable mines of gold and silver exist in the province of Santa Fe, some 1,5000 miles from its mouth. The River is generally rapid and rocky, rendering the navigation dangerous if not impossible.

Twenty years ago attempts were made, and several times since, with steam boats to navigate it, but Matamoros, some 60 miles from its mouth, by the winding of the river, or 30 or 40 miles in direct line from the coast, is usual head of navigation and even that distance, boats of very light draft only can be used. NNR 70.194 May 30, 1846 account of the city of Mexico

The City of Mexico, has a population of 180,000.- Temptations similar to those with which Cortes inspired his Spanish followers three hundred years ago to follow him to the "Halls of Montezuma" are now loudly trumpeted for the purpose of inciting volunteers to undertake another subjugation of the devoted people that populate that lovely region.

Says a New York paper "High mountains rise in the distance on all sides of the city, but the location although under the Tropic of Cancer, is remarkable for its salubrity, and in summer the extreme heat is less severe than in New York of Philadelphia. The city is approached by excellent roads which branch out in every direction, and on which are transported the ores and bullion from some hundred of the richest mines in the world. The magnificence of the principal edifices-some being furnished with gold and silver ornaments valued at many millions, and containing rich treasures hid away by the avaricious-has excited the admiration of all travelers. Yet with all her riches, Mexico is poor. Her people are kept in ignorance by the tyranny of a few, and their wealth is carried off to other lands, to swell the gains of trade and commerce, which they are not permitted to enjoy. The poor Mexican crawls listlessly over neglected silver mines, lost in the contemplation of his own abject condition. The iron hand of despotism is upon him” [JEB]

NNR 70.194 May 30, 1846 Health on the Rio Grande - The best defence of Mexico.

The Washington correspondence of the Journal of Commerce says, that when Almonte was here as Minister from Mexico it was remarked to him that in case of a war between the United States and Mexico, the Mexicans would have nothing to oppose to the overwhelming power and force of the United States. General Almonte replied - "It is a mistake, we have the "vomito" alias, Yellow Fever.

This potent arm will, no doubt, be relied on by Mexico, in the movements now going on. If our troops shall be kept on the Rio Grande through the summer, they may fall into the snare which Almonte designated for them."

The Washington Union, on the contrary, says: - "We are informed by an intelligent physician, who was a native of this city, but who resided for several years to the west of the Rio Grande, who married a Mexican lady, who was an United States consul, practised physic several years in the vicinity of Matamoros, and is intimately acquainted with the climate, as well as the habits of the Mexicans, that although at a certain season of the year it is unhealthy at Matamoros and on the immediate borders of the river, yet that several miles from it, the ague and fever is unknown.
The climate for several miles beyond, away off to the west, is remarkably healthy, and that no such humbug ought to prevent the troops of the United States from visiting this interesting region of the earth." [GLP]

NNR 70.195 May 30, 1846 "true policy of the republic"

TRUE POLICY OF THE REPUBLIC

The "Courier des Etats Unis," the French Journal published at New York, thus discourses, in relation to our war with Mexico and as the true policy and destiny of our republic:-

"The American people is the foremost among all people by the progress it has made in clearing the wilderness-in the arts of industry, and in navigation. No other has performed so great miracles in so short a time. It is emphatically the people which improvises civilization. With its steamboats and its axe it has already conquered one half of a world and is destined soon to conquer the other half. Industry is its genius, the fruits of the earth its arms, the liberty which it bears along with it, its power.-
This liberty is the key which will open the universe to it.

But one is not perfect in all things, and it is not given to be, at the same time; a commercial and free people, and a warlike and domineering people. In nations as in individuals, particular faculties can only acquire extreme development at the expense of other faculties. Hence the Americans could not push so far their creations of industry and their political liberty, except upon the condition of having no military budget, no regular army. They could only become the strongest of people in time of peace, by exposing themselves to be the weakest in time of war. Of this, the high intelligence which distinguishes them, should have convinced them, if self love did not with them speak louder even than intellect. Accustomed to see everything yield to their spirit of enterprise-rivers, ports, mountains, they have fancied that whatever they chose, they could extemporize an army as they extemporize a city or a railroad.
But this is an error which they will discover and deplore hereafter. Citizens are not soldiers-conscripts are not heroes. In every vocation an apprenticeship is needed-and that vocation, of all others, most needs this apprenticeship, which puts at hazard ones life.

"The political and social organization of the United States has, moreover, this inconvenience-the shade to its brightness-that the military career being the most neglected of all, the least honored because it is the least productive, the least in harmony with the instinctively pacific sentiments of the masses, it is a sort of last refuge for the worst portion of the population. Strangers to the soil, emigrants without home or hearth, constitute the greater portion of the enlisted men; these men are mercenaries who fight from necessity, or from the love of adventure, but who have none of that love of country adhering to their entrails sicul ossa cuti- Such men in fleeing from the enemy, have no consciousness of carrying off on the soles of their feet the honor of their country. It is not with such defenders that either great things, or even good things are done."

Since then such is the system of the country, its rulers should at least comprehend at once both its feebleness, and its force and act in conformity. Having raised on the soil temples to all the gods except the god of war, there should be the rarest possible recourse to his intercession—the combats should be not with the sword, but with the plough, which is your weapon—conquer the world not by armies, but by emigration, industry and the hardy pioneers of the wilderness. In all the expansive force of your arms and your ideas lies all your power and if that power, is less rapid than that of the cannon, it is more sure and irresistible. Texas furnishes a proof in point. While you were content to let the west pour itself out into Texas, nothing could check their progress, and they conquered it for you. And now when government action is substituted in the same country for individuals, and against the same enemy, you are conquered! It is because in the United States the government is nothing, the individual everything.

Since his accession to power, Mr. Polk has misapprehended this great organic principle of American society. He was for hurrying its march, and cutting the two knots of Texas and Oregon, which time of itself would have untied. What is the result of this unnatural policy? That the United States are at this moment placed in a position which may become excessively critical for them, for it may expose them at the same time for the two most dangerous wars they could be called upon to meet.
In seeing what the mere commencement of a struggle with such an enemy as Mexico has already occasioned of embarrassment and expense—in perceiving the difficulties of meeting the demands of a single contest—one is tempted to ask with dread, what would happen if we had to repel at the same time a Mexican invasion in the south, a Canadian invasion at the north, and the attacks of the British fleets on the seaboard? Fortune which has so long shown herself propitious to the United States—fortune which loves youth—among people as among kings—when Louis XIV, when a sexagenarian, mournfully remarked, will spare the Americans this trial—but no thanks therefore to the policy of Mr. Polk; his policy is grossly blundering. That which Mr. Calhoun, from the beginning of the Oregon question has proclaimed under the title of "masterly inactivity," is the only true policy—the only logical one—the only one in harmony with American institutions, and their actual military organization. The missions of Americans is that of the pacific conquerors—the institutions are to spread, as spread the waves by simple law of the level—their dominion is destined to grow by affinity, by alluvion—the whole of North America is their certain patrimony; land none but a madman buys with blood what is in fact a portion of his own inheritance. [JEB]

NNR 70.195 May 30, 1846 CAPTURE OF GEN. VEGA BY CAPT. MAY.

The battle commenced by heavy cannonading on both sides. Gen. Taylor, in passing his lines, accosted Capt. May of the 2d dragoons, and told him—"Your regiment has never done anything yet—you must take that battery." He said nothing, but turned to his command and said—"We must take that battery—follow!" He made a charge with three companies—at least the remainder of three companies—supported by the 5th and 8th regiments of Infantry. They cleared the breastwork, wheeled and came through the enemy's lines, whilst the fire of the Infantry was so deadly in its effect as to carry all before it. Capt. May made a cut at an officer as he charged through.
On his return he found him standing between cannon wheels—fighting like a hero.
He ordered him to surrender. He was asked if he was an officer?—Capt. May answered him in the affirmative, when he presented his sword, remarking, "You receive Gen. Vega a prisoner of war." [GLP]

NNR 70.196 May 30, 1846 executive power granted to the president for conducting the war, funds authorized, troops to be raised, officers to be appointed

The President of the United States.

Large powers have already been conferred upon the president, toward meeting the way with Mexico.

Funds. Ten millions of dollars have been appropriated, and placed at the disposal of the president, for conducting the war.

The army of the United States, of which the president according to the constitution is commander in chief—according to the bill just passed by congress will be augmented to about 15,000 men. The volunteers placed at his disposal 50,000. The navy, as now established, 7,800. The increase being ordered, steamers included will augment it at least 10,000. = 82,000

The appointing power, called into requisition for officering these new levies, is amongst the highest of executive prerogatives. Seldom if ever has so vast a scope of power been in the hands of a president of these United States. [JEB]

Mazatlan

Naval Journal

Pacific squadron. The New York Commercial Advertiser has advices from the squadron under commodore Sloat to the 8th April—all well. A letter from an officer dated Mazatlan, says—"We have still lying here most of the squadron, viz. Savannah 54, Constitution 54, Warren 24, Levant 22, Portsmouth 22, Erie 4, and the Congress 54, capt. Stockton, and the Cyane, daily expected. The Shark, 12, has gone to the Sandwich Islands to repair, after which she will return to the coast again." [JEB]

NNR 70.196 May 30, 1846 government said to intend purchasing small vessels to run close in shore in the Gulf

The Norfolk Beacon of the 25th says—

Commander Garret J. Pendergrast has been ordered to the Memphis navy yard, and Commander Wm. H. Gardner to the rendezvous here; Commander McKean to the sloop of war Dale; and Lieut. Chatard to the Water Witch to be fitted out here. It is said that the government intend purchasing a number of small vessels to run close in shore in the Gulf after privateersmen. [JEB]

NNR 70.196-197 May 30, 1846 Gen. Zachary Taylor’s official letters from Point Isabel, his brief notes on the Battle of Palo Alto and the Battle of Resaca de la Palma

WAR WITH MEXICO

[Official] From the Union of May 26

Point Isabel, Texas, May 7, 1846

Sir: I respectfully report that I shall march this day with the main body of the army, to open a communication with Major Brown, and throw forward supplies of ordnance and provisions. If the enemy opposes my march, in whatever force, I shall fight him. Occasional guns are heard in the direction of Matamoros, showing that everything is right in that quarter.

Yesterday the recruits under Lieut. McPhail arrived here. After filling up the companies of the permanent garrison, (A 1st arty. and G 4th art.,) the remainder of the detachment with its officers, was placed under Major Munroe’s orders to assist in the defence of the depot. The men are yet to raw to take the field, though efficient for garrison defence. They will be permanently assigned as soon as practicable.

The four companies of the first infantry are hourly expected, and will be a seasonable reinforcement. The first shipment of volunteers from New Orleans may also soon be looked for. Their arrival will enable me to open the river and free our communications.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obed’t serv’t

Z. TAYLOR
Brevet brig’r gen. U.S.A. com’g

The adjutant general of the army, Washington, D.C.

Headquarters Army of Occupation
Camp at Palo Alto, Texas, May 9, 1846

Sir: I have the honor to report that I was met near this place yesterday, on my march from Point Isabel, by the Mexican forces, and after an action of about five hours dislodged them from their position, and encamped upon the field. Our artillery, consisting of two 18 pounders and two light batteries, was the arm chiefly engaged, and to the excellent manner in which it was maneuvered and served is our success
The strength of the enemy is believed to have been about six thousand men, with seven pieces of artillery, and eight hundred cavalry. His loss is probably at least one thousand killed. Our strength did not exceed all told twenty three hundred, while our loss was comparatively trifling—four men killed, three officers and thirty seven men wounded, several of the latter mortally. I regret to say that Major Ringgold, 3d artillery, and Capt. Page, 4th infantry, are severely wounded. Lieut. Luther, 2d artillery, slightly so.

The enemy has fallen back, and it is believed has repassed the river. I have advanced parties now thrown forward in his direction, and shall move the main body immediately.

In haste of this first report, I can only say that the officers and men behaved in the most admirable manner throughout the action. I shall have the pleasure of making a more detailed report when those of the different commanders shall be received. I am sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

Z. Taylor
Brevet brigadier general U.S.A. commanding

The adjutant general, U.S. army, Washington, D.C.

Headquarters Army of Occupation.
Camp at Resaca de la Palma, 3 miles from Matamoros, 10 o'clock, p.m., May 9, 1846

Sir: I have the honor to report that I marched with the main body of the army at 2 o'clock today, having previously thrown forward a body of light infantry, into the forest, which covers the Matamoros road. When near the spot where I am encamped, my advance discovered that a ravine crossing the road had been occupied by the enemy with artillery. I immediately ordered a batter of field artillery to sweep the position, flanking and sustaining it by the 3d, 4th, and 5th regiments, deployed as skirmishers to the right and the left. A heavy fire of artillery and musketry was kept up for some time, until finally the enemy's batteries were carried in succession by a squadron of dragoons and the regiments of infantry that were on the ground. He was soon driven from his position, and pursued by a squadron of dragoons, battalion of artillery, 3d infantry, and a light battery, to a river. Our victory had been complete. Eight pieces of artillery, with a great quantity of ammunition, three standards, and some one hundred prisoners have been taken; among the latter, General La Vega, and several other officers. One general is understood to have been killed. The enemy has recrossed the river, and I am sure will not again molest us on this bank.

The loss of the enemy in killed has been most severe. Our own has been very heavy, and I deeply regret to report that Lieut. Inge, 2d dragoons, Lieut. Cochran, 4th infantry, and Lieut. Chadbourne, 8th infantry, were killed on the field. Lieut. Col. Payne, 4th artillery, Lieut. Col. McIntosh, Lieut. Dobbins, 3d infantry, Capt. Hooe, and Lieut. Fowler, 5th infantry, and Capt. Montgomery, Lieuts. Gates, Seldon, McClay, Burbank, and Jordan, 8th infantry, were wounded. The extent of our loss in killed and wounded is not yet ascertained, and is reserved for a more detailed report.

The affair today may be regarded as a proper supplement to the cannonade of yesterday; and the two taken together, exhibit the coolness and gallantry of our officers and men in the most favorable light. All have done their duty, and done it nobly. It will be my pride, in a more circumstantial report of both actions, to dwell upon particular instances of individual distinction.

It affords me peculiar pleasure to report that the field work opposite Matamoros has sustained itself handsomely during a cannonade and a bombardment of 160 hours. But the pleasure is alloyed with profound regret at the loss of its heroic and indomitable commander, Major Brown, who died to-day from the effect of a shell. His loss would be a severe one to the service at anytime, but to the army under my orders, it is indeed irreparable. One officer and non-commissioned officer killed and ten men wounded, comprise all the casualties incident to this severe bombardment.

I inadvertently omitted to mention the capture of a large number of pack mules left in the Mexican camp.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obd’t. serv’t.,

NNR 70.197 May 30, 1846 Gen. Romulo Diaz de la Vega and other captured officers forwarded to New Orleans

[Special Orders No. 62]

1. General la Vega and the other Mexican officers, prisoners of war, will be conducted to New Orleans under charge of Lieut. J.J. Reynolds, 4th artillery, who will report on his arrival to Major General Gaines, for further instructions. The quartermaster's department will furnish a steamer for the transportation of the party.

2. As many of the sick and wounded now at this place as may be indicated by Surgeon Wood, will be moved in suitable transports to St. Joseph’s Island. Assistant Surgeon Byrne will accompany the detachment, and will return with the convalescents that may not be in condition to leave the general hospital. The quartermaster's department will furnish the proper transportation.

NNR 70.197 May 30, 1846 Gen. Zachary Taylor's letter from camp opposite Matamoros, enclosing Gen. Pedro Ampudia's letter of 12th April summoning Taylor to quit his position

Headquarter, Army of occupation
Camp near Matamoros, Texas, April 15, 1846

Sir: I have to report that on the 11th inst.-General Ampudia arrived at Matamoros with two hundred cavalry, the remainder of his force, variously estimated from 2,000 to 3,000 men, being some distance in the rear on the route from Monterey. Immediately after assuming the chief command, Gen. Ampudia ordered all Americans to leave Matamoros within twenty four hours, and repair to Victoria, a town in the interior of Tamaulipas. He had taken the same severe measure at Reinosa, on his way hither. On the 12th I received from Gen. Ampudia a dispatch, summoning me to withdraw my forces within twenty four hours, and to fall back beyond the river Neuces. To this communication I replied on the 12th, saying that I should not retrograde from my position. Copies of this correspondence are enclosed herewith. I considered the letter of Gen. Ampudia sufficient to warrant me in blockading up the Rio Grande, and stopping all supplies for Matamoros, orders for which have been given to the naval commander at Brazos Santiago.

Notwithstanding the alternative of war presented by Gen. Ampudia, no hostile movement has yet been made by his force. Whether he will feel strong enough to attempt anything when all of his force shall arrive, is very doubtful. Our brigades occupy strong positions, beyond reach of fire from the town, and can hold themselves against many times their number of Mexican troops. In the meantime our defences here and at Point Isabel, are daily gaining strength. The Latter point is well supplied with artillery, and in good condition to resist attack.

I regret to report that Colonel Cross has been missing since the 10th instant, on which day he rode out alone in the vicinity of our camp. All attempts to trace him have hitherto proved fruitless, and I much fear that he has been waylaid and murdered by banditti known to be in our neighborhood. Today I address a letter on the subject to General Ampudia, desiring him to assist in our efforts to ascertain the colonel's fate.

I shall authorize the raising of two companies of Texan mounted men, for service in this quarter, particularly for the purpose of keeping open our communication with Point Isabel, and relieving the regular cavalry of a portion of their duties, which are now oppressive.

Several resignations of officers have been tendered since our arrival here. While I regret that such has been the case, I have still deemed my duty to throw no obstacle in the way of their stance.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

NRR 70.198 May 30, 1846 account of events at Point Isabel during the battle of 9th May

In looking over the New Orleans paper and extras of the 17th inst. A second time we observe a few items of sufficient general interest to claim a place in our columns:

The following from the Picayune was written before news of the engagement of the 9th-the last we have any account of-reached New Orleans. It is of some importance, however, as it reveals the reasons which determined Gen. Taylor to leave Point Isabel on the 7th inst. for his encampment opposite Matamoros before the arrival of reinforcements.

Some time after the battle was begun two Negro men ran off from the army, and reported at Point Isabel that the day was going against the United States army. The excitement at the receipt of the intelligence may be more easily imagined than described. It was not till Gen. Taylor sent in his wounded to the Point, on the afternoon of the ensuing day that the issue of the day's bloody business was known. The smoke of the battle was seen distinctly from Isabel, and every report of the cannon counted. It was thought that at least five guns a minute were discharged.

The general left Point Isabel for the entrenchments opposite Matamoros before the arrival of reinforcements, because he was apprehensive lest the enemy might so surround and harass it as to render its safety doubtful. The enemy has concentrated an immense force upon Matamoros and the neighboring country. The Mexican soldiers are in greater strength than has been hitherto supposed.

No further news was heard from Gen. Taylor, after the evening of the 9th, nor was any more firing heard. We are informed that when the two companies of Mexican artillery were seen-as they could be from Point Isabel-whilst yet the battle was raging, coming down to cross Coccha Chica, and boats and stores, the belief was that Gen. Taylor had been cut off. Such a spectacle, taken in conjunction with the story of the Negroes, who deserted; must have been a sad one indeed, to the few brave men who remained in the fort. Fortunately, the U.S. ship Cumberland was at hand to drive off this detachment. The Mexicans must have felt confident of obtaining a victory, to have sent these men down to take charge of the American stores before the close of the battle.

The impression was that Gen. Taylor would throw up a redoubt upon the field of battle, and remain there till the volunteers arrived. This was a conjecture only, as the general is one of those men who keep their own counsel. We have seen a letter from one of the officers at Isabel, who thought such would be his course.

Whilst congratulating the country upon the successes already achieved something is due to the brave men who have fallen in battle and the gallant officers who have been so severely wounded in the field. Major Ringgold is an honor to the service, and a victory is dear that is purchased with the loss of such an officer. Capt. Page we know well. He is as true a soldier as ever faced his country's foe. They will be remembered by their countrymen. Honor to the living and peace be with the dead.
A correspondent of the New Orleans Bulletin, writing from Point Isabel on the evening of the 12th inst., remarks-Many instances occurred of our men handing their canteens to the wounded Mexicans, and turning from them to fire upon others. There was not a single occurrence of cruelty towards the enemy.-The morale of the army is at its highest-it can now accomplish anything, and they would die for a commander who does not ask them to go where he is not willing to lead, and in whose judgment they fully confide. [JEB]

NNR 70.198 May 30, 1846 Gen. Pedro Ampudia's proclamation to the people of the east, his address to the inhabitants of the frontier, "Eagle of the North"s notice of the manifesto

From the "Eagle of the North," April 8th, 1846

We have seen with the greatest satisfaction the manifesto given to the nation by his excellency the president ad interim, in regard to the correspondence relative to the subject of Texas, hold between the supreme government and the envoy extraordinary of the United States. This document is as satisfactory as could be hoped for after the sincere offers made at San Louis Porosi by the chief of our destinies; in it we explicitly treated the difficult question, which for ten successive years has been the pretext for civil discord, and in it we have a safe guarantee that the existing energetic government will fulfill without delay the obligations which it contracted with the nation in giving the programme, which unites all divisions, which makes opinion unanimous upon independence, the culminating point of our social experiences.

It is true war is not precisely declared in the manifesto referred to, and this will not readily satisfy the anxiety of those who are menaced by the ironically called colossus of the north; but in addition to their being in the expressions of his excellency, the president, marked indications of a desire for the campaign so long a time talked of, a matter which has no little force in the mouth of the chief magistrate of a people, it is also therein expressed, as a fundamental basis, that the forced occupation of our territory by the United States, and the appearance of their squadrons upon the coasts of Mexico, are regarded as a real aggression; such is the language proper for governments which desire to uphold dignity and decorum; nevertheless, there will not be wanting some malevolent spirits to charge us with not having finally declared was, as if such an act were not the proper duty of congress, for which they are legally assembled, and who will find no difficulty in giving their irremediable sentence. NNR 70.199 May 30, 1846 President Mariano Paredes y Arillaga's manifesto to the Mexican nation

From the "Diario Official," (city of Mexico,) April 24th, 1846 [Translated for the Union]

MANIFEST OF HIS EXCELLENCY THE PRESIDENT AD INTERIM OF THE REPUBLIC TO THE NATION

On assuming in the beginning of this year the heavy responsibility of guiding the destinies of the nation during a short period, I determined resolutely to change its policy from the weak and pernicious system of temporizing, which has been observed with regard to the United States of America, not withstanding the perfidy with which that government prepared for the occupation of Texas, its treacherous violation of the existing treaties, which guarantee the limits of the republic, and the insidious act by which it incorporated one of our departments with its own confederacy. The Mexican nation did not conquer its independence by the most bloody and heroic sacrifices, nor place itself among the civilized powers of the world in order to become the sport of a neighboring nation, which, taking advantage of our quarrels and unfortunate disturbances and the exaggerated idea of our weakness, founded upon them, appeared with all the appliances for conquest, and entered upon the invasion of our territory, indulging in the dream that it could extinguish the manly race to which we belong, placing upon our foreheads the brand borne by the slaves in its southern states, destroying our nationality, and abandoning us to the humiliating misery of oblivion. The magnanimous people which, in a struggle of eleven years of blood and extermination, proved its boldness no less than its constancy, was waiting with impatience to rush forward into another war which it was called by the scandalous aggressions of a government declaring itself our friend, but at the same time aiming to prostrate us, relying on its power, and not caring to support itself on the titles of equity and justice which all nations respect, which strengthen the hopes of peace, and maintain the harmony of the universe. It was for this reason that the nation sanctioned the movement which I began at San Luis Potosi, not in order to place myself in the painful possession of power, but that my country may shine by the triumph of a cause which is the cause of the conservative principles of human society.

The old grievances, the offences against the Mexican nation, which have been incessantly repeated since 1836, had been consummated by the insult of sending us a minister, to be accredited near our government in the character of a residing minister, as if the relations between the two republics had not suffered any disturbance by the definitive act of the annexation of Texas. At the very time when Mr. Slidell appeared, the troops of the United States were occupying our territory, their squadrons were threatening our ports, and preparations were made to occupy the peninsula of the Californias, to which the Oregon question with England is only a preliminary; and I did not receive Mr. Slidell, because the dignity of the nation repelled this new insult.

In the meantime, the army of the United States fixed its camp at Corpus Christi, and occupied the island Padre Vayin; it then marched to Point Isabel, and the flag of stars floated on the right bank of the Rio Bravo del Norte, in front of the city of Matamoros, the American vessels of war having previously seized upon the navigation of the river. The town of Laredo was surprised by a party of these troops and one of our pickets there stationed was disarmed. Hostilities, therefore, have been begun by the United States undertaking new conquests in the territories included in the departments of Tamaulipas and New Leon, whilst the troops of the same states threaten Monterey in Upper California. There can be no doubt to which of the two republics belong the responsibility of a war, which might have been prevented by a feeling of equity and justice, and of that respect which civilization was introduced, for the rights and property of all nations. If Mexico should indolently suffer these reiterated advances of a power, which already considers itself mistress and sovereign of the American Continent, not only would she lose the importance which her population, resources, and peculiar position have given her, ever since she raised herself to be an independent nation, but she would fall into shame and contempt should she, when challenged to fight for them, allows herself to be stripped of the integral parts of her territory one by one. Outrages so many and so heavy, can no longer be borne; and I have sent orders to the general-in-chief of the division of our northern frontier, to act in hostility against the army which is in hostility against us, to oppose war to the enemy, which wars upon us; and invoking the God of battles to preserve, by the valor of our troops the unquestionable right to our territory, and the honor of our arms, which are no longer, to be employed only in defence of Justice. Our general, acting according to established usages, and the decided instructions given by my government, summons the general-in-chief of the American forces to retire beyond the river Nueces, the ancient boundary of Texas, and the summons has been disregarded.

The nations interested in preventing the disturbance of the peace which has lasted so many years, and whose commercial relations with the Mexican republic, may suffer injury, see the hard alternative to which we are reduced by the invasive policy of the United States, and that we must succumb unless we defend with energy our national existence threatened. I solemnly announce, that I do not declare was invaded or attacked, shall be valiantly defended.

The time has therefore come which the government of the Mexican nation have endeavored fruitlessly to put off, by debating the clearest and most just titles; and these having been condemned we enter into a necessary contest which will secure to us the sympathies of all nations and governments, which condemn the usurpations of the powerful. We shall ourselves become strong from the holiness of our cause; and when everything is endangered, our strength will correspond with the exigencies of our condition. Meanwhile the Mexican nation will resolve to hazard all in order to save all; and it will give a sublime example of sacred determination to exhibit that glorious devotion which has so often been displayed at all times by nations, maintaining their independence and their liberties.

I rejoice with pride that Providence should have destined me to be the organ for announcing the energetic will of the Mexican republic. Let us prove in battle that the sons of the heroes and martyrs of independence are animated by the recollections of their pure glory; that valor has not degenerated in their breasts, and that they are disposed to sacrifice themselves on the altars of their country.

Mexicans! I raise on the memorable day the standard of independence on which you see inscribed the illustrious names of Hidalgo and Iturbide.-Rally under this sacred ensign, leaving all internal questions and differences for a period of less peril.-I have assured you that the glory which I seek as the reward of my painful career, is not that of the ambitious man who regards power as the spoils of rapine. I have sworn to maintain the republic, in all its just rights, during the short period of my government; and now, while I urge you to the struggle and warn you that you must make great sacrifices, I also promise you that I shall not spare my own blood when it shall be necessary.

Mexicans! Your valiant soldiers are about to fight, and they will fight, with the valor of heroes; keep your blessings for them, and prepare yourselves to crown their noble foreheads, or their tombs, if they should fall, when destiny calls you to take their places in the ranks. Mexico will conquer or will no longer exist!

[NJR 70.199 May 30, 1846 Texas general orders for volunteers for Mexico]

Adjutant general’s office, Austin, May 2, 1846.

The executive has been officially advised by a date of 26th ult., from Gen. Z. Taylor, that actual hostilities have commenced between the Mexicans and the Army of Occupation, provoked by the Mexican foe. Under the authority of the United States, a requisition has been made upon him as the chief magistrate of the state, to call into the service four regiments of volunteer riflemen, two regiments of which to be mounted and two on foot, for six months, unless sooner discharged.

Relying upon the uniform chivalry of his fellow citizens, the executive addresses himself to their patriotism and in the absence of a due military organization makes the following requisition of the respective counties of the state. [JEB]

[NJR 70.199-200 May 30, 1846 prompt measures to sustain Gen. Zachary Taylor, proclamations and correspondence of Gov. William Owsley of Kentucky about raising volunteers]

Kentucky.-Prompt measures. On the 15th of May, Gov. Owsley received from Gen. Gaines U.S. army, a letter dated headquarters western division, New Orleans, May 4th, announcing that he had “solicited from the President authority to concentrate upon the borders” of the Rio Grande, “fifty battalions, each battalion to consist of 500 men,” (of western volunteers,) “to be accepted into service of the United States for six months, unless sooner discharged. To obviate loss of time in the accomplishment of this important service, I take this occasion to say that your excellency would contribute much to facilitate the desired movement by anticipating a formal requisition from the department of war, by authorizing, two, three, or four battalions of infantry and riflemen, to be taken from the young men constituting the chivalry of the state of Kentucky. To organize and repair to this city as soon as practicable, where they shall receive arms, with every requisite supply necessary to their health and comfort and to render them ready for action. From this city they will go by good vessels, (steamers if possible) to the Rio Grande, near Matamoros.

Gob. Owsley on the 16th wrote in reply to General Gaines: “I must beg leave sir, to assure you, that I admire and appreciate the patriotic zeal and professional ardor that so eminently characterizes your communication to this department. I am sure sir, that the people of Kentucky will feel gratified at the compliment paid to their chivalry, by being thus early called upon by the commanding general of the western division, to bear their part in the defence of the country. Yet, sir, occupying myself a post of great responsibility to the citizens of this state, my duty to them requires that I should await the authority of the president, which you have solicited, and which, if your anticipations are realized, must necessarily reach here in a few days. And this consideration reconciles me to the brief delay occasioned by deterring action till the receipt of orders from the general government. It would be impossible at all events to raise the battalions suggested in your letter, in time for them to form a part of the force to be concentrated at New Orleans "in present month."- The month is now more than half gone, and as there has been no anticipation in the public mind of such an early call for volunteers, the month would have expired before the battalions would be in readiness to be placed under your immediate command. I need not assure you, sir, that when war has been declared by the United States, Kentucky will be found in the line of her duty-true to her ancient renown and true to the American Union. Hoping that the citizen soldiers whose fortune it was to be nearer the scene of action that we are, arrived in time to give all necessary aid to the gallant officers now in command on the Rio Grande. I tender you my grateful acknowledgements for the confidence you have reposed in the volunteers from this state. [JEB]

NNR 70.201 May 30, 1846 Death of Major Ringgold

MAJOR RINGGOLD. The following particulars relative to his death, are from a distinguished officer of the U.S. navy.
Camp Isabel, near the mouth of the Rio Bravo del Norte, 11th May, 1846. The numerous friends of Major Ringgold will doubtless be anxious to know the particulars attending his melancholy end, and I hasten to give them to you. The engagement of the 8th was entirely in the hands of the artillery, and Major R. took a most active and important part with it. About 6 o'clock he was struck by a six pound shot. He was mounted, and the shot struck him at right angles, hitting him in the right thigh, passing through the holsters and upper part of the shoulders of his horse, and then striking the left thigh, in the same line in which it first struck him. On the evening of the 9th he reached this camp under charge of Dr. Byrne of the army. He was immediately placed in comfortable quarters, and his wound dressed. An immense mass of muscles and integuments were carried away from both thighs. - The arteries were not divided, neither were the bones broken. I remained with him all the night. He had but little pain, and at intervals had some sleep. On dressing his wounds in the morning, they presented a most unfavorable aspect, and there was but little reaction. During the night he gave many incidents of the battle, and spoke with much pride of the execution of his shot. He directed his shot not only to groups and masses of the enemy, but to particular men in their line; he saw them fall, their places occupied by others, who in their turn were shot down, pointing his guns to the same place, and he felt as confident of hitting his mark as though he had been using a rifle. He had but one thing to regret, and that was the small number of men in his company. He said that he had made use of all his exertions to have his company increased to 100 men, but without success. From the small number of his men, as they were disabled at their guns, he was without others to take their places. During the day he continued to lose strength, but was free from pain and cheerful. He spoke constantly of the efficiency of his guns, and the brave conduct of his officers and men.

He continued to grow worse, and a medical officer remained constantly by his side. Dr. Byrne remained with him during the night, using every means which could be devised to save his valuable life, but without effect. He continued to grow worse until one o'clock last night, when he expired. He survived his wounds 60 hours; during all this time he had but little pain - conversed cheerfully, and made all his arrangements for his approaching end with the greatest composure and resignation. He will be buried to-day at 3 o'clock, P.M., lamented by the whole camp. The wounded are generally doing very well. I am your obedient servant.

J.M. FOLTZ,
Surgeon United States Navy.

WHEREAS, the Congress of the United States has declared “that a state of war exists between the United States and the Republic of Mexico,” and has authorized the President of the United States, “to employ the Militia, Naval, and Military forces of the United States, and to call for and accept the service of any number of volunteers not exceeding 50,000, to serve twelve months after they shall have arrived at the place of rendezvous, or to the end of the war, unless sooner discharged, according to the time for which they shall have been mustered into service.” And, whereas, the President, with the view of securing to the citizens of each state and territory the privilege of participating in the defence of their Country, has appointed the said volunteer Force among the Several States and Territories; and has made his requisition upon me for two Regiments of Infantry, as the quote of this force to be supplied by the State of Maryland:

Now, therefore, I THOMAS G PRATT, Governor of the State of Maryland, do issue this proclamation, announcing to the Citizens of Maryland. That they are now privileged to enroll themselves under the Flag of their country, and to participate with their fellow citizens of other States in restoring to the United States the blessings of Peace.

I call upon the Citizens of the State of Maryland between the ages of 18 and 45 to enroll themselves forthwith, that the two Regiments required for this state may be immediately filled and mustered into the service of the United States.

The Sons of Maryland have always obeyed the call of patriotism and duty, and will now sustain the honor of the State by enabling her to be the first, or amongst the first, to offer the Federal Executive, for muster into the service of the country, her quote of the Volunteer force which has been called for.

Have already been duly represented in the Mexican war.

This emulation amongst the clans, is a valuable ingredient. No apology is necessary for the introduction here. Let other states compete for the palm.

Col. Truman Cross, the first victim of the war was a native of Maryland, a descendant of the revolutionary officer. [JEB]

Volunteers for the Army of Invasion

The general movement throughout the country may be judged of from the following brief summary which we take partly at random from innumerable articles of similar import which now crowd the daily journals from every direction.

Maryland-About 260 gallant volunteers, under the command of Captains Stewart, Piper, and Steiner, broke up their camp in Howard’s Park on the 27th instant, and after marching through the city of Baltimore, took passage in the cars for the city of Washington, where they designed to report to the commandant of the “District Volunteers,” with a view of expediting their arrival at the frontier.

Alabama-The “Relief Volunteers,” of Montgomery, Alabama, commanded by Captain Elmore, when they arrived at Mobile, received information that the Louisiana requisition was filled, and that they could not be received into service, They immediately sent an agent to New Orleans to solicit the privileges of being received without pay and Gen. Gaines accepted them as part of the regiment which he has authorized Colonel Bayley Payton to raise in the anticipation of a new call. They accordingly went over on the 16th instant to take their places in the ranks of the Louisiana volunteers. Another company from Alabama went over with them to request the same privilege. It is composed of citizens of Mobile and Tuscaloosa, commanded by Col. W.H. Platt

Louisiana-Volunteers pour into New Orleans enroute for the army, from all directions so rapidly that the governor finds it difficult to dispose of them. A proclamation has been issued stating, that the state’s quote of four regiments is full, and that no more can be received. The organization of Col. Peyton's regiment under the authority of Gen. Gaines, will still continue.

The legislature of the state on the 18th inst. passed a bill appropriating $200,000 for the equipment and transportation of the volunteers to Texas.

The Central Bank of New Orleans, on the 19th, placed whatever funds might be required by the governor for the dispatch of the troops at his disposal free of charge.

Kentucky- The promptitude of the Kentuckians shows that they are as ready as ever to anticipate a call. We notice on another page, Governor Owsley's proceeding. The Louisville Legion composed of eight companies, was to embark on the New Orleans on the 24th instant. Some of the companies have an excess of men. Distinguished military men of Kentucky have tendered their services to Governor Owsley.

The Northern Bank of Kentucky on the 18th instant, placed $250,000 at the disposition of the governor, to enable him promptly to fulfill any requisition upon Kentucky for the southern army.

The Louisville Journal of the 21st instant, says that some of the manufacturing establishments in that city have been compelled to suspend operations for want of hands, so great is the number of operatives who have joined the army.

Missouri-The St. Louis Volunteers, numbering about 600, were to march to Jefferson barracks on the 16th instant, from which point they would embark for the south. Volunteers from the interior of the state were constantly arriving in St. Louis.

Judge Mullanphy, of St. Louis has raised $4,500 by private subscription to defray the expenses of the volunteers.

At St. Louis committees have been appointed at a town meeting to solicit subscriptions in aid of the families of volunteers from that city.

Ohio.-The Cincinnati papers announce that one thousand men in that city are only waiting for orders. In various other sections of Ohio, volunteer corps are forming.

Indiana.-Two volunteer companies have been organized in New Albany, and they report themselves ready to march at a day's notice. Two corps have also been raised at Evansville.

Hoosier pluck!-A western editor says a strapping customer who looked as if he could "chaw up" a half dozen Mexicans at any one meal, without being satisfied, reached our city yesterday morning, from an interior county (Putnam) in Indiana, for the purpose of joining one of the volunteer companies. So anxious was he to enter into service that he walked the entire distance from home, which was more than a hundred miles, barefooted. He is one of the right kind of "boys"

Illinois.-The St. Louis papers say three volunteer companies at Quincy, Illinois, were ready to march to the assistance of the army in the south, whenever their services should be required.

Tennessee Volunteers.-The Nashville Whig of the 19th instant, says that volunteers from every part of Tennessee are daily tendering their services to Governor Brown, the Whig adds-"A draught will certainly take place, but it will be to ascertain who shall be compelled to stay at home. Tennessee will be ready to furnish more than her quote of any number that may be needed."

The Nashville Banner says, five thousand Tennesseans will be ready for whenever their services are required.

The Union Bank of Tennessee has offered a loan of $100,000 to the governor of Tennessee, to equip the volunteers for the war. [JEB]
INCIDENTS OF THE CAMPAIGN. From the New Orleans Bee, May 18

Official dispatch to Gen. Gaines. We have been politely favored with a perusal of the official dispatch addressed by Gen. Taylor, to Gen. Gaines, dated from his camp on the field of battles, three miles from Matamoros, May 9th, 1846. It does not differ materially from the accounts of the two engagements already laid before the public. On the 8th Gen. T. drove the enemy from their position, and occupied it during the night.

The loss in the conflict was 12 killed and 39 wounded. On the 9th, the army resumed its march, until it encountered the enemy protected, as stated in our extra, by a ravine, with artillery on its right. This battery was stormed by Capt. May’s company of dragoons.-The number of killed and wounded on our side could not be ascertained. Private accounts make the number something over one hundred.

They dispatch states that the forces under Gen. Taylor were two thousand three hundred men, and that they had to contend about 3,800 Mexicans of the regular army and about 2,000 irregular cavalry. [JEB]

NRR 70.202 May 30, 1846 bombardment of the fort opposite Matamoros

The fort opposite Matamoros has been incessantly bombarded during one hundred and sixty hours, during which an immense number of shot and shells were thrown in it. No material damage has been sustained. [JEB]

NRR 70.202 May 30, 1846 rejoicing in New Orleans about the action of the president and cabinet on receipt of news of the war

An express from Washington arrived at New Orleans on the 17th inst. with accounts of the action of President Polk, and the cabinet at Washington, on receipt of the news of the status belli existing on the Texan frontier. The news caused great rejoicing. [JEB]

NRR 70.202 May 30, 1846 comments on the plan of the campaign revealed in the correspondence of Gen. Mariano Arista

The Galveston Civilian speaking of Gen. Arista’s correspondence, which fell into the hands of General Taylor, says:

The plan of the campaign, and the instructions from Gen. Arista’s government, ordered him to take possession of Point Isabel; this was to be the brief act of hostility; he was to fortify it as strongly as possible. He was likewise ordered to take possession on the mouth of the river and fortify it at once. [JEB]

NRR 70.202 May 30, 1846 the firing on American troops bearing captured Mexican colors

After the rout, Gen. Taylor dispatched Capt. Carr, of the dragoons, with a guard, to convey the intelligence. They bore so many of the enemy’s colors with them that they presumed in the fort that it was the Mexicans coming up to make an assault, it being dark, and the fort fired upon them, but fortunately injured no one. [JEB]
The total number of volunteers furnished by the state of Louisiana up to the 18\textsuperscript{th} inst., was 4,753, and companies were still pouring in from every direction. [JEB]

Capt. D.J. Ricardo’s corps of Ranger, seventy-one men in all, had left for Point Isabel, without waiting for their bounty and caps. [JEB]

EXPEDITION AGAINST BARITA, &c.- Captain G. informs us that General Taylor left Point Isabel on the morning of the 13\textsuperscript{th}, with about two hundred men and a supply of provisions for the army at the camp. After proceeding for a short distance, however, he deemed it expedient to return and increase his escort, and take with him a large quantity of supplies. He did so, and took up his march again for the camp, on the morning of the 14\textsuperscript{th}, with from six to eight hundred men, a park of artillery, and about two hundred and fifty wagons. He was met about midway between Point Isabel and the camp, late on the evening of the 15\textsuperscript{th}. Up to that time he had not met the enemy nor was it anticipated that he would encounter opposition, as the general impression was that the enemy had retreated from our soil immediately after their disastrous defeat on the 8\textsuperscript{th} and 9\textsuperscript{th}. And sought safety on the west bank of the Rio Grande.

While General Taylor was at Point Isabel but received intelligence that the Mexicans were gathering in large numbers at Barita, a Mexican town, immediately on the bank of the Rio Grande. On being that informed, he ordered the town companies of Louisiana Volunteers under Captains Desha and Stockton, and a detachment of United States infantry, [From Jefferson Barracks,] numbering in all regulars and volunteers, about one thousand men, composed entirely of infantry, to proceed to the attack of that town. [JEB]

General Taylor returned to-night from Point Isabel. A party of Dragoons since his arrival have swam over and brought a boat from the opposite side. The sentinel over this boat left in haste.

All the prisoners whom we had in Matamoros were exchanged day before yesterday, besides which, we gave our enemy ninety-seven wounded men.

P.S. The camp is hurraying for the patriotism of the citizens of New Orleans, having just heard of their reception of the news of our situation and the promptness with which they acted.

From the Picayune Extra, May 19- On Saturday, the 16\textsuperscript{th}, intelligence was received from the General Taylor that the intended crossing the Rio Grande, just below his camp, by making a bridge with his wagons. So far every thing looked favorable to his design. The fleet had sailed from off the Brazos to the mouth of the river, and were to send up detachments to co-operate in the attack upon the Barita.

These troops embarked on the morning of the 15th, on the steamers Neva, Leo and Cincinnati, and were landed at the Brasos at 1 P.M. and immediately marched for the Rio Grande; the steamers being ordered to ascend the river and transport the troops and their ammunition across. Commodore Conner with his whole squadron, consisting of the steam frigate Mississippi, the frigates Cumberland, Raritan, and Potomac, sloop Mary, the brig Lawrence, and the schr. Santa Anna, at the same time weighed anchor and sailed for the mouth of the river intending to assist the troops in crossing with his boats, and to add in the attack with his men. The expedition was under the command of Colonel Wilson. [JEB]

On the 15th, the steam schooner Augusta, sailed for St. Joseph, with all the wounded that were able to be transported, taken from the battle of the 89th and 9th instant. [JEB]

NNR 70.203 May 30, 1846 letter from a correspondent at Point Isabel

A letter from Major L.J. Beall, to his brother Major B.L. Beall dated Point Isabel, Texas, April 27th, 1846.

My Dear Brother,- I wrote you a long letter yesterday, giving you the melancholy tidings of the death of your son-in-law poor Porter which I despatched by way of New Orleans. This morning about half an hour since, Mr Catlett arrived, and will depart immediately for Austin. Gen Taylor announces through him that hostilities have commenced. I have no but a moment left to give you an account of Porter's death, which from all I can learn, was of a most cruel nature. He was sent out with a party of ten men, to gain some intelligence concerning the late lamented Col. Cross (now ascertained to be murdered.) He was sent out on this duty somedays, when he met with a Mexican sentinel who snapped his piece at him and retreated to the woods, being prused by the men, they came on a camp, where they found nine horses belonging to the Mexicans, which they mounted. On their way back to Gen Taylor's camp they were surrounded by forty Mexicans, and fired upon. Pat Flood was killed, Porter wounded, but not before he had discharged both barrels of his guns with effect. This occurred during the heavy rain, and the men with Porter were unable to discharge their guns, and retreated to the chapparel, only one man remaining near enough to see what took place afterwards. Flood was surrounded immediately and stabbed with knives, and the man things they served Porter in the same manner after he had fallen from his horse. I have only time to express the deep and heartfelt regret that has followed this sad occurrence throughout the army; and the feelings of sorrow which I sympathise with you in this loss to your family.

A note from the camp just received, informs me that a squadron of dragoons under the command of Capt. Thornton, has been surrounded by about one thousand mounted Mexicans, and among other disasters Kane was killed, and Hardee taken prisoner. Mr. Catlett is about leaving, and I cant add another hasty word.

NNR 70.-203 May 30, 1846 A Letter from Major L. J. Beall, death of Lt. Porter

A Letter from Major L. J. Beall, to his brother Major B. L. Beall dated Point Isabel, Texas, April 27th, 1846.

My Dear Brother,--

I wrote you a long letter yesterday, giving you the melancholy tidings of the death of your son-in-law poor Porter which I despatched by way of New Orleans.
This morning, about half an hour since, Mr. Catlett arrived, and will depart immediately for Austin. Gen. Taylor announces through him that hostilities have commenced. I have now but a moment left to give you an account of Porter’s death, which from all I can learn, was of a most cruel nature. He was sent out with a party of ten men, to gain some intelligence concerning the late lamented Col. Cross, (now ascertained to be murdered;) he was sent out on this duty some days, when he met with a Mexican sentinel who snapped his piece at him and retreated to the woods; being pursued by the men, they came on a camp, where they found nine horses belonging to the Mexicans, which they mounted. On their way back to Gen. Taylor’s camp they were surrounded by forty Mexicans and fired upon. Pat Flood was killed, Porter wounded, but not before he had discharged both barrels of his gun with effect. This occurred during the heavy rain, and the men with Porter were unable to discharge their guns, and retreated to the chapparel, only one man remaining near enough to see what took place afterwards. Flood was surrounded immediately and stabbed with knives, and the man thinks they served Porter in the same manner after he had fallen from his horse. I have only time to express the deep and heartfelt regret that has followed this sad occurrence throughout the army; and the feeling of sorrow with which I sympathize with you in this loss to your family.

A note from the camp just received, informs me that a squadron of dragoons under the command of Capt. Mr. Catlett is about leaving; and I can’t add another hasty word.

Your affectionate brother,

NNR 70.-203-204 May 30,1846 account of the search for Lt. Porter

Lieutenant Porter. The Providence Journal publishes a letter from an officer under Genl. Taylor giving an account of the search for the body Lieut., Porter from which some idea of the nature of the campaign may be derived. The letter says,

"As soon as the news of Porter's being shot was made certain, I was ordered, with a party of fifty men and two officers, to go and find his remains, if possible also get hold of some of the rascals by whom he was killed. I started at daybreak on the 22d, with two day's rations, having as guides the same men who had been with Porter. We marched, the first day, twenty-five miles, and encamped, as my guides assured me, within two miles of the place where they were fired on.

I cut a place in the 'chapparel' and stowed my men away so snugly that you might have passed a hundred times without suspecting a soul was near. I hoped, by keeping thus unseen, and making a very early start, to come down upon a nest of the scoundrels before they scattered for their daily scouts, and help myself to the whole of them. After marching about four miles, however, the nest morning, my guide gave up, admitted that he was mistaken in the trail, and could give me no farther assistance. All the other men who had been with Porter said the same. They could tell me nothing, save their belief that it was in a certain direction toward which they pointed.

My guides having all thus failed me, I had nothing to do but try my own resources, so terracing our footsteps about eight miles, I struck off right through the 'chapparel,' steering by compass in the course which would 1 thought, intersect Porter's trail. Of the difficulty of this march I can give you but a faint idea. Most of my men were old Florida soldiers, and they all declared that their worst marches in its swamps and hammocks were play to this.

The 'chapparel,' is made up of a variety of strong gnarled shrubs, or rather bushes, from six to twenty feet high, all bearing thorns, and all so crooked and twisted that you cannot look at them without squinting, between these it is filled up with prickly pear, Spanish bayonet, and an endless variety of other plants, vines &c., all having the one common property of being full of thorns, spikes and prickles. We had often to cruel, and almost constantly to walk bent nearly double.

After penetrating about four miles in this manner, we came at last to a thicket of an entirely different character, composed almost solely of a dry, white, thorny bush, without leaves, and so closely matted together that it looked as if you could hardly run your arm into it. My advanced guard halted and said they could not get through
it. I told them they must try, and by beating the bushes aside with butts of their muskets, they made a place large enough for one an to crawl in.

The labor of the men in front was so severe that I had to change them every few minutes, and by the time I had gone a mile in this slow and painful manner, I saw from the general exhaustion of the men, that it was useless to attempt getting farther. I then sent two of them up the highest bush I could see, for trees there were none, to discover the nearest outlet, but in every direction hey could not see any thing but' chapparel.' There was nothing for it, therefore but to order and about-face and take the back track, until we emerged from this horrible wilderness of thorns.

My two officers were almost exhausted, and two of the men taken sick, from the terrible heat in this dense thicket, where not a breast of wind could relieve the close, sultry, unhealthy atmosphere, and where not a drop of water was to be had. When we got to water again every man would, I believe, had it been deep enough, have plunge in head foremost; fortunately it was nearly milk warm, so that unrestrained indulgence was not very likely to injure them.

My scout was entirely unsuccessful. My guide had misled me so far wrong that I could not get right, and was compelled to return on the third day, having marched at least fifty five miles, and bringing back nothing save the thorns, prickly pear needles, and the ticks, with which we were most abundantly garnished.

My knees and arms, from the wrist to the elbow, bore a striking resemblance to pin-cushions.

Poor Porter still lies, no doubt, a prey to the brigands, and the only way to obtain his remains will be by bribing some Mexican to bring them in. he has left young wife and child utterly destitute, save the pensions which , for five years, they receive from the noble generosity of our country--twelve dollars and a half per month. NRR 70.209 June 6, 1846 British steamer Terrible rumored ordered to Oregon

The British Steamer Terrible.--An article in Wilmer and Smith's Times, states as a rumor, that "twenty gunners, two sergeants, two corporals, and two bombardiers, under the command of Captain Blackwood are to be despatched by the British Government in their war steamer, the terrible, to Oregon early next month; the vessel is to take an adequate supply of guns and stores; and 3,000 excavators are to be sent to the same destination with all possible speed. This force and these men are professedly sent to the Hudson Bay Company's territory, but it would be useless to shut our eyes to the fact that the bar announcement of such an expedition, while the territory in question forms the subject of negotiation between the two Governments, is calculated to produce no small excitement in American amongst the parties who have been striving so zealously to fan the smoldering embers into a blaze." NNR 70.210,70.304 June 6, 1846 French notions about the war, the intention of France to interfere to prevent annexation of Mexican territory by the United States

[June 6, 1846] In relation to Mexico and the United States, the Paris correspondent of Wilmer and Smith's Times, writes, that the subject "excites considerable interest here; but little is said thereon, either in conversation or by newspapers. The latter, however, carefully translate all intelligence they can find in the American or English papers bearing upon the subject. Of course, there is but one opinion, that if the poor devils of the Mexicans go to war with the United States, they will get a most terrible licking. From what I can collect, I am of the opinion that the United States, at present, were to attempt to conquer Mexico, or even to annex any considerable portion of its territory, they would cause great satisfaction in France; and in all probability, would have to encounter the decided hostility of the French government. A reference to M. Guizot’s very remarkable speeches on the Texan question will show France attaches very great importance to the preservation of Mexico as a separate union, and that, apart from that consideration, it would regard unfavorably any further aggrandizement of the United States. Mr. Polk, it is true, has declared that neither France nor England shall interfere in the affairs of the American continent; but, then, M. Guizot has also declared in the most formal manner, in the name of France that it will, in spite of Mr. Polk, interfere as often and in such a manner as it pleases in American affairs. I say again, then, that my opinion is that any seizure of Mexican territory by the United States government would be stoutly objected to by France; and, no doubt, also by England. It would be ludicrous in me to presume to advise American statesmen as to the course to adopt in the present posture of affairs; but I say to American journalists – wait! wait! wait! and in a few years Mexico will be yours; but if you attempt to seize it now, or any portion of it, you will most likely have to count with England and France, and in that case you may depend upon it that England and France united will be too strong for you. [JCB]

[July 11, 1846] Paris, June 15. The Journal des Debats lately published a remarkable article on the state of affairs between Mexico and the United States. Our contemporary, says an English paper, asserts that Mr. Polk has only gone against Mexico to compensate for his defeat in Oregon, and to regain popularity. It thinks Mexico is totally unable to resist the United States, and that existing hostilities will result in dismemberment. It thinks the states will endeavor to seize the Californias to make up for their being obliged to lose Oregon, and that the Californias are infinitely more valuable. It views all this with regret, but beyond a few sneers at Mr. Polk, for whom it appears to have cherished the most profound contempt, it says nothing offensive to the United States. It points out the necessity of France and England interfering in the matter, in order to bring about a reconciliation, and to protect Mexico. It alleges that France has interests at stake in Mexico which call promptly for such interference. [JCB]

NRR 70.211 June 6, 1846 express riding to carry the news

Express Riding--Probably the most extraordinary equestrian feat of modern times, was accomplished the other day by Fred. Tyler, a youth of fifteen years of age who rode the express between Blakeley (opposite Mobile) and Montgomery, bringing the late news from the seat of war. The distance one hundred and ninety miles, was accomplished in thirteen hours--and during the entire night; he caught and saddled his horses--none of which were in readiness, as he was not looked for by those having the horses in charge.--He was rewarded with a contribution purse of seventy dollars. NRR 70.212 June 6, 1846 difficulties in organizing volunteers

THE ARMY OF VOLUNTEERS. The apprehension was expressed in a preceding number, that the government would find no little difficulty in arranging the several corps of volunteers – especially in relation to the requisition under which they were called out.

Our requisition came from General Taylor, in virtue of existing laws. The most of the volunteers that have yet started for the seat of war, have gone under this requisition.

Next we have a requisition made by Major General Gaines, for some eight or nine thousand men. Under this requisition the Kentucky volunteers paraded, and the Louisville Legion, nearly a thousand men have proceeded to New Orleans. We have it now stated from Washington, that General Gaines’ requisition will not be recognized by the government. What is to be done in this case?*

And next we have the requisition made by the president upon the several states, for volunteers under the act passed by congress on the 11th ult.

The term of service authorized by the last mentioned law, is six months. Under the other requisition, three months is the hunt.

In a general order issued on the 18th of may, 1846, to Gen. Gaines, the secretary of war directs him to countermand his call for "the several regiments of mounted gun-men," which were to rendezvous at Fort Jesup, as it would interfere with other arrangements. The order adds, "The volunteer force called into service from Louisiana, Alabama, &c., on your authority, and which you have previously reported, I am instructed to say, meets the approval of the department." NNR 70.212 June 6, 1846 General Plan for Conducting the War with Mexico.

That the President of the United States has calculated upon the probability of a war occurring with Mexico, no one who read his annual message to Congress of December last, could doubt for a moment.--the tenor of that message sufficiently indicated his view to Congress on the subject, to prepare them fully for such a contingency. The President's political opponents indeed insist that he not only considered such an event to be probable, but that he took such measures and gave such orders as to inevitably produce that result, whether designedly or not. The truth or falsity of this insinuation will in due time no doubt be ascertained; until then the executive is entitled to such a fair share of public confidence as is necessary to a successful conduct of the war, with a view to its speedy and successful termination.

So far as we can judge by the present spirit of the public journals, the question of the origin of the war, seems to be, by general consent, postponed.--as a family dispute which can be settled hereafter. We are at war, --and all hands--and all hearts, are required to use efforts to aid the government in making that war as brief as possible. On this point all political parties speak and think alike. To carry out this the representatives of every party in congress vote alike. The government meets with no opposition to their call for either men or money to prosecute the war, any more than to their recommendation to "recognize the existence of the war," which we believe not one member in congress opposed, though some few votes dissented from the expression of opinion as to the provocation for war with which the declaration set out. The war my be assumed as having been virtually, unanimously authorized by congress, and as now being as unanimously sustained by the people, so far at least as to enable the government to prosecute it with every energy, to a successful termination.

Thus armed and thus countenanced, the country cannot but look with deep solicitude to the government for an able conduct of the war. How much there is dependent upon this.

It was said above that the president must have at least contemplated the strong probability of a war with Mexico, and this implies of course, that he must have prepared some general, comprehensive plan, for carrying on the war and for achieving the object of which the war was commenced.

That no general plan has been arranged, should not be concluded from the fact that no publications of such plan has been made. The government might not deem it good policy to announce their designs as to conducting the campaign.
This may be true as to details, and as to some general views on foreign relations. The Executive is fairly entitled to have some state secrets, as well as secret service money.

But, allowing full latitude to these, there must be, or certainly should be, well arranged by the government, some general plan for conducting the war, some distinct outlines as to both means and ends, sufficient to satisfy people, jealous of both their honor and their interests, that their confidence is deserved, and that the sacrifices which they are called upon to make in the cause of their country, are entrusted to the management of competent authorities, and will be well improved. The country is looking to the government with profound anxiety for the announcement of so much of their views as fairly come within the scope of these remarks. [AEK]

<th>letter about traders to Santa Fe departing Independence despite news of the war</th>

| SANTA FE TRADE - Independence, Mo, May 16, 1846. Since last May, the scene has entirely changed in our town. Instead of great bustle of emigrants for Oregon or California, with their wagons crowding our streets, laying in their outfits for their journey across the plains, we have a great crowd of Mexicans and traders to Santa Fe and Chihuahua. It is supposed that we have at least two hundred Mexicans in the town and vicinity, at this time. Messrs. Aguira and Skillman arrived here a few days since in advance of the main company, making the trip from Chihuahua in forty-six days. The present week several companies have arrived, among them Peo Semirane, Jose Gonzales, and Louis Yaulwager Mexicans, who are on their way to purchase goods. They came in the early part of the week: also, James Magoffin, with others from Chihuahua, have also reached here. These various companies have brought in an immense quantity of specie, amounting to about three hundred and fifty thousand dollars. These Mexicans had to make forced marches between Chihuahua and Santa Fe, owing to the hostilities of the Indians, who pursued them for the purpose of robbing them, and were much pressed.

About forty wagons have left for Santa Fe and Chihuahua this week; and others are preparing to leave shortly. The late war news from Mexico does not seem to intimidate the traders. They are determined to push ahead, let what will turn up. They feel very sanguine of success in their enterprise, and say they believe they will not be molested, as the northern States of Mexico are in favor of the trade being kept open at all hazard. What will be the result, time only can determine. It is believed by many, that the trade will greatly increase in consequence of the ports of the gulf and Pacific being closed by our vessels, and thus having this only point through which they can safely receive goods. We trust that such may be the result of a war which cannot be sanguinary. St: Louis Republican [JCB] |

| Latest from the Army. No official accounts have reached the public from the army on the Rio Grande, since our last. The arrival at New Orleans on the 28th ult., of the statesmanship Telegraph, in twenty-six hours, from Point Isabel, via Galveston, furnishes the latest intelligence.

Barita, was taken without opposition, on the 17th, by Col. Wilson, with a detachment or 300 regulars and 350 volunteers, this was the first post occupied by the Americans on the south side of the Rio Grande.

Matamoros, Taken. An express arrived on the night of the 19th, from General |
Taylor, announcing that he had crossed the Rio Grande and taken the city of Matamoros, without opposition. The Mexicans had fled the city. Their army were deserting in battalions. They were in a state of starvation, having been suddenly collected, without sufficiency of provisions.

Part of two U.S. regiments having arrived, were stationed at Brassos Point, waiting Gen. Taylor's orders to march for Matamoros.

The steamer Sea reached Isabel on the 10th, filled with volunteers. The Alabama left same day for New Orleans.

The Mexican army certainly behaved bravely, ad were ably commanded during the battles of the 8th and 9th of May. Disciplined bererans have seldom acquitted themselves better, under similar circumstances, even including Napoleon's forces at Waterloo.

Capt. Auld thinks the whole number of our killed and wounded must amount to more than 300; besides the wounded taken to St. Joseph's, there are now forty at Point Isabel too badly wounded to be removed. All but three, it is tough, will recover.

There are three Mexican prisoners having but one leg between them all.

The wounded at Point Isabel, were doing well.

After being shot in the arm, Col. McIntosh received a bayonet wound in the mouth which passed through one side of his head. There are hopes of his recovery.

The condition of the brave and esteemed Captain Page is melancholy indeed. The whole of hi lower jaw, with part of his tongue and palate, was shot away by a grape shot. He, however, survives through entirely incapable of speech. He communicates this thoughts by writing on a slate, and receives the necessary nutriment for the support of life, with much difficulty. He does not desire to live, but converses with cheerfulness and exultation upon the success of our army.

Captain Thornton's escape, at the time his company was so badly cut up, is almost incredible. After carrying him safely over a high hedge enclosure, into which he had been decoyed, his horse bore him safely over several other fences and deep ravines, swimming the Rio Grande, above Matamoros; then passing down below the town on the opposite side.--in attempting to leap a broad ditch he missed hi footing, when both horse and rider were thrown.--By the fall, Capt. T. was so stunned that he was soon after taken up by the Mexicans, perfectly unconscious of what had happened. After the battle of the 9th he was exchanged and restored to our army. [AEK]

NNR 70.214 June 6, 1846 expedition against Santa Fe planned

MOVEMENT AGAINST SANTA FE. It was a matter of course, if war with Mexico occurred, that our government would immediately take measures for securing Santa Fe.

An extract of a letter written by a U.S. senator, "in confidence of the government," on the day after war was recognized by congress, to Col. R. Campbell, and to the governor of Missouri, is published in the St. Louis Republican of the 22nd of May, which says –

"Our first care in this sudden change in our relations with that country was to try and take care of our Santa Fe trade. For this purpose, it will be proposed to the people of New Mexico, Chihuahua, and the other internal provinces, that they remain quiet and continue trading with us as usual, upon which condition they shall be protected in all their rights and treated as friends. To give effect to this proposition and to make sure of protection to the persons and property of our traders, (besides the proclamation of the president to that effect,) Col. Kearney will start immediately with three hundred dragoons; to be followed as quick as possible by one thousand mounted volunteers from Missouri, and with authority to engage the services, if necessary, of all the Americans in that part of the world. This military movement will be to make sure of the main object, to wit: peace and trade, to be secured peaceably if possible, forcibly if necessary. For, unless they accept these conditions, the country will have to be taken possession of as a conquest. This, however, we hope will not be necessary, as it will be so obvious to the interest of the inhabitants of that part of Mexico, (too far off from the central government to have any effect in general hostilities,) to enjoy the benefits of peace and trade, with the full protection of all their rights of person, and religion.

This letter caused a great deal of excitement in St. Louis. A book was opened for the enrollment of names of persons desirous of entering upon an expedition to Santa Fe. The Republican says that a gentleman – understood to be the bearer of important dispatches from the government to the governor of Missouri and Col. Kearney – arrived at St. Louis on Thursday, and would proceed on his route as fast as steam could carry him. No doubt seemed to be entertained that the statement contained in the letter was true, and that a requisition on Missouri for one thousand mounted volunteers would be speedily made. The requisition, it is said, can be filled immediately. [JCB]

COMMANDER OF THE AMERICAN ARMY Major General Scott. From announcements which made their appearance in the official journal at Washington, as well as elsewhere, it was understood that General Scott, who, next to the president, is commander in chief of the army of the United States so soon as sufficient forces were concentrated upon the frontier, for an effectual invasion of Mexico, was to proceed to the field and assume command. The Union of the 16th ult., for instance, the following article, under the head of “Military arrangements. During the week the first active preparations have been made to give effect to the measures of congress for a vigorous prosecution of war with Mexico. We do not doubt that large discretion given to the president, will be felt to be in safe hands. While the public may rest assured that the utmost care will be used to control the economy, and to secure a force competent to the protection of the national honor, and to a speedy termination of the war, we do not apprehend that the authorized number of troops will be immediately mustered into service.

“True economy and a due regard to the high national interests, however, make it indispensable that a force shall be at once put into active service extraordinary for us in point of numbers, as large that officers of the highest rank will of necessity be in command. From the mixed character of the corps – partly of regular troops and more largely of volunteers – it seems natural that the general chief of the army should take the field – and we assume that Gen. Scott will, as a matter of courage to assume command.”

The foregoing article, and others of like idea rendered it certain that the president, at that designed that Gen. Scott should have command of the army intended for the invasion of Mexico.

Subsequent publications have led the public to apprehend that the views of the president in this aspect have changed. The official journal for two weeks past remained silent on the subject while papers out of Washington, however, have not presented silence. It is feared that an unpleasant difficulty is experienced.

The Philadelphia North American, of the 26th has an article on the subject which assesses "There is serious reason to believe an effort is being made by the administration to supersede Gen. Scott in the command of the southeastern army!!! In order to present the case fairly, it is necessary to refer to the circumstances which brought about his selection to this post. After the first indications of his return from the frontier, Gen. Scott was called in for council as to military operations. It was then presented to him by the president and secretary of war to proceed to the Rio Grande and take command of those forces – in plain terms, they desired to displace Gen. Taylor. With all the true instincts of a commander and the noble qualities of a man, Gen. Scott respectfully requested to be relieved from such duty. He stated that Gen. Taylor was his personal friend – they had served on the field of battle together – he had always shown himself superior to every emergency in which he had been placed, and was a brave and gallant officer, and would come out victoriously. Afer this urgent remonstrance, at various interviews, the subject was renewed, and it was then submitted whether he would accept the command of forces ordered by congress. To this he readily assented, alleging that General Taylor would then have no proper ground for exception, inasmuch as his higher rank would entitle him to the position, and could not be regarded as any disparagement to Gen. Taylor. When this understanding had been perfected, the president at once entered into what was presumed to be very confidential intercourse with Gen. Scott, and they were closeted nearly two days without interruption of any sort, in arranging the
It was well known with what a cordial and universal response the selection of Gen. Scott was received all over the Union, and by men of all parties. – The echo found its way back to Washington, and fell upon the ears of some high office, in anything, but grateful notes. I shall not say how much or how little the prospect of a future, beyond the successful termination of this Mexican war, may have influenced those in power in the course of conduct which has been manifested towards Gen. Scott since this acclimation was heard; but I know, and proclaim it, that the president and his advisers have acted with marked coolness, and in a manner utterly at variance with their recent profession. Whether this be the result of cause and effect, is left to others to judge.

During all these consultations and councils, no order of any sort was issued to Gen. Scott. The president expressed his desire he should take command of the army, when it was mustered into service, and General Scott made but one stipulation, viz., that in the event of war with England, he should be permitted to return from the frontier, to the more honorable command, which was granted.

Thus stood matters until about nine days ago. – Gen. Scott was all the while pushing forward his arrangements, and was devoting night and day to the organization of troops. Then, much to his surprise, the president, and the secretary of war, and others connected with the administration on different occasions, renewed the suggestion, that he ought to go to the seat of war. He replied as before – Gen. Taylor had accomplished as much as any officer could do, under the circumstances – had proven himself in every way capable of coping with the enemy, and deserved whatever laurels were to be won from the campaign on the Rio Grande. Still it was pressed upon his attention, so as to become disagreeable. – About this time, (a week ago,) it became necessary to frame a bill systematizing the details of that granting the supplies. This was confided to General Scott, and was laid before the military committee of the senate in his handwriting. It was done with the knowledge and consent, and I believe at the request of the war department.

The military committee of the senate met, and Mr. Marcy, the secretary of war, appeared in person before them – a proceeding altogether unusual. Several members being absent, a section was introduced without any conference with General Scott, which appears as the very first in the bill reported on Tuesday morning last by Col. Benton. It is as follows:

Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, that the president of the United States be, and he hereby is authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of senate, two major generals, and four brigadier-generals, in addition to the present military establishment.

Within the last few days Gen. Scott being still without orders, the subject not being resumed, and this bill, itself singularly expressive, being before congress – he addressed a letter to the president, stating at length his reasons for declining the appointment to supercede Gen. Taylor, and why he could, without any reflection upon that gallant officer, assume command of the whole force to be called out. No reply has been given, as yet, and it is now a matter of much doubt if he will be ordered."

The N.Y. Express intimates that a sharp correspondence has taken place between Gen. Scott and the administration, which will shortly be published.

That general Scott might not be acceptable commander to southern volunteers, we can readily imagine. Without pretending to decide whether he deserved the imputation, certain it is he was accused, of having more regard to his own prerogative of command than to the true interests of his country, in giving his orders to General Clinch, during his, General Scott’s, first campaign in Florida, not to move from the spot they were at, not to “give any aid to the interloper,” as he is said to have designated General Gaines, who was at the moment, at the head of a corps, in very much such a predicament – nay, a worse one than was General Taylor recently on the Rio Grande. Gen. Clinch’s forces, if allowed to move, might have relieved them promptly. They proposed to do so – Gen. Scott’s orders forbid them. The men under Gaines were literally in a state of starvation when subsequently relieved by Gen. Clinch.

These and similar incidents, with which southern volunteers are familiar, growing out of Gen. Scott’s unfortunate Florida campaigns, would prevent his being popular commander of volunteers from that section of the Union. The expression used by him in making his official call upon the government for adequate forces wherewith to commence his second campaign against the Seminoles, with a prospect of better success, has not been forgotten by the ardent spirits that at that time rushed spontaneously to the field, as thousands are now doing, and served their country as devotedly as men ever did: Gen. Scott told the government upon that occasion, that it would require such and so many troops for the ensuing campaign – “good troops – not volunteers.”

The insinuation, the reflection, contained in this official expression from the commander-in-chief, under whose orders these volunteers had so faithfully served, was keenly felt and will never be forgotten. If commanders indulge preferences as to the forces they require to fight with, volunteers will be apt to choose as to who they will volunteer under.

It is an assembly of mainly ‘volunteers” that is now assembling on the frontier.

Yesterday, 5th inst., in the United States senate, we find a warm debate occurred, relative to Gen. Gaines, and the above topic was introduced, and a call was made upon the president for all the correspondence of both generals. [JCB]

Capt. Thornton.  We learn that this officer was put under arrest immediately after his exchange, by order of Gen. Taylor. The cause of this proceeding our informant was not at liberty to state, but mentioned that it was on complaint preferred by his officers. There is a possibility, it is said, that Capt. Thornton may not be brought to trial at all inasmuch as he would be entitled to demand his release and return to duty on the firing of the first gun by the Mexicans. [AEK]

THE BATTLES OF THE RIO GRANDE.  A letter from an officer who was in both the battles, writes to Gen. Towson, from Fort Polk, Point Isabel, May 16th, the following account of them, which we extract from the Union, of the 30th ult.

“General Taylor having received information from the fort, on the morning of the 5th of May, that it was doing well, and the enemies shells not doing much execution, concluded to wait at this place with his army for a few days, and on the morning of the 6th, placed his whole force on the trenches of this work, and by united efforts of officers and men, added greatly to its strength in the course of twenty-four hours.
About 3 o'clock on the 7th of May, General Taylor having completed all of his arrangements, moved forward with his army and supplies, to resume his former position opposite Matamoros, determined and prepared to push his way through – (I must here state that it was my good luck to receive orders to join the army on this march, and to be present at the two succeeding engagements.) – His artillery consisted of two 18 pounders on siege carriages, intended to strengthen the fort, and Major Ringgold’s and Capt. Duncan’s light artillery batteries. The cavalry numbered two hundred sabers, divided into two squadrons, and the infantry numbered about 1800 bayonets, composed of the 3rd, 4th, 5th, and 8th regiments, with a battalion of artillery acting on foot.

At 12 o’clock on the 8th, the scouts reported the appearance of the enemy. Line of battle was immediately formed, and the supply train (consisting of 250 wagons) closed upon the troops. The army then advanced in this order about a mile, when the troops found an abundant supply of water. From this position the enemy was seen drawn up in the form of a crescent, with his left resting on the road leading to the fort. As soon as the two armies had approached within half a mile of each other, the Mexicans opened their batteries. Our battalion was thrown back so as to look to the left flank, which was menaced by the enemies cavalry.

General Taylor advanced in person with the two 18 pounders, and directed them to be placed in battery as soon as he was told that the range was good. When the fight commenced, Ringgold’s and Duncan’s batteries moved rapidly forward some eighty or ninety yards, and returned the fire of the enemy’s artillery. The two 18 pounders were directed against the cavalry on the left flank of the enemy’s line. – This cavalry, accompanied by two pieces of artillery, soon made a movement to turn our right or to attack the train. As soon as this was observed, the 5th infantry was advanced to the front and the right, and formed square against cavalry perceiving the square advanced at a charge sufficiently near to discharge their escopettes, but without doing much damage – The fire was immediately answered by one face of the square, which emptied some dozen saddles. The head of the cavalry column then withdrew, and continued its movement towards our rear. The 3rd infantry was then placed so as to cover the train, and two pieces of Ringgold’s batteries disposed on the left of the 5th. These movements were executed with great promptitude and effect. The cavalry seeing the 3rd infantry covering the train, began a retrograde movement, and at the same moment the two pieces of Ringgold’s battery under Lieut. Ridgely opened a brisk fire on the column and the two pieces of artillery that accompanied it before they could be unlimbered. This fire was so galling to the cavalry as to compel them to retire with the utmost precipitation. During these movements Duncan’s battery had done the enemy’s lines great damage.

The battle commenced at 3 o’clock, P.M., and after continuing for one hour and a half, the smoke from the cannon and burning prairie (between the two armies) became so dense that the artillery fire gradually ceased on both sides, and there was an intermission of three-quarters of an hour. The 5th infantry was then moved forward to the point abandoned by the enemy’s cavalry. The two 18 pounders were also advanced along the road – the artillery battalion on Ringgold’s left, and Duncan threw himself on the enemy’s right, supported by the 8th infantry. The battle was renewed, and the firing continued until dark, when out train being ordered to the rear of our new front, we all bivouacked for the night around the spot occupied by the 18 pounders. On the morning of the 9th, Gen. Taylor determined to disembarrass himself of his train; and with this view, it was placed in a good position, guarded by the teamsters, the two 18 pounders, and two 12 ponders, (that happened to be in the wagons for the defense of the fort,) with such field-works as could be immediately constructed. The army then moved forward over the ground occupied by the enemy the day before, and for the first time got an idea of the great havoc and distruction that had been done. – 150 of the enemy had been buried the night before, and upwards of 100 were lying dead on the field. – Most of the wounded had been carried off, but enough remained to tell the dreadful havoc that had been produced in their ranks. They acknowledge their forces to have been upwards of 7,000, and their loss in killed and wounded 500. The loss sustained by our army was 46 killed and wounded; among the latter three officers, one of whom, Major Ringgold, has since died.

General Taylor had not advanced far before he was informed that the light troops had discovered the enemy, occupying a strong position three miles this side the fort, and prepared to receive him.

This accompanying sketch represents the position of the enemy as near as could be ascertained. The artillery and infantry of the line were posted as indicated, and their light troops filled the woods up to line A B. General Taylor threw forward one hundred as skirmishers, who engaged those of the enemy and drove them back.
Ridgely’s battery pushed along the road until it gained the point C, when it opened upon the guns of the enemy. The 5th, 3rd, 4th, and 8th regiments of infantry were put into the brush on each side of the road, extended as light infantry. Captain May was then ordered to charge the three guns pointed down the road with his squadron doing gally, and the men driven from their pieces.
The 5th infantry followed up the charge and took possession of the guns. General La Vega surrendered his sword to Captain May. Duncan’s and Ridgely’s batteries rushed forward, gained the center of the enemy’s position, and directed a terrible fire on the flanks of his broken lines, while the 8th and 5th attacked him from the front; the Mexicans gave way and all the rest was rout. In this battle the slaughter on the part of the Mexicans was immense – between one and two hundred were made prisoners among them twenty officers, eight pieces of cannon, a number of standards, ten or twelve wagon loads of ammunition and arms, 500 pack mules, besides a large quantity of camp equipage, &c., were also captured. General Arista’s private baggage, portfolio, with all his instructions from Toruel, the secretary of war, and a great deal of useful information was also got possession of. Among the latter was a map of the country showing the dispositions of his army since it crossed the river, a copy of which I send you.

After detailing the casualties, already mentioned in former accounts; the letter proceeds –

The rout was followed up by Duncan’s and Ridgely’s batteries, and Captain Ker’s squadron of dragoons, moving at a rapid pace on the road taken by the enemy. The infantry also followed in close pursuit. The second day after the battle an exchange of prisoners was made, and the dragoons previously captured by the Mexicans joined our ranks.
The cannonading and the bombardment of the fort were kept up by the Mexicans until the evening of the 9th. They established one mortar battery on this side of the river, and arranged their others so as to bombard the fort from three quarters of a circle. Astonishing to relate that, although 1,500 shells and 3,000 round shot were thrown at the fort during the siege, only three were killed. Among them the gallant Major Brown, its commanding officer. He was struck in the leg by a shell, mortification took place, and he dies while hearing the guns of our second battle. It is the intention of this regiment, the 7th infantry, to gather the shot and shells thrown into the fort, and from them to erect a monument to his memory. This can be easily done, as all their projectiles are copper.

The following account is from the pen of an officer who bore his share in the duties and dangers of scenes he so graphically describes:

Camp opposite Matamoros, May 13, 1846. On the 1st of May he army under Gen. Taylor took up its line of march at three o'clock, P.M., for Point Isabel, thirty miles distant, in order to force up from that point provisions, which were necessary to the maintenance of our fort here. To defend it in our absence Gen. Taylor left the 7th regiment of infantry, Bragg's battery of four six pounders, Capt. Lowd's battery of four eighteen pounders and some convalescents as garrison – the whole under he command of Major Brown of the army. We had heard of the crossing of six or seven thousand of the enemy to oppose our march to our depot, and expected to fight them going down – but did not meet them. On the 2nd instant, in the afternoon, we reached Point Isabel, and on the 2d heard the bombardment of our fort at this place. This bombardment continued at intervals for several days. In the meantime, Gen. Taylor – having learned by express from Major Brown that he could hold the fort – put his whole command to work in the entrenchments at Point Isabel, the basis of our operations, and having made it sufficiently strong and loaded about three hundred wagons with provisions and ammunition, he determined to proceed at once to the relief of our gallant little band in this fort, and to give battle to the enemy if necessary. He commenced his march at 2 o'clock, P.M., on the 7th instant, in the following order: A squadron of dragoons, commanded by Captain May, in front; the third brigade, composed of 3rd and 4th regiments of infantry and Ringgold's light artillery; the 5th infantry not brigaded, and the first brigade, composed of the artillery battalion serving as infantry; Duncan's light artillery and the 8th regiment of infantry – to which must be added two eighteen pounders drawn by oxen, and Capt. Kerr's squadron of dragoons protecting the rear – the wagons on the march being in a degree interspersed between the brigades for greater security.

On the night of the 7th we encamped about twelve miles from Point Isabel, without seeing the enemy. On the 8th we had advanced about five miles, when we descried the enemy some two miles distant, drawn up in great force on the open prairie, and occupying the crest of a gentle slope with their backs to the thick bushes, - called in this country “chaparral.”

We immediately formed line to the front, and advanced calmly and quietly to the attack. Our brave and considerate old general, finding that the enemy waited to receive us, and that we were passing near a lake of water, the day being very hot and the men thirsty, halted in full view of the adversary and directed the men to fill their canteens with water. – We had now a little leisure to examine the force of the enemy and its composition. The horizon in our front and to the right appeared lined with cavalry. – (Lancers and Dragoons.) The works in their rear were giving p column after column of infantry, which were maneuvered with great regularity, and batteries of artillery were observed taking their designated places in our front and on our flanks. – The lowest estimate, at the time, of the enemy’s force was 5,000 of all arms – our own being under 2,000 fighting men. We have since learned that on this occasion the enemy had over 6,000 fighting men. But the greatest difficulty, under which we labored, was the absolute necessity of protecting in an open prairie, from the enemy’s numerous cavalry, our enormous train of provisions and ammunition, without which, even if we gained a victory, we could not hope to relieve our garrison opposite Matamoros or maintain our position there. Besides we were miserably deficient as to the number of our cavalry, having only some 200 dragoons, while the enemy could not have had less than 1,800 or 2,000. The men being refreshed our general rode to each brigade, told the men to keep cool, and when the enemy charged, not to fire a shot until they were repulsed with the bayonet, and had turned their backs in fight.

Our advance the recommenced slowly, but firmly, wagons and all; and when we arrived within good artillery range, their batteries opened upon us, some of their balls bouncing along the plain and passing us in “ricochet;” others flying over our heads, and falling in the rear, showing us in a few moments that their pieces were served with skill and precision. A movement was now observed among the enemy’s cavalry as if about to charge, and the regiments nearest them were thrown into square, or formation preparatory to the square, and so disposed as to protect our own artillery whenever it was ordered to fire. During this time, some fifteen minutes, the enemy’s fire was received in perfect silence by us, and at length, Capt. Duncan having been ordered to open upon them, advanced in a position to be protected by the infantry from the assault of the enemy’s cavalry, and one which would enable him at the same time to gall their cavalry and masses of infantry, sent a withering fire among them, which created some confusion, and which was answered by our squares of infantry by one long simultaneous shout, which showed how anxious they were to be led to the charge at once – but this could not be. – They were destined to give the strongest evidence of the courage that a soldier can exhibit, to stand in squares four hours under the enemy’s artillery, so as to protect from the enemy’s cavalry our own artillery, whilst the latter was mowing down the enemy’s ranks. As soon as Duncan opened, Major Ringgold’s thunder was heard on the right, lieut. Churchill’s from the 18 pounders in the center, and all the enemy’s batteries opening at the same time, a tremendous cannonading ensued, which, on this plain of almost boundless extent, presented a spectacle of great magnificence. The battle commenced at 10 minutes past 2, P.M. It lasted about an hour, when a large body of the enemy’s red Lancers charged the 5th infantry, with a view of cutting off our wagon train. They were met with the most perfect tranquility, and a discharge of musketry from the 5th (Gen. Brook’s) regiment told us their fate. They fled precipitately, leaving men, horses, and guidons on the field. In the mean time, the whole order of battle had been changed to conform to the maneuvers of the enemy, and our brigade, the 1st, which was the left, now found itself in advance and the whole order of battle had been changed to conform to the maneuvers of the enemy. He had also a man killed on his immediate right and left. Some of the balls fell into the centers of the squares, and ricocheted out again, without touching any one. Many dragoon horses were also killed, and the escapes were almost incredible. In Magruder’s company two men, whilst at an order, had the bayonets of their muskets cut off by cannon balls, passing just over their shoulders and between their heads. He had also a man killed on his immediate right and left. Some of the balls fell into the centers of the squares, and ricocheted out again, without touching any one. Others fell just on the outside and bounced over. – To stand patiently and coolly, in square, under such fire for five hours, without firing a shot, is the best evidence of discipline and invincible courage that troops can give. But more: - the effect of this conduct, which none but regulars could have shown, must be considered. The next morning the enemy retreated, leaving the field strewn with their dead, and having lost, by their own confession, five hundred killed and wounded; but we have found out since that the loss was much greater. The enemy’s artillery was numerous and served with great rapidity and precision; while we had little cavalry, and they had an immense proportion of that arm. Hence our shell and grape shot told briskly among them. In short, we gained on that day a great victory. When we consider the enemy’s numbers, his numerous and effective regular cavalry, and well-drilled infantry and artillery, and above all that he had chosen his own ground, that upon which he is most accustomed to fight, - the plain, - and compare all this with our inferiority in all arms, and that we were encumbered by a train we could not afford to lose, we can only account for the result by the impression made on the enemy by our firm and unshaken advance; by the steadiness with which we repulsed their cavalry, and by the unrivalled skill of our artillery officers and men – to which must be added a perfect knowledge on the part of both men and officers that if we lost that battle the fort at Matamoros would fall, the army be destroyed, and our depot – Point Isabel – be taken, to the eternal disgrace of the American army and the ruin of the interests of our government, for some time, at least, in this part of the world. We could not afford to be driven back a single inch, and we were prepared for anything but retreat.

On the morning of the 9th, the Mexican army left the field at early dawn, and after arranging our train, we commenced the march towards our fort at this place. At 2 o’clock, P.M., we found the enemy drawn up in great force, occupying a ravine, which our road crossed, with thick “chaparral” or thorny bushes on either side before it reached the ravine, and a pond of water on either side, where it crossed the ravine, constituting a defile. They were 7,000 strong, we 54 weaker than the previous day. The general ordered an immediate attack, by all the troops except the first brigade, which was kept in reserve, and soon the rattling fire of musketry, mingled with the heavy sound of artillery, announced the commencement of action. The enemy had chosen his position which he considered impregnable – was vastly superior to us in numbers, and had ten pieces of artillery, planted in the defile, which swept the road with grape, and which it was absolutely necessary for us to take before he could be beaten. These pieces were flanked on either side by a regiment of brave veteran troops, from Tampico, and we were obliged to stand as awful shower of grape and bullet before a charge could reach them. The battle had lasted some two hours with great fury on both sides and many heroic deeds had been done, but no serious impression made, when Gen. Taylor sent for Capt. May, of the 2nd dragoons, and told him he must take that battery with his squadron of dragoons, if he lost every man. May instantly placed himself at the head of his men, and setting off at full speed, with cheers and shouts, dashed into the defile, where he was greeted with an overwhelming discharge of grape and bullets, which nearly annihilated his first and second platoons, but he was seen unhurt darting like lightening, through this murderous hail storm, and in a second, he and his men drove away or cut to pieces the artillerists.

The speed of his horses was so great, however, that they passed through the battery, and were halted in its rear. There turning, he charged back, and was just in time to rescue a Mexican general officer who would not leave his guns, and who was parrying the strokes of one of the men. He handed his sword to May, announced himself as Gen. Vega, and gave his parole. May turned him over to an officer, and galloping back to General Taylor, reported that he had captured the enemy’s battery, and the gallant Gen. Vega, bravely defending it, whose sword he had the honor to present to his commanding officer. The general was extremely gratified, and felt no doubt that a blow had been given, from which it would be difficult for the enemy to recover – and so it proved, for a portion of the fifth infantry, finding the enemy had immediately re-occupied and commenced serving their pieces, gallantly charged and brought off several; when the 8th, which had just come up, marched to the attack by its gallant commander, Col. Belknap, seconded nobly by Capt. Montgomery, and took off the remaining pieces. – Col. Belknap, leading his regiment into the thickest of the fight, seized a Mexican standard, and waiving it over his head, dashed on in front of his men, until his horse stumbled over some dead bodies and threw him. Being a heavy man, he was helped on his horse by a soldier, who in the act received a ball through his lungs, and at the same moment, a shot carried away the Mexican flag, leaving but the handle with the colonel. He dashed ahead with that, however, and his regiment carried every thing before it. At this moment, the Mexicans gave way entirely, and throwing down their arms, fled in every direction, leaving all their stores, munitions of war, arms, standards, &c. the killed, wounded, and prisoners, including among the killed those who were drowned in the Rio Grande, do not fall short of 1,500 – so that the enemy’s loss in two days amounts to at least 2,000 men, something more than the number we had in our army.
When Lieutenant Magruder introduced General Vega to General Taylor, the latter expressed his deep regret that such a misfortune should have happened to an officer whose character he so highly esteemed, and returned to him his sword which he had won so bravely. It is said also that the general gave the captive officer an order on his private banker for a large sum, for his use when he arrived in the United States.

Immediately after the victory, a regiment marched into this fort, and was received with cheers and open arms. All had done their duty – those who were left to defend our fort – those who marched to relief. I had nearly forgot to mention that no officer in the battle of the 9th was more distinguished than Lieutenant Randolph Ridgely. His conduct drew praises from the lips of every officer; but I shall never finish if I record the feats of personal valor which occurred in this battle, where officers and men fought hand to hand for hours with the Mexicans. I shall therefore conclude with the hope that in a few days we shall be in Matamoros. [JCB]

NNR 70.217 Mexican account of incidents on the Rio Grande

MEXICAN ACCOUNT OF EVENTS ON THE RIO GRANDE FROM MAY 1ST TO 3RD INCLUSIVE. We have been favored, says the New York Journal of Commerce with the following translation of an article in the Matamoros Eagle of the North, of May 4th, giving an account of what it calls the “retreat of general Taylor” to Point Isabel on the 1st inst., and the subsequent cannonading between the forts of Matamoros and the American encampment opposite. Read in connexion with the events which have since occurred, and with the well known fact that only one man, (a sergeant,) was killed in the American fort on the 3rd and 4th, and only three up to the date of the last accounts, (14th instant,) nothing can be more ridiculous, - unless it be the reports of the same affair which reached this country, representing that 700 Mexicans were killed, their batteries silenced, town burnt, &c. The Eagle limits the death of one sergeant and two artillerymen on the Mexican side during the cannonading of the 3rd, which is two more than were killed in the American fort. On the whole, the firing on both sides appears to have been nearly harmless. We should like to see what the eagle will say of the actions of the 8th and 9th. Perhaps by this time it has found out that Gen. Taylor is not so great a coward as it supposed him to be. [JCB]

NNR 70.217-218 June 6, 1846 bombardment of Fort Brown

THE BOMBARDMENT OF FORT BROWN. – The New Orleans Picayune says:

“We have nowhere else seen so circumstantial and interesting an account of the bombardment of the camp opposite Matamoros as is contained in the following letter. It is due the author to state that it was written exclusively for the gratification of “a select few” of his friends – not for the public eye.

Camp opposite Matamoros, May 13, 1846. Since the evening of the 9th, nothing has transpired here. You may know ere this, that we gave the Mexicans “jesse” on the 8th and 9th. General Taylor, after establishing his little sand fort here, right opposite the town left the 7th infantry and two artillery companies in it, with instructions to defend it to the death; he then left with the remainder of his force for brazos Santiago for supplies, and with the hope that the two mortars (which he had ordered six months ago) had arrived from Washington, and also to bring up ammunition enough for our four 18 pounders to batter down Matamoros. – General T. and command left on the 1st of this month. On the morning of the 3rd, at daylight, the Mexicans opened their batteries on our fort, or rather our grand entrenchments; from that moment it was right hot work until 12 o’clock, when both parties had to cease until their guns would cool. Were you ever shot at, in front, with a 12 pounder, in the flank with a 6 pounder, and a shell directed to burst over your head? If not, try it, just to properly enjoy a brandy toddy after the gun cooling begins. Well, after the refreshments the ball continued, varied only by a little more “vindictate looseness,” and wild-colt comet like flying shells. It was only 23 minutes after we commenced our fire before one of our 18 pound shot struck their twelve pound cannon directly in the muzzle, and knocked it, head back and stomach into the air about 20 feet, and it was accompanied by legs, hands and arms.

Seven Mexican officers were wounded, and eight privates who were round their pieces were killed. We have not heard from their 12 pounder since, and so hot was the little fort in which it had been placed, that they were compelled to abandon it.
When the first fire came, I rushed into my tent and jerked up my rifle, and as I stepped out, a 9 pound shot struck my tent at the head of my bed, ranged the whole length of my bed, cut off the back upright pole, passed out the back part through the two other tents, and then buried itself in the parapet. I’m glad I was not “caught napping.”

In the first half hour a sergeant of Captain Lee’s company was killed; he was carried over to the hospital tent (full of sick) and directly after was laid on a bed, a bomb shell was thrown through the top of the tent, lit near the bed, burst and blew the dead man’s head off without injury to anyone else. On Wednesday, 6th of May, and the 3rd day of the bombardment, Major brown was struck on the leg with a bomb shell, and his leg had to be amputated – he died on the 9th. These are the only two we have lost during the bombardment, which commenced on Sunday, the 3rd, and lasted, with little intermission, day and night, until the next Saturday at dark. – During this time the enemy had thrown about 3,500 shots – solid and shell – amongst us. It is incredible that the damage should have been so light. Finding we could not dismount their mortars – they being sunk into the ground, with thick embankments in front – and having only about 400 rounds of ammunition to our cannon, we went to work to throw up a kind of temporary bomb proof shelter, by taking our barrels of pork, laying sticks of wood across them, and throwing up six feet of earth upon that. These we built at points in the fort where they would be convenient for the men; and when we saw the smoke from their guns, everyone would fall from the parapet, and “hole.” When we would see a shell coming we would fall upon the ground, as the explosion takes place upwards. The Mexicans thought they thought they had killed nearly all of us, as they were under the impression that all who fell were shot.

It was very distressing to stand and be fired at all round and not be able to return it “in full force and virtue;” but, knowing our ammunition was scarce, we reserved it till the death struggle should come on. We were in hopes that after a reasonable time of the bombarding, the enemy would attempt to storm us. Two or three feints were made, but they could not be brought to the scratch. Five mortars were playing on us at once, from every point of their works. General Taylor’s orders to us were to maintain this post, and not to pretend to make any sally, or risk in the least his position here; but in case we were surrounded after he left, hat signal guns should be fired at certain intervals, which would notify him of the attack. This notice was given to the general, as they heard all our guns at Point Isabel. On the 8th, the general commenced his march with the train of provisions, and when about twelve miles from here, he saw the enemy in position. He immediately “walked into their affections.” We heard the firing of the cannon on both sides, and distinctly the volleys of musketry. We knew well that it was the general poking it into their short ribs. We had then stopped to “licker,” but at the first gun we sprung to our parapets, opened our batteries and for one hour we had the prettiest little cannon fight that ever a man beheld. They gave us gun for gun, while we slung at them “the best the shop contained.”

But wait, I forgot one thing: On the first Wednesday, after the bombardment had lasted three days, the enemy “sounded a parley.” Major Seawell and Lieut. Britton were ordered to go out and see what they wanted. They did so, and the Mexicans demanded the surrender of the fort for “humanity’s sake.” They gave us one hour to surrender, or they would put us all to the sword. They brought us a letter from General Arista to our commanding officer. The commanding officers, Captain Hawkins – Brown had been shot just before – had a council of war called, and said he presumed we were unanimous on such points, but that he would put the matter to vote as to their feelings. The vote of the youngest member was taken first, and so on throughout. This was the unanimous vote: “Defend the place to the death.”
Gen, Arista was in thirty minutes replied as follows:

That we had received his humane communication, but not understanding perfectly the Spanish language, we were doubtful if we had understood exactly his meaning; but from all we could understand, he had proposed that we give him possession of this place or we would all be put to the sword in one hour; if this was proper understanding, we would respectfully decline his proposition, and “took this opportunity to assure his excellency of our distinguished consideration.” After the reception of this by his “excellency” it just rained balls. The different mortars kept two pair of “saddle bags” in the air all the time, varied only by their six and four pounders. But in the midst of all the storm, the Star Spangled Banner still floated on our breast – works, at the point where they directed their strongest efforts; and we took out our two regimental colors and planted them on different parts of the wall.
This fire was kept up all night, while their musketry played on us from the rear, at the distance of five hundred yards. We ordered our men not to fire a shot until they came within eighty yards – but they did not approach. Their object was to exhaust us in ammunition. They knew from deserters that it was scarce and Gen. Taylor had gone for a supply. They are fond of fighting at long distance, but they can’t stand the cold steel.

Now for where I left off on the night of the 8th; Gen. Taylor and the Mexican army were twelve miles from here – between this and Brazos. The batteries at Matamoros and around us, and our fort kept up a constant firing until dark, when all ceased. We had no communication from the general, but that he had to lick ’em or die! The sound of arms had not retrograded but advanced; besides there was no ringing of bells in the city or signs of rejoicing, therefore we judged they had not the first cause for jollification. That night was the first sound napping that had been done in the fort for six nights. The next morning at daylight the enemy’s batteries opened on us as usual, we laying low, as our cannon ammunition was nearly exhausted, giving them now and then a “crowder” to let them know that the “degenerate sons of Washington” were not all dead yet. At 1 o’clock we heard General Taylor open again and from that till 4 o’clock, the battle raged with fury, and coming closer almost every shot. – The general was driving them before him in the chaparral at the point of the bayonet. About half a mile in our rear we saw their cavalry retreating for the ferry, to recross the river at Matamoros, and they were in utter confusion; we turned one of our 18 pounders to bear on the mass and gave them a “blizzard” to help them along.

Then you should have heard the loud huzzas that went up from the little spot. I sprang upon the walls near our regimental flag and requested silence. Every thing was still as death. Says I, “three cheers, altogether, for the Star Spangled Banner.” It was given in full blast; Matamoros heard the shout, and then, and not till then, every gun of the enemy ceased its fire.

General T. captured more muskets from the enemy, than we had in the fight against them – the biggest pile of ammunition you ever saw, 400 splendid mules, and baggage of all kinds enough to load the steamer “Harney.” We have lost about 150 killed and wounded – 4 officers killed, 9 wounded. Gen. T. left day before yesterday, for Brazos to bring up his mortars, which we understand have arrived. – He will also organize the volunteers expected. We look for him to night, and so soon as he arrives, we shall commence operations against Matamoros, and we will have it or faint in our traces. It is my opinion that we have crippled them so by the loss of their cannon, muskets, and ammunition, that they will be forced to retreat to Comargo. [60 miles from here,] or Monterey, [108,] but from indications they may be fortifying the city and preparing to give us a street fight; let it be so – we are prepared for any event. The American never can acknowledge the corn of the cross of Negro and Indian. Some of us will get our pates cracked, but it is our profession. Nevertheless, mark what I say – unless everything we demand is granted, our banner will in a few days waive from the walls of Matamoros. [JCB] would be difficult, and the sudden abstraction of funds from places where they had been deposited would occasion a deal of mischief. Whether treasury drafts ought be issued – or what measure for relief would meet the views of those who had the country in charge, was a matter of profound interest. He respectfully enquired of the chairman of the committee on finances, if anything was to be done towards relieving the exchanges, no so unequal?

MR. LEWIS, knew of no changes in the present mode of conducting the transfers.

MR. CALHOUN, did not like that one senator should catechize another. The embarrassments spoken of were incident to, and necessary to a state of war. – Exchanges were against New York and in favor of New Orleans, and that was the cause. It could not be avoided by a national bank, or in any other way.

MR. WEBSTER, said that the government might afford relief by a proper administration of the existing laws, or by framing new ones. If he was called upon to point out the means of relief he should suggest a small issue of treasury notes, the effect of which would be to allay alarm, to increase confidence, to facilitate exchanges. It would not be necessary in doing this to rely upon treasury notes for the support of the war. All that would be necessary would be to aid the government itself by a transfer of its finds in the available means to treasury drafts.

MR. SIMMONS, of R, Island, concurred in this, and thought it a practical remedy for relief.

MR. NILES, of Conn., was for a vigorous application of the sub-treasury bill, and that was his means of relief.

MR. DAVIS, was glad that the resolution had been brought forward. It was time that the policy of the administration was made known in reference to the existing war. The policy laid out by the president and his friends six months since was in reference to a time of peace, and not to such a moment as the present.

After further debate the resolutions were deferred until next day, when –

MR CRITTENDEN, offered an additional enquiry, by way of amendment, and the whole were adopted without further debate.

The financial views entertained by the government will no doubt be communicated accordingly. [JCB]

NRR 70.224 June 13, 1846 Volunteers, Mexican schooners to USN, Brooklyn Navy Yard activity

Overwhelmed with articles, that ought to be inserted, many of them of primary interest, it is difficult to select. We have a number of columns in type, waiting for room, each one seeming to demand immediate insertion, amongst them the "Volunteer" movements, in all directions. Six thousand Volunteers were stated to have reached Point Isabel within a few days past. The disbursements required for the army now on the frontier are stated to approach half a million of dollars per day, rather an over estimate no doubt, but yet the amount must be heavy.

Amongst the volunteers for the Army, are noticed Henry Clay, Jun., son of Henry Clay, of Ashland Kentucky; a son of Mr. Crittenden, U. States Senator from Kentucky; the youngest son of Daniel Webster, with the approbation of his father, U. S. Senator from Massachusetts is raising, volunteer company in that state, for army of invasion.

Additions to the Navy.--The Bonito, Petrel, and Reefer, three schooners which are recently built at New York for Mexico, not having been paid for, have been sold by their builders to the United States government, delivered at the Brooklyn Navy Yard, and will be forthwith armed and dispatched to the Gulf,-- under command of Lieutenants Shaw, Sterret and Purviance.

Two Steamers, built also at the same port for the Mexican government, have likewise been purchased by our government, and will be ready for delivery in about a month.
The Brooklyn Navy Yard, is all bustle.--The Sloop Albany, will be launched in about two weeks.--The splendid picture, presented by the Albanians in honor of her name, has arrived, and will shortly occupy a conspicuous place in her cabin. A North River sloop was engaged on Saturday morning in landing some eight or ten Paixhan guns from the West Point Foundry, probably intended for the Albany. Workmen are likewise engaged in making ready the store ship Relief and the sloop Boston.--Nothing is said about preparing the frigate Macedonian, Lexington, or the frigate Sabine, the latter of which is on the stocks. There are now some eight hundred additional hands of all kinds who have been placed in employment since the arrival of recent orders for fitting out the government vessels. [AEK]

NNR 70.225 indignation of disbanded volunteers

A letter from New Orleans says: "The disbanded mounted gun-men,' which were being raised under Colonel Lafayette Saunders, and who had been at great expense in procuring equipments, &c., have held several meetings to express their indignation at the conduct of the war department, in rejecting their services. Their disappointment seems to have been very great, and they express it in no measured terms. [JCB]

NNR 70.225 June 13, 1846 Official Reports

June 13, 1846 GENERAL TAYLOR’S OFFICIAL REPORTS, of the battles of the 8th and 9th of May, have been received at Washington, but not yet published. Despatches from him dated Matamoros, 18th, 20th, 21st, and 24th May, giving an account of the retreat of the Mexicans and of his having taken possession of Matamoros, displaying the American flag over "Fort Paredes," and referring to the embarrassments which General Gaines’ requisition for other volunteers than had been asked for in his, Gen. Taylor’s requisition, &c., &c., reached us too late for insertion in this number. [JCB]

NNR 70.226, 256 June 1846 escape of two Mexican steamers from Veracruz for Havana

June 13, 1846 THE MEXICAN STEAMERS - Montezuma and Guadaloupe. – A slip from the office of the Charleston Courier, dated May 31st says – The schooner F. A. Crown, four and a half days from Havana, reports that two Mexican steamers, Montezuma and Guadaloupe, had escaped from Vera Cruz and arrived at Havana under English colors on the 24th ult. In 6 days. [JCB]

June 20, 1846 The Mexican steamers, Guadaloupe and Montezuma have reached Havana, their officers rejoicing at their escape from the American squadron. Santa Anna is said to have connived the purchasers of these vessels.

The probability is, that British capital was obtained where with to pay for building those vessels, and that the Mexican governemtn having never paid for their construction and outfit, the capitalists concerned have paid themselves as far as they could, by taking the steamers as a purchase from the Mexican government. The British government it is thought have had no agency in this transaction. The steamers were built in New York. [JCB]

NNR 70.227 difficulties developing over requisitions for volunteers

The difficulties which were foreseen and pointed out in the first reception of intelligence that requisitions from different authorities were being made for volunteers, are now developed, exactly as predicted. Government finds them exceedingly embarrassing, the state authorities scarcely less so, and the volunteers themselves are provoked and disheartened at the outset, by an evident want of proper arrangement in the premises. Meantime officers of the army heretofore high in estimation, are to be overhauled, perhaps, court martialled, instead of being in command at the moment when and where their experience and military knowledge ought to be available to the country. [JCB] confusion about mustering of the Saint Louis Legion into US service, troops raised for service against Santa Fe

THE MISSOURI VOLUNTEERS, or rather, the St. Louis legion, numbering 700 men, promptly assembled under command of Col. A.R. Easton, under Gen. Gaines' requisition to aid Gen. Taylor on the Rio Grande, were utterly confounded on being informed that under instructions from the war department, General Gaines' requisition would not be recognized, and that consequently they could not be mustered into the U. States service. After endeavouring in vain to reconcile the difficulty, the legion spiritedly resolved to embark for the Rio Grande on their own hook, and had made arrangements to leave on the 23rd ult. Just as they were leaving, Col. Campbell received a letter from Gov. Edwards, then in Washington, stating that Gen. Gaines requisition on Missouri had been approved by the president, and the volunteers that had started would be accepted, but the president desired that all who had not started, would be detained for the expedition against Santa Fe. Volunteers for Santa Fe, are pouring into St. Louis. [JCB]

KENTUCKY VOLUNTEERS. The Louisville legion, appear to have been too quick for the counter orders from the war department. At least they were off for New Orleans in virtue of impulse, if not of Gen. Gaines' requisition. They will contrive to get themselves mustered into the United States service, we hope, under some constitutional clause or other. Gen. Gaines' requisition was recognized by Gov. Owsley on the 17th of May, and the volunteers on that day were called for. The Frankfort Commonwealth, of the 26th says: "The requisition has been met. Before 12 o'clock on Monday, 13 companies of infantry, and nine of cavalry had been tendered to the governor. The governor accepted them in the order in which they tendered themselves, so that there were three superfluous companies of infantry, while but one company of cavalry remains to be tendered to fill up the requisition." over 5,000 Tennessee volunteers for the Rio Grande

TENNESSEE. Over five thousand volunteers have offered their services already to the governor, for the Rio Grande, twice the number the state is to furnish. Ex-governor Jones, (the late whig candidate,) is raising volunteers. [JCB]

departure of Texas companies of volunteers for the Rio Grande

A splendid company of volunteers from Montgomery, under Captain (late colonel) Jo. Bennet, left Galveston for the Rio Grande on the 29th ult. A company of about sixty mounted riflemen, under the command of Capt. Early, had started from Washington county for the Rio Grande; another company was to follow in a few days. [JCB]

general orders specifying routes of western volunteers to the frontier

ROUTE OF VOLUNTEERS. A general order from the headquarters of the army, at Washington, under date of 19th May, thus specifies the destination and routes of the quotas of volunteers called from the western states:

"The regiments of cavalry or mounted men called from Kentucky and Tennessee, will, from their respective state-rendezvous, take up their line of march, by the best routes, via Memphis, Little Rock, on the Arkansas, Fulton, on the Red River, and Robins' Ferry, on the Trinity River, upon San Antonio de Baxar, Texas. The regiments of cavalry or mounted men called from Arkansas, will, from its state-rendezvous (say) Washington, take the same route from Fulton to San Antonio de Bexar.

"Exception one regiment of the Kentucky and one of the Illinois quota of foot – to which General Wool is charged with giving different routes, and also excepting the Arkansas battalion which will receive instructions through Brevet Brigadier General Arbuckle, all other regiments and battalions of volunteer infantry or rifle called for, from the said states, will be embarked at the nearest navigable points to their state-rendezvous, and thence proceed by water, with or without transshipment at Mobile, or New Orleans, to Point Isabel or Brazos Santiago, Texas, like the troops ordered to San Antonio de Bexar? The whole will come under the orders of the general officer in the chief command of the United States' land forces operating against Mexico."

NNR 70.227discouragement of Indiana volunteers

INDIANA VOLUNTEERS. The requisition on Indiana called for three regiments of volunteer infantry, artillery and riflemen.

A public meeting was called at Indianapolis, which was addressed by gov. Whitcomb, (a warm partisan of the administration,) who addressed the people, and exhorted them to volunteer for the defense of the country. As to supplies, he said no provision had been made by the general government for supplies of any kind, and the volunteers must pay their own expenses, until mustered into service, but be thought the general government would refund! – he stated that the Madison bank had offered to place $10,000 to his credit for supplying volunteers, but he had scruples about his right to accept it. He would consider of the proposition further, and, in case the bank would agree to advance and look only to the United States for payment, he did not know but he would accept it! Before this speech, says the statement, some were determined to volunteer, but they were discouraged and did not offer. [JCB]

NNR 70.227difficulty in supplying Ohio troops mustered into US service

OHIO VOLUNTEERS. The requisition on this state was for three regiments, 2,400 men.

Cincinnati promptly responded, by parading the following companies –

Cincinnati Greys, numbering 80, Montgomery Gaurds, 160, Washington Cadets, 80, Morgan Riflemen, 80, German Volunteer Companies, 500, total, 900.

Difficulties were encountered as to meeting expenditures. The Ohio Life Insurance and Trust Company placed to the credit of the governor of the state the sum of $10,000 to meet the immediate demands of fitting out the volunteers.

The quota of the state was filled up. The Cincinnati Gazette on announcing the fact, adds – "We regret to learn that arrangements supposed to have been completed for passing the troops into the service of the United States, and for the prompt supply of volunteers by the general government, have failed, and that major Tompkins declines furnishing supplies, or to pay for those heretofore furnished. The state officers, therefore, continue to perform these duties.

Why is the burthrn thrown upon the state officers? Why this disregard by the war department of the wants of men invited in its behalf into the service of the country? These volunteers are United States troops, brought into service under the law of the U. States. The action of the state executive has been invoked to facilitate the raising these troops for the United States, not for the state. The governor has acted promptly with mean procured of individuals and state institutions – no menas whatever having been furnished by the war department, though congress had placed $10,000,000 at the disposal of the president, for the express purpose of raising and supplying this force. The action of the state governors and other state officers is gratuitous as it regards the general government. The act of congress confers no authority and impresses no obligation upon state officers. Why, then, are they asked to assume these onerous duties? And why, if these duties are readily assumed, and the department relieved, are they left to raise the means as best they may? Surely, if asked to perform these duties, they should be supplied with means. There is culpable negligence somewhere.

Major Tompkins, of the quarter master’s department of the army, has been here some days, but for some reason unknown to us, refuses to relieve or provide for the troops in camp! The law provides a method of mustering the volunteers into the service of the United States. This has been complied with. The law expressly provides, that when mustered into service, these volunteers shall be subject to the rules and articles of war, and shall be “in all respects, except as to clothing and pay, placed on the same footing with similar corps in the United States army.” The volunteers of camp Washington have been mustered into service, and have taken the oath according to law. They are entitled to subsistence from the United States most clearly. Under what pretext so plain a duty as to supply them is neglected or thrown upon the state, we are unable to discover. The word now is, they must wait the arrival of ge. Wool. There is great fault somewhere, and it should be ferreted out and exposed. But we are glad to learn that the governor will furnish supplies rather than let the troops suffer.” [JCB]

NNR 70.228 American consul at Veracruz and all Americans ordered to leave

It was reported that Gen. Paredes intended leaving the city of Mexico with troops to reinforce the army at the north. By an order from the Mexican government the American consul at Vera Cruz was ordered to close his office, and, with all Americans to leave in eight days from the date of the order, which was on the 18th of May.

NNR 70.228 June 13, 1846 Maryland volunteers

Maryland volunteers. We noticed in our last, the departure on the 29th of three fine companies of volunteers, raised within a few preceding days in the city or Baltimore, for the Mexican war. Impatient of delay, they determined to report themselves at once to the secretary of war, and for that purpose took passage in the cars for Washington. No provisions having been made for their reception there, they had some difficulty in the then extremely crowded condition of the city, to find accommodations. A touch of campaigning even in the capital of their own made republic they had to begin the service with. They soon made themselves known however, and were then duly appreciated and their services were accepted. The president requested the governor of Maryland to make the appointments of that portion of “the District of Columbia Battalion composed of Maryland volunteers.” Gov. Pratt accordingly commissioned Wm. H. Watson, late captain of the Independent Blues, (of Baltimore) to lieutenant colonel of said battalion. Another company also from Baltimore joined the battalion a few days after, and the whole embarked on the 11th instant, on board the steamer Massachusetts, for the Rio Grande. [AEK]

NNR 70.228 June 13, 1846 Mexico--Latest, Vera Cruz blockade, Battles of May 8th and 9th

Advices to the 25th ult., were received at New Orleans, on the 1st inst., from Vera Cruz, brought by the barque Louisiana, Capt. Williams.

The blockade of Vera Cruz commenced on 20th May, and 15 days were allowed for all neutral vessels to load and depart. The British mail steamers will enter and leave the port as usual; but will only be allowed to take specie.

The day the Louisiana sailed, information reached Vera Cruz that Mazatlan and Lepia had proclaimed in favor of General Santa Anna. Gen. Alvarez, in the south, was carrying on a disastrous war against the government.

It was reported that Gen. Paredes intended leaving the city of Mexico with troops to reinforce the army at the north. By an order from the Mexican government the American consul at Vera Cruz was ordered to close his office, and, with all Americans, to leave in eight days from the date of the order, which was on the 18th May.

The consul intended to embark on board of the U.S. steamer Mississippi on the 26th. At anchor off the Isle Vorda, U.S. frigate Raritan and Steamer Mississippi, and off the port the U.S. sloop Falmouth Great animosity prevailed against the Americans since the defeat of the Mexicans at Matamoros was known. The Louisiana sailed from Vera Cruz in company with the brig Helen McLeod (of Baltimore) for this port. I learn from Capt. Williams that no American vessels were left in port at the time he sailed. The packet brig St. Petersburg sailed for New York on the 20th ult.

The N. O. Picayune, June 2d, says--"The enormous forced loans which the government had imposed upon the clergy, the latter had declared itself totally unable to meet. The Metropolitan church was ordered to furnish a subsidy of $98,000 per month; the Mechoacan $35,000; of Puebla $40,000; of Guadalajara $2,000; of Durango $15,000, and of Oaxaca $8,000. These great sums per month show that the president is determined to prosecute the war with energy. He will never be able to collect such loans.

In regard to Paredes putting himself at the head of the army, El Republicano says it is uncertain whether he will repair to the Rio Grande or to Vera Cruz; but he will leave the capital as soon as congress assembles. Full accounts of the disastrous actions of the 8th and 9th had reached the capital and appeared in the official journal.

They are more accurate by far than Mexican bulletins generally, and do credit to Arista.

The news was received with profound regret, but with an apparent determination to fight the war out."

The Mexican papers claim positively that the number of the killed and wounded on the part of the Americans was more considerable than that of the Mexicans. Gen. Arista sets down the force of the Mexicans in the action of the 8th May at 3000 men and twelve pieces artillery; our numbers are stated to have been 3000 men, more or less, with great superiority in artillery. The destruction by our artillery is represented to have been severe--over three thousand shot are said to have been fired at the Mexicans in the same time discharged seven hundred and fifty shots from their artillery.

The Mexican loss on the 8th is set down at 352 killed, wounded, and missing--and they claim to have retained possession of the field of battle.

We have not the description of the action of the 9th, by Gen. Arista, as we had supposed in our has, but we have by us a journal friendly to him. His position is represented to have been gallantly forced, notwithstanding the repeated charges of the Mexican cavalry, the last of which was headed by Arista in person, and during which they actually "cut to pieces two entire companies of the Americans." The loss of the Americans is still represented as superior to that of the Mexicans.

The papers make very patriotic appeals to all good citizens to come up now to the rescue of the country.

In regard to the loan attempted to be raised from the cleft of Mexico, we have the official letter of the minister of the treasury, Senor Iturbe, dated the 13th, before the news of the actions of the 8th and 9th could have been received. It sets for the grievous necessity of money for the war, and urges the duty of the clergy to submit to the hardship forced upon all by the national calamities.

He tells the archbishop that the government has appropriated all revenues which were mortgaged, suspending, without exception, all payments to its creditors; that it withheld a fourth part of the salaries of all its employees; that all classes were called upon to make sacrifices, and the clergy must not be exempt. He then calls for a loan of $2,400,000, payable in twelve monthly installments, commencing the 30th of June. The archbishop is called upon to partition the loan among the various bodies of the clergy.

On the 15th the archbishop replied, that he had summoned an ecclesiastic convention to meet that morning, before whom the matter would be laid; and that he would co-operate to the extent of his powers "in a war in which were at stake the two precious objects of Mexicans, its independence and its religion."

The next we hear of the loan is an announcement in El Republicano, of the 21st, that the metropolitan churches could not contribute the $98,000 a month allotted to them, as the total of their revenues will fall short of that sum. The same paper states that the collection of such sums as are assigned to the other churches is utterly impracticable in the present ruinous state of the tithes and the general depreciation of ecclesiastical property. NNR 70.228 preparations for an expedition against Santa Fe EXPEDITION AGAINST SANTA FE. The St. Louis Republican of the 1st instant says – Yesterday capt. Turner, of col. Kearney’s staff, arrived in this city, direct from Fort Leavenworth, with instructions to the proper officer to furnish the necessary provisions, baggage, trains, &c. &c. for the contemplated expedition to New Mexico. They will be supplied at an early day, and shipped to Fort Leavenworth.

Upon the reception of the orders of the president, col. Kearney put every means in requisition to expedite his departure at as early a day as possible.

We are gratified to learn that col. K. does not go on this expedition, with the meager force which has been reported. His power, we hear, is ample to call for any force which the exigencies of the service may require. We do not know the whole amount of troops which he will deem proper to call for, but we understand that, in addition to two companies of artillery and mounted men, he will take a large infantry force. [JCB]

GEN. TAYLORS ARMY. – The Washington Union says: - "Gen. Taylor had, according to, the last accounts, about 8,000 troops under his eagles. Hundreds and thousands of volunteers were pouring into his camp. He will soon be in advance into the enemy’s country and we shall not be surprised to hear of his reaching Monterey, about 130 miles from Matamoros about the commencement of the table land, in a healthy region, at no distant day." [JCB]

NNR 70.228

ARMY ON THE RIO GRANDE. The steamship New York, at New Orleans, from Galveston, brings papers of the latter place to the 30th of May, inclusive. A letter in the New Orleans Commercial Times says –

Gen. Taylor took possession of Matamoros without opposition, on the 18th. He sent out Captain Walker and a company of dragoons, on a scouting part, and to observe the Mexican Army on their retreat. They had a slight skirmish with the vanguard of the army, in which they killed several of the enemy, and took twenty-five prisoners. It is reported that the enemy are strongly fortifying Monterey, and receiving strong reinforcements. Gen. Taylor, it is supposed, has now about nine thousand men, and reinforcements coming in daily.

Gen. Taylor’s encampment is a mile from Matamoros, and our soldiers are not permitted to enter the town – the citizens of which are respected and protected in all their rights.

A correspondent of the New Orleans Deltas furnishes the following particulars of the capture of Matamoros:

On the morning of the 17th, Gen. Taylor demanded an interview with Gen. Ampudia, which was granted. Ampudia arrived at our camp, and a big talk was to be had.

Ampudia talked of an armistice: Gen. Taylor demanded an unconditional surrender of the town. – Ampudia wished the armistice: Gen. Taylor told him that the time for such things had passed; and that it was no use now to talk about it, particularly since he had been put the trouble of transporting those heavy pieces of artillery. Ampudia still hesitated; at length he proposed to exclude the public buildings and public property. "No," says the general, "I will have everything." Finally, Ampudia agreed to return an answer by a certain hour that day – and took his leave, casting a woeful look at the heavy mortars as he passed them.

The hour at which the answer was to be given arrived, but no answer came. Gen. Taylor immediately ordered preparations to be made for crossing the river; parties were sent up and down the river, to secure all boats that could be seen on either side. That night, just after dark, the army moved three miles up the river, and encamped for the night opposite the crossing. Next morning, every thing being ready, the passage of the river was commenced just after sunrise, and the whole army landed on the opposite side without firing a single gun. It was understood that the Mexican army, after throwing part of their ammunition and cannon into the river, and concealing another portion of the same, had commenced their retreat about dusk on the evening before, by way of the main road towards the interior, in number from four to five thousand men, Arista at their head.

After our troops had crossed, Adjutant General Bliss advanced towards the main fort in front of the town, and sounded a peal. The principal Alcalde made his appearance, and a formal demand was made for the surrender of the town, with a promise that all religious and civil rights should be secured to them – all private property protected. The Alcalde wished to know if the public buildings and property would be free. The answer was, every thing belonging to the government must be given up. The Alcalde then said Gen. Taylor could take possession as soon as he thought proper, and that he would meet with no resistance. This was done, our army encamping in front of the town. [JCB]

NNR 70.228-229 a party of Americans taken and barbarously treated between Point Isabel and Corpus Christi

The Galveston News, May 29th says – "The most distressing news is the murder of a party of fifteen Americans, including two women and a child, between Point Isabel and Corpus Christi, by a party of Mexicans, exceeding in cold-blooded cruelty and of the previous atrocities of these savages. It appears that a party of fifteen, of whom Mr. Rogers spoken of above was one, left Corpus Christi for Point Isabel on the 2nd or 3rd inst. They arrived at Little Colorado just previous to the battle of the 8th ult., where they were surprised by a company of Rancheros, and being overpowered by numbers, were induced by Mexican promises to surrender as prisoners of war.

No sooner had those blood-thirsty dogs obtained possession of their arms than they stripped and robbed their victims, bound them beyond the power of resistance, and having ravished the women before their faces, cut all their throats, one fiend performing the horrible butchery. Rogers saw his father and brother butchered in this terrible manner, before his own turn came, and his own escape was owing to the fact that while the wound upon his throat was not fatal, he had the presence of mind to feign himself dead, and was accordingly, with all the balance, thrown into the Colorado, where he managed to escape unseen, and swam to the other side of the river.

Thence he subsequently made his way to the Rio Grande, was taken prisoner, sent to the hospital in Matamoros, and after the battle, exchanged. It is stated that a letter was written from Corpus Christi two days before the departure of this company, giving information to the Mexicans of their march, and of the amount of their money. It was not, we learn, without much reluctance, and some threats from an American officer, that the Mexican officer consented to exchange Mr. Rogers. [JCB]

NNR 70.229 arrival of Texas Rangers and infantry at Point Isabel

On the 26th, a reinforcement of 600 Texans arrived at Point Isabel; 400 mounted rangers and 200 infantry, from Padre Island. Amongst the latter is a German company, 80 strong, from Point Lavaca, said to be one of the finest looking bodies of men yet seen in camp.

It is confidently stated that Arista is concentrating his forces at Reinosa.

The troops that went by the Mary Kingsland, were to march on the 28th for Matamoros, by way of Bocca Chica and Barita.

NNR 70.229 Mexican account of incidents from 1st to 3rd May

MEXICAN ACCOUNT OF THE INCIDENTS, from the 1st to the 3rd of May, inclusive. [From the Matamoros Eagle, May 4th.]

The first day of this month, at 11 A.M., his excellency, the general-in-chief, left his place to join the army, which had marched a few hours previous, for the purpose of passing the river at no great distance from the enemy’s camp. In consequence of the orders given for the accomplishment of this dangerous operation, with proper security and conformable to the rules of the military art, on the arrival of our troops at the point designated, all the troops under the command of Gen. Torrejon had already occupied the left bank. The enthusiasm of our soldiers to overcome the obstacle that separated them from the enemy was so great, that they appeared sorrowful at the delay caused by the injuries received by the flatboats that had necessarily been conveyed by land on carts, and were so much damaged that they immediately filled with water on being put into the river. Nevertheless such was the activity of the general-in-chief, whose orders were fulfilled with the greatest celerity and exactness, that a few hours sufficed to transport to the opposite margin of the Bravo a strong division, with all their artillery and train of war.

This rapid and well combined movement ought to have demonstrated to the invaders, that the Mexicans have not only instruction and aptitude for war, but that these qualities appeared realized on the present occasion by the most pure and refined patriotism. – The Division of the North, encountering fatigue and overcoming difficulties, ran in search of the enemy, who covered by parapets and defended by cannons of such heavy caliber, can, with indiscusable advantage, await the attack. With deep losses, with a multitude of fortifications, the defenses were easy against those who present to them their bare breasts. But Gen. Taylor dared not resist the valor and enthusiasm of the sons of Mexico! Well he foresaw the intrepidity with which our soldiers would have rushed upon the usurpers of our national territory; well he knew that those who have so many injuries to avenge, those who have grasped their arms not to augment their own property by despoiling others, not in favor of independence of the country; well he knew, we again repeat, that Mexicans have no dread, either of forces, or fortifications, or heavy artillery. Thus it is, the chief of the American forces, intimidated the moment he knew by the proximity of the situation of his camp that our army prepared to pass the river, sallied out precipitately for the Fronton de Santa Isabel, with nearly all his troops and pieces of artillery, and some waggons.

The march was observed from this place, during which his Excellency Sr. General D. Francisco Mejia sent an express to communicate the notice to the general-in-chief. Here we must render to our heros the honor that they merit. The express verbally informed some soldiers, who had not yet reached the river, of the retreat of the enemy; they immediately set off at a run spontaneously the rest of the distance, such was the ardor and the anxious desire to come up with the enemy. The complete flight and terror that these set off with, from the frontier, to shut themselves in and evade the encounter, frustrated the active measures of Sr. Gen. Arista, given with the object of advancing the cavalry on the plain, to cut off the retreat of the fugitives. But it was not possible, even by a forced march in the night. Gen. Taylor left his camp at 2 P.M., and as fear has wings, he succeeded in getting into the Fronton; for when the cavalry got to the point where they ought to have cut them off, they were already past, and some leagues ahead. Great was the disappointment of our valiants that they could not meet the enemy face to face; Their route would have been certain, and the greatest part of the American army, who thought to cast down the Mexicans, would have perished in the first battle of importance. But we want to fight, and the Americans do not know how to use any arms except deceit and perfidy. Why did they not remain firm and fight at the foot of their flag? Why did they leave the land they iniquitously pretend to usurp? Is this the way the general fulfils his word of honor? – Has not Mr. Taylor said in all his communications, that he was prepared to repel those that offered to attack him? Why then did he run away cowardly, and shut himself up in the Fenton? The chief of the American army has covered himself with disgrace and ignominy; sacrificing, to save himself, a part of his forces that he left in the fortifications; for it is certain he would not return to succor them. He is not ignorant of the danger they run, but he calculates that his would be greater if he had the temerity to attempt to resist on the plain the bayonets and lances of the Mexicans.

We pass on to relate the glorious success of yesterday (Sunday, May 3d.) At day break our batteries opened fire on the fortifications of the enemy, and the thundering of the Mexican cannon was saluted by the drums of all the barracks and points of the line, by the bells of the parish church, and by the cheers of the inhabitants of Matamoros. In a moment the streets were filled, and all were happy that the hour had arrived to give a terrible lesson to the American camp, whose odious presence ought no longer be tolerated. The enemy answered, but were soon convinced that their artillery, although of superior caliber, could not compete with that of this place. After five hours fire, our bulwarks remained immovable from their solidity, and the knowledge displayed in the rules of the art of their construction; but it did not happen so with the fortifications of our opponents, for their parapets were completely demolished, in such a manner that by 11 o’clock, A.M., they ceased to play their artillery, and silenced their fire. For our part we continued actively the rest of the day without the enemy daring to answer, for the parapets which they sheltered themselves under, being destroyed, they had not the courage to load their cannons, that remained entirely uncovered. The result demonstrates what is in reality the exaggerated skill of the American artillery. – They have 18 pounders, and those of our line do not exceed the caliber of 8 pounds; nevertheless the skill and practice of the Mexicans sufficed to vanquish those that handled superior arms. Unfading glory and eternal honor to our valiant artillery!

The enemy, in their impotent rage, and previous to hiding their shame behind the most distant parapets, had the barbarity to direct their arms on the city, to destroy the edifices, since it was not easy to destroy the fortifications from whence they received so much injury. The mean vengeance, that can only be in the souls of miserable cowards, fortunately did not succeed as they intended. They who so unworthily adorn themselves with the title of illustrated (illustrious?) philanthropists! But their awkwardness was equal to their malice, for nearly all the balls went over, and those that struck the houses, although they were 18 pounders, did no other damage than mark one or two holes in the walls. If those who conceived the infamous idea of destroying Matamoros, had seen the smile of contempt that the owners of the houses displayed, and their indifference for the losses they might sustain, they would have admired the patriotism and unconcern of the Mexicans, who are always ready to make the greatest sacrifices to maintain their country and independence. The brilliant 3rd of May is another testimony of this truth. In the hottest of the fire we noticed the enthusiasm of all the inhabitants. A ball scarcely fell before the children ran in search of it, without fear that another, directed by the same arm, might strike the same place. – This occurred in our presence in the principal square, where a great many citizens had collected. The triumph of our arms has been complete, and we have only to lament the death or one sergeant and two artillerymen, who died gloriously fighting for their country. The families of these victims will be provided for by the supreme government, to whose paternal gratitude they have been recommended by the general-in-chief. It will also serve to console us that the blood of those valiants has been avenged by their brave companions.

As the artillery of our bastions introduced many balls in the enemy’s embrasures, the loss of the Americans must have been very great; and although we do not know with certainty the number of deaths, the most exact information makes them 56. It is probable it is so – their abandoning their cannon since 11 A.M., in consequence of two of them being dismounted, and the rest entirely uncovered – the terror and panic with which they retreated to their farthest entrenchments at the greatest speed; their taking every thing away from the reach of our artillery – the destruction which ought to have been occasioned by the grenades which were so well directed that some were scarcely a vara (yard?) distant from the spot where they ought to have fallen – all contribute to prove that the enemy has suffered terrible injury. If it was not so, why, if they have any valor left, did they not dare to repair their fortifications during the night? It is true that from time to time we fired a few cannon in the dark, but the aim could not be certain, and nothing but cowardice hindered them from answering the fire we opened on them at the break of day; not an American has shown his head. Silence reigns in their camp, and for this motive we have suspended our fire today to a few shots, for there is no enemy to present himself within reach of our batteries. To conclude, we insert a brilliant paragraph in the answer given by his excellency the general-in-chief, to the account which he received of the proceedings of yesterday. He says, "Mexico ought to glory, especially the valiant division of the North, that a force inferior in discipline, and perhaps in numbers, and who require nearly two months to receive their necessary supplies from the Capital, are proudly defying, on an immense plain, the army of the U.S., and all the powers of that republic, who, although they can receive assistance in fifty hours, have not dared to come out of the Fronton and give us battle.” [JCB]

NNR 70.229 June 13, 1846 Mexican Statement of their own loss, May 8th and 9th

Plan of Campaign. Among the papers found in the captured effects of Arista, was the morning return of the Mexican force on the day of battle, which shows the strength of the enemy to have exceeded 8,000; though it is not absolutely certain the whole of that force was on the United States bank of the Rio Grande. Gen. Arista’s aid, while making arrangements with a distinguished officer of our army for the exchange of prisoners and the care of the wounded, stated that the Mexican loss, in killed on the field of battle and drowned, was 800. Among the latter was one of the perished in his flight in the waters of the Rio Grande. In this number, the wounded and prisoners of course are not included. Fifteen hundred Mexican muskets (all king’s arms,) had been collected by our troops.
The plan of campaign, as developed by Arista's papers, was that the general, after demolishing the small force under command of Gen. Taylor, to overrun Texas; and, having effected "the conquest of that revolted province," if it should be necessary to secure the fruits of victory, it was arranged that Gen. Paredes himself should march an army of occupation into the conquered country. [N.Y. Jour. Com.] [AEK]

NNR 70.230 June 13, 1846 La Barita taken

Was the post, in Mexico, (according to the geography assumed by the president of the U. States,) first occupied by the American forces in the present war.

It was taken possession of by Col. Wilson, on the 17th May, 1846. An officer under his command furnishes the following account of the post and of its capture:

"La Barita, May 17, 1846.--I am here to select a site for the depot of our new base of operations and to intrnchit. This village is about then miles from the mouth of the river and the same distance from Brazos Santiago, or Fort Polka, (Point Isabel.) the prominent features which might induce me to decide upon this as the proper point for the depot, are, that it is the first high land you reach in ascending the river, that it is above hurricane tides, that the ground is naturally formed for a military position, commanding everything around it, and commanded by nothing. It is equi-distant, and not very inaccessible, from our other depots. The worst road is to Fort Polk--while the direct line is only then miles, the only road for wagons is over twenty. Col. Wilson is in command. He has four companies of his regiment--1 st infantry, and four of volunteers.

This movement up the river was intended to have been a combined one with Commodore Conner. It has been delayed two days by unfavorable weather, rendering the bar too rough. The commodore's limited stay here compelled him to notify the general not to count upon his co-operation in an expedition up the river. This morning, at daylight, I started the Neva (a river boat) out from the Brazos; she entered the Rio Bravo without difficulty about 8 A.M. I rode down the beach. Col. Wilson's command has been bivouacking for two days on our side of the mouth. We crossed them all over by 12; before 1 P.M., the column was en route up the river. The banks of the river are but slightly higher than the surface of the water for some miles up. The whole country low and filled with lagoons. There is a high ridge of sand hills some twenty feet high, extending up and down the coast, resting immediately on the beach. The couture back of this ridge is one vast plain of prairie and lagoon. The road up the river is tolerably good. The river is very serpentine. The road runs from bend to bend. The distance by river nearly double that by road. The road up the right bank is skirted to the left and south by lagoons until you reach Barita; so that a march of a column up this side was by no means exposed to a thick attack. The steamboat deck gave me a fine opportunity of observing the country. We can find no difficulty in making use of the river for transporting our supplies." [AEK]

NNR 70.235-239 June 13, 1846 Albert Gallatin's address to the people of the United States on the subject of war with Mexico

In resuming my speech on this subject, I wish to say, Mr. President, that the bill now before the senate is not the one recommended by the president of the United States. He recommended that the sovereignty and jurisdiction of the United States be extended to our Oregon territory to the same extent that Great Britain had extended her sovereignty and jurisdiction to the same country. In this recommendation I fully concur: and venture to say that, if such a bill was brought in, it might pass the senate, (leaving out unnecessary speeches) in as little time as it would require to read it three times by its title. But the bill before the senate is not of that character. It goes for beyond the president's recommendation. It proposes many things not found in the British act of 1821 – things implying exclusive jurisdiction and sovereignty in us, and that to an undefined extent of country, and under circumstances which must immediately produce hostile collisions between our agents and the British agents on the other side of the Rocky Mountains. I am opposed to all this; but I am not in favor of the indefinite postponement of the bill. I wish to see it amended and made conformable to the president's recommendation.
If gentlemen who have the conduct of the measure here will bring in such an amendment, and put it on its passage without speeches, I will stop my speech until it is passed.

I will now proceed to show, as well as I can, the degree and extent of our just claims beyond the Rocky Mountains.

To understand what I mean to say, it is necessary to recollect the geography of the country in question, and see it presenting as it does, three distinct geographical divisions, to each of which a different claim and a different degree of claim attaches, and which cannot be confounded under any one general view, without a general mystification and total confusion of the whole subject. The Columbia river and its valley is one of these divisions; the islands along the coast is another; Frazier's river and its valley, (called by the British New Caledonia) is the third. Under these three divisions I now propose to speak of the country. Under these divisions I have always spoken of it; and what I have said of one part had no application to the other. When I spoke of the great river of the west and its valley, either by its American name of Columbia or its Indian name of Oregon, I never intended Frazier's river as its valley, or Vancouver's Island, or the Gulf of Georgia, or Desolation Sound, or Broughton's Arch. When I speak of the coast and the islands, I do not mean the continent and the mountains; and when I speak of Frazier's river or New Caledonia, I do not mean the Columbia river. I repudiate all such loose and slovenly verbiage; and, desiring to be understood according to my words, I go on to speak of the country beyond the Rocky Mountains under the three great geographical divisions into which nature has formed it, and to which political events have so naturally adapted themselves.

I begin with the islands.

From the straits of Fuca, (in fact from Puget's Sound to the peninsula of Alaska – a distance of one thousand miles – these is a net-work of islands – an archipelago – some large, some small, chequered in together, and covering the coast to the extent of one, two, even three hundred miles in front of the continent. They are most of them of volcanic impression, and separated from each other and the continent by deep bays, gulfs, and straits, and by long deep chasms, to which navigators have given the name of canals. This long chequer-board of islands, and the waters which contain them, have been the theatre of maritime discovery to many nations, and especially Spanish, British, and Russian; but except the Russians, no nation made permanent settlement on any of these islands; and they only as low down as 55. The British and Spaniards both abandoned Vancouver's Island after the Nootka Sound controversy; and from the time had no settlement of any kind on the coast, or the islands north of Cape Mendocino, lat. 41; and the British had none anywhere. In this state of the case the question came on between Russia, Great Britain, and the United States, in which the distinction between the islands and the continent was acknowledged by all the powers, and Russia excluded from the continent and confined to the islands, because her discoveries and settlements were not continental, but insular. The conventions with Russia, (British and American), of 1824-25 were framed upon that principle; and now I proceed to read the instructions from our government under which this distinction between the islands and the continent was asserted and maintained. I read from Mr. Adam's dispatch to Mr. Middleton, July 22nd, 1823:

"It never has been admitted by the various European nations which have formed settlements in this hemisphere, that the occupation of an island gave any claim whatever to territorial possessions on the continent to which it was adjoining. The recognized principle has rather been the reverse; as by the law of nature, islands must rather be considered as appurtenant to continents, than continents to islands.

And again, to Mr. Middleton's communications to the Russian government:

"The Russians have an establishment upon the island of Sitka, in latitude 57 degrees 30 minutes. - This fort, built in 1799, was destroyed three years after by the natives of the country, and re-established in 1804 by Mr. Lisianski, who called it New Archangel. Russia cannot, however, avail herself of the circumstances of that possession to form a foundation for rights on the continent, the usage of nations never having established that the occupation of an island could give rights upon a neighboring continent, that the inverse of the proposition."

These were the instructions of our minister, under which we treated with Russia 1824, and upon which the conventions of that period were formed. They establish the fact that these islands in front of the northwest coast were considered a separate geographical division of the country, governed by national law applicable to islands; and that discoveries among them, even perfected by settlement, gave no claims upon the continent. I have considered it a cardinal error, in all recent discussions on Oregon, to bottom continental claims upon these insular discoveries. The Spaniards, as so well shown in the speech by the senator from N. York, (Mr. Dix), were the predecessors of the British in these discoveries; but I did not understand him as claiming the continent out to the Rocky Mountains, and up to 54° 40, by virtue of these maritime discoveries; and I am very sure that I limited my own sanction of his views to the tracks of ships which made the discoveries. I consider Spanish discoveries along that coast as dominant over the British, both for priority of date and for the spirit of ownership in which they were made. The Spaniards explored as masters of the country, looking after their own extended and contiguous possessions, and to which no limit had ever been placed: the British explored in the character of adventurers, seeking new lands in a distant region. Neither made permanent settlements; both abandoned; and, now, I see nothing, either in the value or the title of these islands, for the two nations to fight about. The principle of convenience and mutual good will, so magnanimously proposed by the emperor Alexander in 1823, seems to me to be properly applicable to these desolate islands, chiefly valuable for harbors, which are often nothing but volcanic chasms, too deep for anchorage and to abrupt for approach. In the discussions of 1824, so far as they were not settled, they were considered appurtenant to the continent, instead of the continent being held appurtenant to them; and the reversal of the principle, I apprehend, has been the great error of the recent discussions, and has led to the great mistake in relation to Frazier's river. I dismiss the question, then, as to this geographical division of the country, with saying that our title to these islands is better than that of the British, but that neither is perfect for want of settlement; and that now, as proposed in 1824, they should follow the fate of the continental divisions in front of which they lie.

Frazier's river and its valley, known in the northwestern geography as New Caledonia, is the next division of the disputed country to which I shall ask the attention of senate. It is a river of about a thousand miles in length, (following its windings), rising in the Rocky Mountains, opposite the head of the Unjigah, or Peace river, which flows into the Frozen ocean in latitude about 70. The course of the river is nearly north and south, rising in latitude 55, flowing south to near latitude 49, and along that parallel, and just north of it, to the Gulf of Georgia, into which it falls behind Vancouver's Island. The upper part of this river is good for navigation; the lower half, plunging through volcanic chasms in mountains of rock, is wholly un navigable for any species of craft. This river was discovered by sir Alexander Mackenzie in 1793, was settled by the northwest company in 1806, and soon covered by their establishments from head to mouth. No American or Spaniard had ever left a track upon this river or its valley. Our claim to it, as far as I can see, rested wholly upon the treaty with Spain of 1819; and her claim rested wholly upon those discoveries among the islands, the value of which, as conferring claims upon the continent, it has been my providence to show that our negotiations with Russia in 1824. At the time that we acquired this Spanish claim to Frazier’s river, it had already been discovered twenty six years by the British; had been settled by them for twelve years; was known by a British name; and no Spaniard had ever made a track on its banks. New Caledonia, or Western Caledonia, was the name which it then bore; and it so happens that an American citizen, a native of Vermont, respectfully known the senators now present from that state, and who had spent twenty years of his life in the hyperborean regions of Northwest America, in publishing an account of his travels and sojournings in that quarter, actually published a description of this New Caledonia, as a British province at the very moment that we were getting it from Spain, and without the least suspicion that it belonged to Spain! I speak of Mr. David Harmon, whose journal of nineteen year's residence between latitude 47 and 58 in Northwestern America, was published at Andover, in his native state, in the year 1820, the precise year after we had purchased this New Caledonia from the Spaniards. I read, not from the volume itself, which is not in the library of congress, but from the London Quarterly Review, January number, 1822, as reprinted at Boston; article, Western Caledonia.

"The descent of the Peace river through a deep chasm in the Rocky Mountains first opened a passage to the adventurers above mentioned into the unexplored country behind them, to which they gave the name New Caledonia – a name, however, which, being already occupied by the Australasians, might advantageously be changed to that of Western Caledonia. This passage lies in 56° 30’. MacKenzie had crossed the rocky chain many years before in latitude 54 ½ ° and descended a large river flowing to the southward, named Tacontche Tessa, which he conceived to be the Columbia; but is now known to empty itself about Birch’s Bay of Vancouver, in latitude 49°, whereas the mouth of the Columbia lies in 46° 15’. Another river called the Caledonia, (Frazier’s river,) holding a parallel course to the Tacontche Tesse, (Columbia), falls into the sea near the Admiralty Inlet of Vancouver, in latitude 48°, and forms a natural boundary between the new territory of Caledonia and the United States, falling in precisely with a continued line on the same parallel with the Lake of the Woods, and leaving about two degrees of latitude between it and the Columbia."
Its northern boundary may be taken in latitude 57°, close to the southernmost of the Russian settlements. The length, therefore, will be about 550, and the breadth, from the mountains to the Pacific, from 330 to 350 geographical miles.

"The whole of this vast country is in fact so intersected with rivers and lakes, that Mr. Harmon thinks one sixth part of it may be considered as water. The largest of the latter yet visited is named Stuart's and is supposed to be about 400 miles in circumference. A post has been established on its margin in latitude 54°34' north, longitude 125° west. Fifty miles to the westward of this is Frazer's lake, about eighty or ninety miles in circumference, here, too, a post was established in 1896. A third, of sixty or seventy miles in circumference, has been named Mcleod's lake, on the shore of which a fort has been built in latitude 55° north, longitude 124° west. The waters of this lake fall into the Peace river; those flowing out of the other two are supposed to empty themselves into the Pacific, and are probably the two rivers pointed out by Vancouver, near Point Essington, as we had occasion to observe in a former article. The immense quantity of salmon which annually visit these two lakes, leave no doubt whatever of their communication with the Pacific; and the absence of this fish from McLeod's lake, makes it almost equally certain that its outlet is not into that ocean. The river flowing out of Stuart's lake passes through the populous tribes of the Nate-ote-tains, who say that white people come up in large boats to trade with the A-te-nas, (a nation dwelling between them and the sea), which was fully proved by the guns, iron pots, cloth, tar, and other articles found in their possession.

"Most of the mountains of Western Caledonia are clothed with timber trees to their very summits, consisting principally of spruce and other kinds of fir, birch, poplar, aspen, cypress, and, generally speaking, all those which are usually found on the opposite side of the Rocky Mountains. The large animals common to North America, such as buffalo, moose, antelope, deer, antelope, bears, &c. are not numerous in this new territory; but there is no scarcity of the beaver, otter, wolverine, marten, foxes of different kinds, and the rest of the fur animals, any more than of wolver, badgers, and polecats; fowls. Also, of all the descriptions found in North America, are plentiful in Western Caledonia; cranes visit them in prodigious numbers, as do swans, bustards, geese, and ducks."

This is the account given by Mr. Harmon of New Caledonia, and given of it by him at the exact moment that we were purchasing the Spanish title to it! Of this Spanish title, of which the Spaniards never heard, the narrator seems to have been as profoundly ignorant as the Spaniards were themselves; and made his description of New Caledonia as of a British possession, without any more reference to adverse title than if he had been speaking of Canada. So much for the written description: now let us look at the map, and see how it stands there. Here is a map – a 54° 40' map – which will show us the features of the country, and the names of the settlements upon it. Here is Frazer's river, running from 55° to 49°, and here is a line of British posts upon it, from Fort McLeod at its head, to Fort Langley, at its mouth, and from Thompson's Fork, on one side, to Stuart's Fork, on the other. And here are clusters of British names, imposed by the British, visible everywhere; Forts George, St. James, Simpson, Thompson, Frazer, McLeod, Langley, and others; rivers and lakes with the same names, and others; and here is deserter's Creek, so named by Mackenzie, because his guide deserted him there in July, 1793; and here is an Indian village which is named Friendly, because the people were the most friendly to strangers that he had ever seen; and here another called Rascals' village, so named by Mackenzie fifty-three years ago, because its inhabitants were the most rascally Indians he had ever seen; and here is the representation of that famous boundary line 54°40', which is supposed to be the exact boundary of American territorial rights in that quarter, and which happens to include the whole of New Caledonia, except McLeod's Fort, and the half of Stuart's lake, and a spring, which is left to the British, while we take the branch, which flows from it. This line takes all in – rivers, lakes, forts, villages. – See how it goes! Starting at the sea, it gives us, by a quarter of an inch on the map, Fort Simpson, so named after the British Governor Simpson, and founded by the Hudson Bay Company. Upon what principle we take this British fort I know not – except it be on the assumption that our sacred right and title being adjusted to a minute, by the aid of these 40 minutes, so oppositely determined by the emperor Paul's character to a fur company in 1799, to be on this straight line, the bad example of even a slight deviation from it at the start should not be allowed even to spare a British fort away up at Point McIntyre, in Chatham sound. On this principle, we can understand the inclusion, by a quarter of an inch on the map, of this remote and isolated British post. – The cutting in two of Stuart's lake, which the line does as it runs, is quite intelligible: it must be on the principle stated in one of the fifty-four forty papers, that Great Britain should not have one drop of our water; therefore, we divide the lake, each taking their own share of drops. The fate of the two forts, Mcleod and St. James, so near to each other and so far from us, united all their lives, and now so unexpectedly divided from each other by this line is less comprehensible; and I cannot account for the difference of their fates, unless it is upon the law of the day of judgment, when, of two men in the field, one shall be taken and the other left, and no man being able to tell the reason why. All the rest of the inclusions of British establishments which the line makes, from head to mouth of Frazer’s river, are intelligible enough: they turn upon the principle of all or none!
– upon the principle that ever acre and every inch, every grain of sand, drop of water, and blade of grass in all Oregon, up to fifty-four forty is ours! And have it we will.

This is the country which geography and history five and twenty years ago called New Caledonia and treated as a British possession; and it is the country which an organized party among ourselves of the present day all “the whole od Oregon or none,” and every inch of which they say belongs to us. Well, let us proceed a little further with the documents of 1823, and see what the men of that day – President Monroe and his cabinet – the men who made the treaty with Spain by which we became masters of this large domain; let us proceed a little further, and see what they thought of our title up to fifty-four forty. I read from the same document of 1823:

Mr. Adams to Mr. Middleton, July 22, 1823. “The right of the United States, from the 42nd to the 49th parallel of latitude on the Pacific ocean we consider as unquestionable, being founded, first, on the acquisition by the treaty of 22nd February, 1819, of all the rights of Spain; second, by the discovery of the Columbia river, first, from the sea at its mouth, an then by land by Lewis and Clarke; and, third, by the settlement at its mouth in 1841. This territory is to the United States of an importance which no possession in North America can be to any European nation, not only as it is but the continuity of their possessions from the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean, but as it offers their inhabitants the means of establishing hereafter water communications from one to the other.”

FORTY-NINE, MR. PRESIDENT, FORTY-NINE! TO THAT LINE, AND THAT FOUR YEARS
AFTER THE ACQUISITION OF THE SPANISH CLAIM, WAS OUR UNQUESTIONABLE RIGHT HELD TO EXTEND; FIFTY-ONE WAS THE HIGHEST DEBATABLE LINE NAMED, AND THAT NAMED ON A PRINCIPLE KNOWN TO BE ERRONEOUS, AND READY TO BE GIVEN UP.

Mr. Adams to Mr. Rush. Same date. “By the treaty of amity, settlement, and limits, between the United States and Spain, of 22nd February, 1819, the boundary line between them was fixed at the forty-second degree of latitude, from the source of the Arkansas river to the South sea. By which treaty the United States acquired all the rights of Spain north of that parallel.

“The right of the United States to the Columbia river, and to the interior territory washed by its waters, rests upon its discovery from the sea and nomination by a citizen of the United States, upon its exploration to the sea, made by Captains Lewis and Clarke; upon the settlement of Astoria, made under the protection of the United States, and thus restored to them in 1818; and upon this subsequent acquisition of all the rights of Spain, the only European power who, prior to the discovery of the river, had any pretensions to territorial rights on the northwest coast of America.

“The waters of the Columbia river extend, by the Multnomah, to the 42nd degree of latitude, where its source approaches within a few miles of those of the Platte and Arkansas; and by Clarke’s river to the 50th or 51st degree of latitude; thence descending, southward, till its sources almost intersect those of the Missouri.”

“To the territory thus watered, and immediately contiguous to the original possessions of the united States, as first bounded on the Mississippi, they consider their right to be now established by all the principles which have ever been applied to European settlements upon the American hemisphere.”

This is an extract of great value, and is an amplification and development of the principle laid down in the extract just read. It recites the Spanish treaty of 1819, and claims nothing under it beyond the Columbia and its valley. To this our title ia alleged to be complete, on American grounds, independent of the treaty, namely, discovery, settlement, and colonization by Mr. Astor, under the protection of the United States. Again:

Mr. Adams to Mr. Rush. Same dispatch. “If the British Northwest and Hudson Bay Companies have any posts on the coast, as suggested in the article in the Quarterly Review above cited, the third article of the convention of the 20th of October, 1818, is applicable to them. Mr. Midleton is authorized to propose an article of similar import, to be inserted in a joint convention between the United States, Great Britain, and Russia, for a term of ten years from its signature. You are authorized to make the same proposal to the British government; and, with a view to draw a definite line of demarcation for the future, to stipulate that no settlement shall hereafter be made on the northwest coast, or on any of the islands thereto adjoining, by Russian subjects, south of latitude 55; by citizens by citizens of the United States north of latitude 51; or by British subjects either south of 51 or north of 55.

"I mention the latitude of 51, as the bound within which we are willing to limit the future settlement of the United States, because it is not to be doubted that the Columbia river branches as far north as 51, although it is most probably not Taconeshee Tess of Mackenzie. As, however, the line already runs in latitude 49 to the Stony mountains, should it be earnestly insisted upon by Great Britain, we will consent to carry it in continuance, on the same parallel, to the sea. Copies of this instruction will likewise be forwarded to Mr. Middleton, with whom you will freely but cautiously correspond on this subject, as well as in regard to your negotiation respecting the suppression of the slave trade."

Four things must strike the attention in this extract: 1. The offer of a partnership to the Emperor Alexander, which he wisely refused. 2. The offer of the same to Great Britain, which she sagaciously accepted. 3. The offer of 55 to Great Britain as her permanent northern boundary. 4. The offer of 51 to her as her permanent southern boundary, and its offer on a principle not valid, with the alternative to fall back upon the line of 49.

The British, who know all this, and a great deal more, must be astonished at our fifty-four-forty war fever of to-day! Again:

Mr. Rush to Mr. Adams. London, Dec.22, 1823. "In an interview I had with Mr. Canning last week, I made known to him, preparatory to the negotiation, the views of our government relative to the northwest coast of America. These, as you know, are:

"First. That as regards the country westward of the Rocky Mountains, the three powers, viz: Great Britain, the United States, and Russia, should jointly agree to a convention, to be in force ten years, similar in its nature to the third article of the convention of October, 1818, now subsisting between the two former powers; and, secondly, that the United States would stipulate not to make any settlements on that coast north of the fifty-first degree of latitude, provided Great Britain would stipulate not to make any south of 51° or north of 55°; and Russia not to make any south of 55°.

"Mr. Canning expressed no opinion on the above proposition further than to hint, under his first impressions, strong objections to the one which goes to limit Great Britain northward to 55°. His object in wishing to learn from me our propositions at this point of time, was as I understood, that he might better write to Sir Charles Bagot on the whole subject to which they relate." Again:

Same to same, December 19, 1823. "And secondly, that the United States were willing to stipulate to make no settlements north of the 51st degree of north latitude on that coast, provided Great Britain stipulated to make none south of 51 or north of 55; and Russian not make none south of 55." Again: Same to same, same date.

"That they (the United States) were willing, however, waiving for the present the full advantage of these claims, to forebear all settlements north of 51, as that limit might be sufficient to give them the benefit of all the waters of the Columbia river; but that they would expect Great Britain to abstain from coming south of that limit or going above 55; the latter parallel being taken as that beyond which it was not imagined that she had any actual settlements."

On Friday, Mr. President, I read one passage from the documents of 1823, to let you see that fifty-four forty (for that is the true reading of fifty-five) had been offered to Great Britain for her northern boundary; to-day I read you six passages from the same documents to show the same thing. And let me remark one more – the remark will bear eternal repetition – these offers were made by the men who had acquired the Spanish title to Oregon! And who must be presumed to know as much about it as those whose acquaintance with Oregon dates from the epoch of the Baltimore convention – whose love for it dates from the era of its promulgation as a party watchword – whose knowledge of it extends to the luminous pages of Mr. Greenhow’s book!

Six times Mr. Monroe and his cabinet renounced Frazer’s river and its valley, and left it to the British! They did so on the intelligible principle that the British and discovered it, and settled it, and were in actual possession of it when we got the Spanish claim; which claim Spain never made! Upon this principle, New Caledonia was left to the British in 1823. Upon what principle is it claimed now!

This is what Mr. Monroe and his cabinet thought of our title to the whole of Oregon or none, in the year 1823. They took neither branch of this proposition. They did not go for all or none, but for some! They took some, and left some; and they divided by the line right in itself, and convenient in itself, and mutually suitable to each party. This president and his cabinet carry their “unquestionable right” to Oregon as far as 49, and no further. This is exactly what was done six years before. Mr. Gallatin and Mr. Rush offered the same line as being the continuation of the line of Utrecht, (describing it by that name in their dispatch of October 20th, 1818,) and as covering the valley of the Columbia river, to which they alleged our title to be indisputable. Mr. Jefferson had offered the same line in 1807. All these offers leave Frazer’s river and its valley to the British, because they discovered and settled it. All these offers hold on to the Columbia river and its valley, because we discovered and settled it; and all these offers let the principle of continuity work equally on the British as on the American side of the line of Utrecht.

This is what the statesmen did who made the acquisition of the Spanish claim to Oregon in 1819. – In four years afterwards they had freely offered all north of 49 to Great Britain; and no one ever thought of arraigning them for it. Most of these statesmen have gone through fiery trials since, and been fiercely assailed on all the deeds of their lives, but I never heard one of them being called to account, much less lose an election, for the part he acted in offering 49 to Great Britain in 1823, or at any other time. – For my part, I thought they were right then, and I think so now;
I was a senator then, as I am now. I thought with them that New Caledonia belonged to the British; and thinking so still, and acting upon the first half of the great maxim – ask nothing but what is right – I shall not ask them for it, much less fight them for it now.

I come now to the third geographical division of the contested country; purposely reserved for the last, because it furnishes the subject for the application of the second half of the great maxim: Submit to nothing that is wrong. I come to the river Columbia, and its vast and magnificent valley. I once made a description of it, with an anathema against its alienation. I described it by metes and bounds – by marks and features – and then wrote its name in its face. The fifty-four forties got hold of my description – rubbed out the name – obliterating the features – expanded the boundaries – took in New Caledonia, and all the rivers, lakes, bays, sounds, islands, valleys, forts, and settlements, all the way up to 54 40! And then turned my own anathema against myself, because their minds could not apply words to things.
Well! I take no offense at this. There are some people too simple to get angry with. All we do with them in the West, is to have them “cut for the simples;” after which they are cured. They can perform this operation for themselves, or have it done. If by themselves, all they have to do is to rub their eyes, and read again: if by others, the operator must rend, and caution the listening patient to stick the word to the thing.

The valley of the Columbia is ours; ours by discovery, by settlement, and by the treaty of Utrecht! And has, too often, been so admitted by Great Britain to admit of her disputing it now. I do not plead our title to that great country. I did that twenty years ago, when there were few to repeat or applaud what I said. I pass over the ground which I trod so long ago, and which has been again so much trodden of late, and take up the question at a fresh place – the admissions of Great Britain! And show that she is concluded by her own acts and words from ever setting up any claim to the river and valley of the Columbia, or to any part of the territory south of the 49th degree.

I begin with Mr. Astor’s settlement on the Columbia, and rest upon it as a cornerstone in this new edifice of argument against Great Britain. What was the settlement? Not a mere trading post, for temporary traffic, down in a corner, and without the knowledge of nations or the sanction of his own government. On the contrary, it was the foundation of a colony, and the occupation of the whole valley of the Columbia, and the establishment of a commercial emporium, of which the mouth of the river was the seat, and the Rocky mountains on one hand and Eastern Asia on the other were the outposts. Great Britain saw it without objection – the United States with approbation; and every circumstance which proclaimed and legitimated a national undertaking signalized and commemorated its commencement, existence, and overthrow.

It was in the year 1810 – four years after the return of Lewis and Clarke’s expedition – that Mr. Astor, with the enlarged and comprehensive views of a “merchant prince,” projected from our eastern shore at the Atlantic this great establishment on the eastern coast of the Pacific ocean. A ship commanded by an officer of the United States navy, freighted with every thing necessary for the foundation of a colony, sailed from New York to double Cape Horn: an overland expedition of ninety men, led by a gentleman of New Jersey, proceeded from St. Louis to cross the Rocky mountains. In the spring of 1811 the two expeditions met at the mouth of the Columbia, and immediately proceeded to fulfill the intentions of the bold projector of the enterprise. Astoria was founded: its dependent post, the Okenakan, was established six hundred miles up the river: the Spokan, another dependant, was established two hundred miles higher up, and at the base of the mountains: a third, the Wahlamath, was established upon the river of that name, two hundred and fifty miles southeast of Astoria. Parties of traders and hunters covered all the waters of the Columbia river from head to mouth; fleets of bateaus, carrying up merchandize and bringing down furs, had their regular arrival and departure from Astoria. – Two more ships arrived from New York. Canton, the Sandwich Islands, New Archangel, the coast of New Caledonia, were visited by Mr. Astor’s ships. The Pacific Fur company was in full tide of success. – Astoria became the centre of an extended trade; her name became known to the world. This was notice to the world that an American colony was being founded on the Columbia, and no power in the wide world objected to it. It was before the Spanish treaty of 1819, and Spain did not object. It was after all the pretended claims of Great Britain, as now set up, and she did not object. Special notice had previously been given to the minister of Great Britain, and he had nothing to say against it. Special notice had already been given to the northwest company, and they invited to join in the enterprise as traders which they refused to do, because it was an American enterprise. Far from objecting to the settlement, they sent a special agent across the continent to stipulate with Mr. Astor’s agents that they should confine themselves to the valley of the Columbia, which arrangement was made. Special notice was given to our own government, its sanction obtained, and its protection solicited; and if protection, in the full sense of the word, was not promised, it was because it was felt to be impossible to send troops and ships there, in the event of a war, to prevent its falling into the hands of the British; but that it was to be protected, in the general sense of the word, was promised, as was proved at Ghent when peace came to be made.

Two years passed off in this way; Great Britain made no objection; her agent, the northwest company, agreed to our occupation of the whole valley; and acquiescence under these circumstances, becomes an admission of American title which forever closes the mouth of Great Britain.

In this manner the Columbia was settled by Mr. Astor; in this manner it was held by him for two years. Now for the manner in which it fell into the hands of Great Britain. Two years had eclipsed from the time of the foundation of Astoria, when intelligence arrived at that place with the news of war between the United States and Great Britain, and information of a departure of a ship of war from London to join the squadron under Commodor Hillyar, in the Pacific ocean, and proceed to capture Astoria as an important American colony. At the same time several partners of the Northwest company arrived at Astoria, confirmed the information of the British designs on the post, and offered to purchase all the stocks on hand, goods and furs, of Mr. Astor, as the only means of preventing them from becoming a prize of the British squadron. The agents of Mr. Astor sold under this duresse, receiving the fourth or fifth part of what the property was worth. Soon after a ship of war from Commodor Hillyar’s squadron arrived, took possession of the post without opposition, but with all the formalities of a British conquest, and with great shagrin to the officers at the loss of their expected booty. This is the manner in which the British got possession of Astoria, and with it the whole valley of the Columbia. As a British conquest they took it, as such they agreed to restore it under the treaty of Ghent. And thus, at the settlement of Astoria, and the occupation of the whole valley of the Columbia, the British government, by its silent acquiescence, admitted our unquestionable right to it. By seizing it as a British conquest; they admitted our title. Commodor Hillyar’s promise, as was proved at Ghent when peace came to be made.

Now for the proof of all that I have said.

I happen to have in my possession the book, of all others, which gives the fullest and most authentic details on all the points I have mentioned, and written at the same time and under circumstances when the author (himself a British subject, and familiar on the Columbia) had no more idea that the British would lay claim to that river than Mr. Harmon, the American writer whom I am quoted, ever thought of our claiming New Caledonia. It is the work of Mr. Franchere, a gentleman of Montreal, with whom I have the pleasure of being personally acquainted, and one of those employed by Mr. Astor in founding his colony. He was at the founding of Astoria at the sale of the Northwest Company; saw the place seized as a British conquest; and remained three years afterwards in the country, in the service of the Northwest company. He wrote in French: his work has not been done into English, though it well deserves it, and I read from the French text. He first gives a brief and true account of the discovery of the Columbia. He says:

"In 1792, Captain Gray, commanding the ship Columbia, of Boston, discovered the entrance of a large bay in 46 degrees 19 minutes of north latitude. He entered it; and finding by the fresh water which he found at little distance from its mouth, that it was a large river, he ascended it eighteen miles, and cast anchor along the left bank, at the entrance of a deep bay. He there drew up a chart of what he had discovered of this river and of the neighboring country; and, after having trafficked with the natives, (the object for which he came upon these coast,) he regained the sea; and soon after met Capt. Vancouver, who was sailing under the orders of the British government in search of discoveries. Capt. Gray made known to him the discovery which he had made, and even communicated the chart of it which he had drawn up. Vancouver sent his first lieutenant, Broughton, who ascended the river 118 miles; took possession of it in the name of his Britannic majesty; gave it the name of Columbia, and to the bay where Captain Gray had stopped the name of Gray's bay. Since this period the country has been much frequented, especially by Americans."

This brief and plain account of the discovery of the Columbia is valuable for showing: first, that we discovered the river; secondly, that we showed it to British navigators; and thirdly, that one of those to whom we showed it immediately claimed it as British property. We shall soon see that the British government, or its agents in these parts, the Northwest Company, gave no attention to this claim of Mr. Broughton, so little creditable to his candor and justice. Vancouver, like a man of honor, never claimed Capt. Gray's discovery, but assigned to him the entire credit of it, with thanks for his communication of it to himself.

The design of Mr. Astor's establishment is thus spoken of:

'Mr. John Jacob Astor, merchant of New York, who carried on alone the trade in furs to the south of the great lakes Huron and Superior, and who had acquired by this commerce a prodigious fortune, believed he could yet augment his fortune by forming on the banks of the Columbia an establishment, of which the entrepot should be at its mouth. He communicated his views to the agents of the Northwest Company; he wished even to make this establishment in concert with them; but after some negotiations, the wintering partners (les proprietaires hivernants) having rejected his propositions, Mr. Astor determined to make the attempt alone. It was essential to his success that he should have persons long accustomed to trade with the Indians, and he did not delay to find them. Mr. Alexander McKay, (the same who had accompanied Sir Alexander Mackenzie in his voyages,) a man bold and enterprising, joined him; and, soon after, Messrs. Duncan McDougall, Donald Mackenzie, (heretofore in the service of the Northwest Company,) David Stuart, and Robert Stuart, all of Canada, did the same. Finally, in the winter of 1810, Mr. Wilson Price Hunt, of St. Louis, on the Mississippi, having also joined them, they determined that the expedition should take place the following spring."

This shows a direct communication of Mr. Astor's design with the Northwest Company, and of their refusal to act in concert with him, because of the American character of the enterprise; also the reason why he employed many Canadians in his service. It was for the sake of having experienced traders to assist in conducting his business. It shows also that, among other Canadian gentlemen, he had employed Mr. Alexander McKay, the faithful companion of Sir Alexander Mackenzie in his expedition to the Pacific Ocean in 1793. This gentleman knew where Mackenzie's discoveries were, and whether Mr. Astor intended to trespass upon them. This then was the time to speak: on the contrary, the companion of Mackenzie goes on to assist in laying the foundation of the American colony on the Columbia.

Mr. Franchere proceeds:

"It is well to state that, during our sojourn in N. York, and before leaving that city, Mr. McKay believed it would be prudent to see Mr. Jackson, the minister plenipotentiary of his Britannic majesty, in order to inform him of the object for which he was about to embark, and to ask his advice as to what should do in case of a rupture between the two powers; intimating to him that we were all British subjects, and that we were going to trade under the American flag. After some moments' reflection, Mr. Jackson said to him, 'that we were going to form a mercantile establishment at the risk of our lives; that all he could promise us was, that in case of a war between the two powers, we should be respected as British subjects and traders.' – This answer appeared satisfactory, and Mr. McKay believed that he had nothing more to fear from that quarter."
This was in the year 1810 – seventeen years after the discoveries of Mackenzie, and eight years after Mr. Broughton took possession of the Columbia in the name of his Britannic majesty; and at this time the minister of Great Britain, on a special communication made to him of Mr. Astor’s design to occupy the Columbia, has not a word to say against it. Up to that time, it had not occurred to the British government that the Columbia river was theirs!

The ship Tonquin, carrying the maritime part of the expedition, arrived at the mouth of the Columbia, March 25th, 1811. The approaches to the coast revealed nothing but lofty ranges of mountains, white with snow, through a gap of which the great river of the west entered the sea. The weather was bad – the night dark – two boats had been swamped – no pilots, lights, or buoys – yet the captain (a rash man who afterwards blew up his ship at Nootka) entered safely, and anchored at midnight in a commodious harbor. On the 12th of April, after examining both sides of the bay for the best situation, a site was chosen on the south side, about four or five leagues from the sea, and the foundation of Astoria began – a name in itself the baget of American title. On the 15th of July, the young Astoria received an important visit, which is thus described:

"All was ready at the day appointed, (for an expedition to the interior,) and we were preparing to load the canoes when, towards mid-day, we saw a large canoe, carrying a flag, which was rounding the point called by us Tongue-Point. We were ignorant who they might be, for we did not look so soon for our people, who (as the reader may remember) were to cross the continent by the route which Captains Lewis and Clarke had followed in 1805, and winter for this purpose on the banks of the Missouri. Our uncertainty was soon banished by nearing of the canoe, which landed near a little quay which we had built to facilitate the unloading of our vessel. – The flag which this canoe carried was the British flag; and her crew amounted only to nine persons in all. A man, quite well dressed, and who appeared to command, leaped first to shore, and accosting us without ceremony, told us that he was named David Thompson, and was one of the proprietors of the Northwest Company. We invited him to ascend to our lodging, which was in one end of the shed, our house not yet being finished. After the usual hospitalities, Mr. Thompson told us that he had crossed the continent during the preceding winter; but that the desertion of a part of his men had obliged him to winter at the foot of the mountains near the head of the Columbia river; that in the spring he had built a canoe and had come to our establishment. He added that that the proprietors wintering in them had resolved to abandon all the posts which they had west of the mountains, rather than enter into competition with us, on condition that we would promise not to trouble them in the trade on the eastern side; and to sustain what he said, he produced a letter to Mr. William McGillivray to the same effect.

"Mr. Thompson kept, as it seemed to m, a regular journal, and traveled rather as a geographer than a trader in furs: he had a good quadrant; and during a sojourn of eight days, which he made at our establishment, he had occasion to make several astronomical observations."

This was a visit of great moment in the history of Astoria, and in the consideration of the British claim to the Columbia, which has been lately brought forward. Mr. Thompson was one of the N.W. Company, its astronomer, a gentleman of science and character, to whom we are greatly indebted for fixing important geographical positions in the interior of North America. He had crossed the continent from Montreal simultaneously with Mr. Astor’s land expedition from St. Louis, but in a higher latitude, and arrived a few days before it. He came to the Columbia to give the information to Mr. Astor’s agents that the Northwest Company, to avoid competitions with them, would abandon all their establishment west of the mountains, provided Mr. Astor would not interfere with them in the east. This proposal was agreed to. The valley of the Columbia was left to the free enjoyment of the Americans; and the extensions of the posts to the mountains went on without question according to the original intention. The Northwest Company, at that time, no more then the British government, had happened yet to take it into its head that the Columbia River, or any part of it was British property!

Mr. Astor’s agent proceeded to the establishment of the interior posts, and the dispatch of parties to hunt and trade up the Columbia to the mountains. – The Okanakan, about six hundred miles up, on the north side of the rive, and at the mouth of the river of that name, was the most considerable, and was remarkable for being nearest to the British establishments in New Caledonia; for by that name the valley and district of Frazer’s river was then known; and that was ten years before Mr. Harmon published his book. The Spokane, two hundred miles higher up, and on the south side, was established at the same time. The post on the Wahlamath, two hundred and fifty miles southwest from Astoria, was established the next year and of all these establishments Mr. Franchere gives a particular account, which is not necessary to read here. The country was, at the same time, completely penetrated by parties of traders and hunters, up to the headwaters of Clarke’s river, and Lewis’ river, and into the Rocky Mountains. Two years every thing had gone on without interruption, when two events occurred, in communicating which I will use Mr. Franchere’s own words:

“The 15th of January, 1813, Mr. Mackenzie arrived from his establishment, which he had abandoned after having cached part of his effects. He came to announce to us that war had been declared between Great Britain and the United States. This news had been brought to his post by some gentleman belonging to the Northwest Company, who had given him a letter containing the president’s proclamation to that effect.”

“On learning this news we strongly desired, that is, all of us at Astoria who were English and Canadians, to see ourselves in Canada: but we could not even permit ourselves to think of it, at least at present – we were separated from our country by an immense space, and the difficulties of travel were insurmountable at this season. We held then a sort of council of war, and, after having thoroughly weighed the crisis in which we found ourselves, after having considered seriously that although we were almost all British subjects, we nevertheless traded under the American flag, and that we could not expect assistance, all the ports of the United States being probably blockaded, we decided to abandon the establishment by the following spring, or in the beginning of the summer at furthest. We did not tell our engages of this resolve for fear that they might abandon thair work at once, but we stopped trading with the natives from that moment, as much because we were not provided with a large supply of merchandize, as that we had more furs than we could carry away.”

Here is as important fact stated, that of hearing of the war and despairing of protection from the United States. The agents of Mr. Astor, upon full consultation determined to abandon that country.

Mr. Franchere continues:

“Some days after Mackenzie’s departure, we perceived, to our great surprise, at the extremity of Tongue Point, two canoes carrying the British flag, and between them another bearing that of America. It was Mackenzie himself, who was returning with Messrs. J.G. McTavish and Angus Bethune, of the Northwest Company. He had met these gentlemen near the Rapids, and had determined to return with them to the establishment in consequence of the news which they had given him. They were on the light canoes, having left behind them Messrs. John Stuart and McMillan with a brigade of eight canoes loaded with furs.

“Mr. McTavish came up to our lodging and showed us a letter which had been written to him by Mr. A. Shaw, one of the agents of the Northwest Company. This gentleman announced to him in the letter that the ship Issac Todd had sailed from London in March in company with frigate Phoebe, and that they were coming by order of the government to take possession of our establishment – this establishment being represented to the lords of the admiralty as an important colony founded by the American government.

“The eight canoes which had been left behind having joined the first, a camp of nearly seventy-five men was formed at the little bay near our establishment. As they were without provisions we furnished them with what they needed; nevertheless we kept our guard for fear of some surprise from them, for we were much inferior to them in number.

“The season advancing, and their vessel not arriving caused them to find their situation very disagreeable; without provision and without merchandize to procure any from the natives, who looked on them with an evil eye, having good hunters but wanting ammunition. Tired of recurring incessantly to us for provisions, they proposed that we should sell them our establishment and its contents. Placed in the situation in which we were, in the daily expectation of seeing an English man of war appear to take away what we possessed, we listened to their proposition. We had several consultations; the negotiations grew wearily long; at length they agreed on the price of the furs and merchandize, and the treaty was signed by both parties on the 23rd of October. The gentlemen of the Northwest Company took possession of Astoria, having agreed to pay to each of the servants of the endevant Pacific Fur Company (a name chosen by Mr. Astor) the amount of their wages in full, deducted from the price of the goods we delivered to them, to feed them, and to furnish a passage gratis to those amongst them who wished to return to Canada.
“It was thus that, after having crossed seas and endured all sorts of fatigues and privations, I lost, in an instant, all my hope of fortune. I could not prevent myself from remarking that we should not look for such treatment from the British government, after the assurances we received from his majesty’s minister before we left New York. But as I have just said, the value of our trading post had been much exaggerated to the ministers; for if they had known it, they surely would not have taken offense at it, at least would not have judged it worthy of a maritime expedition.”

This is the manner in which the effects of Mr. Astor passed into the hands of the Northwest Company; this the manner in which they became installed in the valley of the Columbia. It was a purchase of goods and furs, and of the buildings which contained them, and nothing more. No one was childish enough to suppose that the sovereignty of the country was or could have been transferred as an appurtenance to the skins and blankets. We will now see how the British government obtained possession of the country.

“The 15th of November, 1813, Messrs. Alexander Stuart and Alexander Henry, both proprietors of the Northwest Company, arrived at the establishment in two bark canoes, manned by sixteen voyageurs. These gentlemen had left Fort William, on Lake Superior, in July. They lent us some Canadian newspapers, by which we learned that the British arms had up to that time kept the ascendancy. They also confirmed the news that the English frigate was to take our endevant establishment: they were even ver much surprised not to see the Isaac Todd in the harbour.

“On the morning of the 30th, we perceived a vessel which was doubling Cape Disappointment, and which soon anchored in Baker’s Bay. Not knowing if it was a friendly vessel or otherwise, we thought it prudent to send to it in a conoe Mr. McDougall, with those of the men who had been in the service of the endevant P.F.C, with the injunction to call themselves American if the ship was American, and English, if it was the contrary. Whilst they were on their way, Mr. McTavish had all the furs which were marked with the name of N.W.Co. packed upon two barges, which were at the fort, and remounted the river to Tongue Point, where he was to wait for a signal which we had agreed upon. Towards midnight Mr. Halsey, who had accompanied Mr. McDougall to the vessel, returned to the fort, and announced to us that it was the British sloop Raccoon, of 26 guns, and 120 men in her crew, Captain Black commanding. Mr. John McDonald, proprietor in the Northwest Company, had come as passenger in the Raccoon, accompanied by five engages. This gentleman had left England in the frigate Poebe, which had sailed with the Issac Todd as far as Rio de Janero. Having rejoined their English squadron, the admiral had given them for the convoy the sloop Raccoon and Cherub. These four vessels had sailed in company to Cape Horn, where they had separated after having agreed to meet at the island of Juan Fernandez. The three vessels of war did go there; but after having waited a long time in vain for the Issac Todd, Commodore Hillyar, who commandd the little squadron, having learned that the American Commodore Porter was doing great damage to the English commerce, especially among the whalers who frequented these seas, he resolved to go and find him and give battle; giving to Capt. Black orders to go and destroy the American establishment of the Columbia river. Consequently Mr. McDonald and his men had embarked on the Raccoon. This gentleman told us that they had endured the most terrible weather in doubling Cape Horn. He thought that if the Issac Todd had not slackened at some spot it would arrive in the river within a fortnight. At the agreed signal, Mr. McTavish returned to Astoria with his furs, and learned with much pleasure the arrival of Mr. McDonald.

“The first of December, the barge of the corvette came to the fort of Astoria with McDonald, and the first lieutenant, named sheriff. As there were on the Raccoon goods for the Northwest Company, a boat was sent to Baker’s Bay to bring them to the fort; but the weather was so bad and the wind so violent, that she did not return till the 12th with the goods, bringing also with Capt. Black five marines and four sailors.

“We regard our hosts with as much splendor as was possible. After dinner the captain had fire arms given to the company’s servants; and, we repaired, thus armed, to the platform by which we had erected a flag staff. There the captain took a British flag, which he had brought for the purpose, and had it hoisted to the top of the staff; and then taking a bottle full of Maderia, he broke it on the staff, declaring in a loud voice that he took possession of the establishment and the country in the name of his British majesty; and he changed the name of Astoria to that of Fort George. The Indian chiefs had been assembled to witness this ceremony, and I explained to them their own language what it meant. They fired three discharged of artillery and musket shot, and health of the king was drank according to the received "The vessel finding itself detained by the contrary winds, the captain had an exact survey made of the mouth of the river and the channel between Baker’s Bay and Fort George. The officers came frequently to see us and appeared to me generally to be very much discontented with their voyage; they had expected to meet several American vessels loaded with rich furs, and had calculated beforehand their share in the taking of Astoria. They had met nothing, and their astonishment was at its height when they saw our establishment had been transferred to the Northwest Company, and was under the British flag. It will be sufficient to quote Captain Black’s expression to show how much they were mistaken with regard to us. This captain landed in the night; when we showed him the palisades of the establishment in the morning, he asked if there was not another fort, and having learnt that there was not, he cried out with an air of the greatest astonishment, "What! Is this fort represented to me as formidable? Good God! I could batter it down with a four pounder in two hours!"

"The greater part of the Pacific Fur Company’s servants engaged themselves to the Northwest Company. Some others preferred returning to their country, and I was among the later. Nevertheless, Mr. McTavish having intimated to me that my services would be need at the establishment, I engaged myself for the space of five months, that is to say until the setting out of the party which was to ascend the river in the spring, to go to Canada, by way of the Rocky Mountains and the rivers of the interior. Messrs. John Stuart and Mackenzie left at the end of the month, the last to deliver over to the first the trading posts which had been established in the interior by the before mentioned company."

This is the way that the British got possession of the Columbia – as a conquest – accompanied by all the circumstances of a national act. The lords of the admiralty in London, charged with the naval operations of the war, plan the expedition, and plan it against the colony of Mr. Astor, and against it as an important American colony. They dispatched a ship of war from London to join the squadron in the Pacific to attack the colony. A ship from the squadron arrives; finds the goods and furs sold; is enraged at the loss of the booty, but finds the American sovereignty of the country remaining in the form of a little fort; takes possession of it as a British conquest; runs up the British flag; christens it in a bottle of rum; and agents are sent off to the Okenakane, the Spokane, and Wahlamath, to deliver up the dependent posts, and with them the whole valley of the Columbia; as a conquest the British took it; as a conquest they held it; as a conquest they agreed to restore it under the Ghent treaty. And here I will answer a question which has been put to me: Does the fight of restoration extend to the whole valley of the Columbia river, or only to the post at the mouth of the river? I answer, the whole valley; and, to parley about anything less is to suffer ourselves to be bamboozled and distracted.

I here cease my readings from Mr. Franchere, satisfied that, upon his testimony, I have made out the fullest and most authentic case of unqualified British admissions, by acts, of our title to the Columbia. To these admissions, by acts I will now add admissions by words. For it so happens that at the time of the negotiations of 1823, at the time we were offering fifty-five for a southern, the parallel of forty-nine was the most southern one to which her claims extended. This was understood and agreed upon by both parties in 1818, 1820, and 1823, and here is the evidence of it in documents of unimpeachable authority. I read first from Mr. Adams to Mr. Rush, July 22nd, 1823:

"Previous to the restoration of the settlement at the mouth of the Columbia river in 1818, and again upon the first introduction in congress of the plan for constituting a territorial government there, some disposition was manifested by Sir Charles Bagot and Mr. Canning (minister in Washington) to dispute the right of the U. States to that establishment, and some vague intimations was given of British claims on the Northwest coast. The restoration of that place, and the convention of 1818, were considered as a final disposal of Mr. Bagot’s objections; and Mr. Canning declined committing to paper those which he had intimates in conversation."

Two dates and a great fact are here mentioned, with both of which I was contemporary, and, my writings of the time prove, not an inattentive observer. The nominal restoration of the Columbia, which was, infact, an empty ceremony, and the non-execution of the Ghent treaty, in favor of the west, as it had happened before the non-execution of treaties which required the British western ports to be given up. That is one date. The introduction of Dr. Floyd’s Oregon bill in the house of representatives, in 1820-’21, is another of those dates, and of which I know something. The great fact is, and my speech of 1824 will show that I knew something of that, is the vague intimation of British claims to the Columbia at that time, the refusal of the minister to write them down, and their utter and entire
This was done by Mr. Canning, the prime minister of Great Britain, to Mr. Rush, in London, in 1823, of which Mr. Rush’s dispatch of the 19th January, 1824, bears witness. Here it is:

"It was an omission in me not to have stated in my communication of the 6th instant what are to be the aims of Great Britain on the northwest coast of America, though as yet Mr. Canning has not made them known to me formally. She will claim, I understand, a point northwards above 55, though how much above I am not able to say, and southwards as low down as 49. Whether he designs to push a claim to the whole of this space with earnestness, I am also unable as yet to say, but wait the more full and accurate disclosure of her views."

Thus on the nineteenth day of January, in the year 1824, the parallel of forty-nine was the furthest south to which the British minister, Mr. Canning – a minister of head, and for forty years’ experience in public affairs – proposed to push the British claim.

After this authentic and express admission of Mr. Canning, the prime minister of Great Britain in 1824, it is hardly excusable to have recourse to secondary of inferior testimony, however persuasive or convincing that testimony may be. But I have still a piece of British testimony in hand sufficiently respectable to be quoted after Mr. Canning, and sufficiently coincident in time and terms to identify the minister’s answer with public opinion of the time, that the extent of the British claims stated to Mr. Rush in January, 1824, was the opinion of the public as well as of the minister. It is found in the London Quarterly Review, October number, 1822. It is in discussing the boundaries of New Caledonia, for which he proposes on the south the line of the Lake of the Woods to the sea:

"Another river, called the Caledonia, (Frazer’s.) holding a parallel course to the Tacoutche Tesse, (Columbia,) falls into the sea near the Admiralty Inlet of Vancouver, in latitude 48, and forms a natural boundary between the new territory (Western Caledonia) and that of the United States, and falling in precisely with a continued line with the same parallel with the Lake of the Woods, and leaving about two degrees of latitude between it and the Columbia."

So said the Quarterly Review in January, 1822, No. 72, article “Western Caledonia.”

I sat out to establish, upon the admission of Great Britain herself, our right to the Columbia river and its valley. I have done more. I have established her admission to the line of 49, giving us near three degrees on the coast, the valuable waters about the Straits of Fuca and Puget’s Sound, and the whole Olympic district, no part of all which is in the valley of the Columbia.

We thus see that, in 1824, the British government, by authentic acts, and by the language of Mr. Canning, admitted our right to the river and valley of the Columbia; and, what was better, limited their claim to 49 – At the same time we see that the two governments were of accord, and the question is, why they did not agree. The documents furnished the answer to this question, and a strange answer it is. Nothing else than a love of partnerships, and a desire to go into partnership with Russia and Great Britain in the use of all the country beyond the Rocky Mountains, each enjoying the use of the whole in common with others, and the title to remain in abeyance. The Emperor of Russia, like a wise man, declined all share in this mixed concern, got his own part laid off to himself, and has enjoyed it ever since in peace and quietness. The British government, like another wise man, accepted our proposal, went into partnership with us, took the use of the whole to herself, and now claims it as her own. We were only unwise in the transaction, and our improvidence, so visible to every body now, seen only by myself then, evidently resulted from the under-estimate of the country, which was then so universal. By our proposal of partnership, we prevented the settlement of the boundary, and put a power stronger than ourselves in possession of our property – a power which has kept it so long that it begins to dream that it is its own; and now we are raising fleets and armies, and preparing to set the four corners of the world on fire, to get him out again. I had the vanity to denounce it the day I first heard of it, in the year 1818, and thought I was doing something. I even published my denunciation in articles which I deem quite sensible, and expected to make a great sensation. On the contrary, not one responsive note was obtained from the thousand newspapers which the United States contained; and I found myself as solitary then in advance of the public as I am now behind it.

I trust that I have made good our title, and that upon British admissions, to the
"Resolved, That it is not expedient for the government of the United States to treat with his Britannic majesty in reference to their territorial claims and boundaries west of the Rocky Mountains, upon the basis of a joint occupation by the citizens of the United States and subjects of Great Britain of the country claimed by each power.

"Resolved, That it is expedient for the government of the United States to treat with his Britannic majesty in reference to their said claims and boundaries, upon the basis of a separation of interests, and the establishment of the 49th degree of north latitude as a permanent boundary between them, in the shortest possible time."

It was in a session of the 1827-'28, and before the ratification of the second partnership convention – the one we are now determined to get rid of even at the price of war – and with the view of preventing the ratification of that convention, that this resolution was submitted. It presented my view of the settlement of this question, namely, no partnerships, the immediate establishment of a boundary, and the 49th parallel for that boundary. They are my views now; and, having said enough against partnerships, and enough in favor of setting upon some line, I go on to give my reasons in favor of that of forty-nine.

It is the line which parts, more suitably than a line following their highlands could do it, the valleys of the Columbia and of Frazer's river, saving to us all our discoveries and settlements beyond the Rocky Mountains, and leaving to the British the whole of theirs. It is a continuation of the line on this side of the mountains – a line which happens to conform to the geographical features of the continent on this side of the mountains, and equally so on the other. On this side, it parts the two systems of waters, one of which belongs to the valley of the Mississippi, and the other to the basin of Hudson's Bay; on the other side, it parts the system of waters which belong to the valley of the Columbia from those which belong to Frazer's river, cutting off the heads of a few streams, of about equal value on each hand. It is the line of Utrecht – a line which will now be denied but by few – and to which few, nothing more on this point will ever be said by me. It is the line of right, resulting from the treaty of Utrecht; and as such, always looked to, in the early stages of this controversy, by American statesmen, as the ultimate line of settlement and boundary between the countries. It is the line of right, resulting from the said treaty of Utrecht, up to which Mr. Adams, in his dispatch to Mr. Middleton, of July 19, 1823, alleged an "unquestionable title" to extend; for only upon that treaty could a line of "unquestionable title" be averred. – On any other basis, it could only be a line of convention – a conventional line of mutual agreement; and Mr. Adams was not a man to confound two things so different in their nature. It is the best line for us; for it gives us all the waters of Puget's Sound and Bellingham's Bay – I do not say the Straits of Fuca; (for those straits, like all the other great straits of the world, are part of the high seas, and incapable of self-appropriation by any nation) it gives us these waters and with them the picture sque and the fertile square, of more than an hundred miles every way, lying between the Straits of Fuca and the Columbia, and between the Pacific coast and the Cascade range of mountains, and on which Mount Olympus, near the centre, is the crowning ornament, and from which the whole district derives its classic name of Olympic.

All this the line of the treaty of Utrecht gives us, which the line of the valley of the Columbia would not; for that river has no valley at its mouth, and enters the sea through a gap in the iron-bound coast. The valley of that river is a fan expanded, the spreading part in the Rocky Mountains, the handle in the sea. It is the best line for the British, for it gives them the upper part of the north fork of the Columbia, where it heads opposite the Athabasca and Saskatchewan – British rivers and covered by British posts – and from all which the valley of Frazer's river would be cut off from communication if the head of the Columbia remained in our hands, just as Halifax was cut off from Quebec by the northern waters of the St. John's. Thus, the line of right – the line of Utrecht – is the best for both parties, giving to each what is convenient and necessary to it, (for the triangle at the head of the Columbia is as necessary to them as the Olympic square is to us,) and taking from each a detached district, of little value except for annoyance. The British could annoy us in the Olympic district; we could annoy them at the head of the Columbia; but why do it, except upon principle of laying eggs to hatch further disputes? Upon the machiavellian principle of depositing the seeds of a new contestion while assuming to settle the mischiefs of an old one? Forty-nine is the line which Mr. Jefferson proposed in 1807, as I have shown heretofore to the senate. It is the line of which Mr. Gallatin and Mr. Rush said in 1818:

"The forty-ninth degree of north latitude had, in pursuance of the treaty of Utrecht, been fixed, indefinitely, as the line between the British northern possessions and those of France, including Louisiana, now a part of our territories. There was no reason why, if the two countries extend their claims westward, the same line should not be continued to the Pacific Ocean. So far as the discovery gives a claim, ours to the whole country on the waters of the Columbia river was indisputable.

It is the line of all the American statesmen, without exception, twenty and forty years ago. It was the line of Mr. Canning in 1823. It is the line for the rejection of which by Mr. Parkenham, without reference to his government, Sir Robert Peel has lately, and publicly, and in the face of the world, expressed regret. It is a line which we have never presented as an ultimatum; which we have often proposed gently, and which the British have as often gently shoved aside, because they saw, from our own coetaneous propositions, that they could do better, and get the whole, at least for a long time, under our own delusive project of joint usufruction. But now all this gentle and delusive work is done with. The joint use is to terminate – events advance – and the question must be settled now by reason and judgment, or it will soon settle itself by chance and arms. Forty-nine is the line of right with me; and, acting upon the second half of the great maxim, submit to nothing wrong! I shall submit to no invasion or encroachment upon that line.

Senators may now see the reason why, for twenty-five years, I have adhered to the line of Utrecht. It is the line of right, which gives to us the Olympic district and it invaluable waters, and secures to us the river and valley of the Columbia. It is the fighting line of the United States. The Union can be rallied on that line. [JCB].

NNR 70.240 expenses of the war, need for action to raise funds, lack of funds for purchasing supplies at New Orleans

FINANCIAL – National Expenses – During a discussion in the U.S. Senate on Friday last week, Mr. Webster intimated that he had learned, very much to his astonishment, that the expenses of the government at present amounted to very near half a million of dollars per day.

On Monday, Mr. Sevier, in reference to that remark, stated, that the daily expenditures of the army and navy, amounted to $106,000 only.

Mr. WEBSTER, in explanation of his statement, replied, that he did not refer to the expences of the army and navy proper, alone, but including that of the volunteers – and the vast changes for transportation provisions, munitions, and other expences incident to the war, the amount of which altogether he has ascertained from good authority, fell but little short of half a million dollars per day.

Although prepared by some examination, for a large announcement on this score, this exceeds our worst apprehensions. If it be but half true, it is full time that Mr. SECRETARY WALKER were bestirring himself in looking out ways and means t meet drafts upon his department. – Be it remembered too, that this amount of expenditures is for the army now in the field, say some 10 or 12,000 men at most, and they yet within our realm. What amount will be requisite when the army shall number 35,000 men, as is contemplated, and have to be provided with stores and munitions some five hundred to a thousand miles within an enemy’s country? To count the cost, and be provided with ways and means to sustain the cost, is the first consideration with Statesmen, in proposing a foreign war.

The New Orleans correspondent of the New York Courier, writing under date of the 26th ult. Says – "Would you believe it, that up to the mail of today inclusive, the quartermaster general at this place is still without funds, and the treasury with 6 or $800,000 lying to its credit in the deposit banks of this city!!! The state has already advanced $150,000. – The banks, on their own responsibility, and without any security, have advanced largely. Large amounts are due by the quartermaster all over the city, for supplies of ever kind that have been purchased not only for the volunteers but also for the regular army, for which he is unable to pay, and without all these aids and means nothing could have been done to reinforce general Taylor or even send him supplies, and yet though they had known at Washington for some eight or ten days of the crisis that had occurred, and the exertions that were making here, yet this criminal neglect is exhibited as to placing means at the disposal of the proper officers which they must have known would be so vitally necessary. [JCB]

NNR 70.240 naval operations on the Mexican coast

The latest intelligence from the army is by the steamer Alabama, which took out 458 soldiers, and reached Brazos Bar on the 28th ult. The same evening, at 8 o’clock, it commenced blowing a heavy gale, and at 11 o’clock it increased to a completer hurricane, which caused both anchors to drag from 70 into 3 fathoms of water.

The following is the list of vessels in the harbor, and blown ashore at Brazos Bar:
steamer Col. Harney, ashore, will be got off; steamer Augusta, ashore badly; schr.
The pilot boat L.H. Hitchcock reported to be lost in the same gale.

Vessels at Brazos. Steamers Monmouth, Sea, and Florida; a barque from Galveston with troops, name unknown; brig Apalachicola; schrs. Water Witch, Wm. Bryan, Ellen and Clara, Enterprise, Cornelia, Southerner, and Arista – also, a ship off the bar waiting to be discharged, name unknown.

The only U.S. vessel off the point was the schooner Flirt.

The Alabama left Brazos on the 1st inst. Gen. Taylor was still at Matamoros, waiting for reinforcements.

Major Lear, who crossed the country from Fort Jesup, and for whose safety fears were entertained, had reached the camp in safety.

Col. McIntosh was alive yet, and hopes are entertained of his recovery. Capt. Page is recovering.

Capt. Saunders, engineer, and Cols. Winthrop and Z. Lyons, attached to General Taylor’s staff, came on board the Alabama as passengers, and took at Balize, Capt.
Major and A Maretta – also, the following sick and wounded officers from the army:
Lieut. Arthur, 2d artillery, Lieuts. Gates and McClay and Capt. Kells, 8th infantry,
Lieut. Stevens, 5th infantry. [JCB]

NNR 70.240 attack on Capt. John Charles Fremont threatened by Don Jose Castro

LIEUT. COL. FREMONT. The navy department have received letters from Monterey, dated 18th April. Lieut. Fremont having been ordered by Don Jose Castro to quit California, and expecting an attack, fortified himself, and thus apprised the American consul at Monterey of his purposes.

“MY DEAR SIR: - I this moment have received your letters, and without waiting to read them, acknowledge the receipt which the courier requires instantly. I am making myself as stong as possible, in the intention that if we are unjustly attacked, we will fight to extremity and refuse quarter, trusting to our country to avenge our death. No one has reached my camp; and from the heights we are able to see troops (with the glass) mustering at Saint John’s, and preparing cannon. I thank you for your kindness and good wishes, and would write more at length as to my intentions, did I not fear that my letter will be intercepted. We have in no wise done wrong to the people or to the authorities of the country; and if we are hemmed in and assaulted, we will die, every man of us, under the flag of our country.

Very truly, yours,
J.C. FREMONT

“P.S. – I am encamped on the top of the Sierra, at the headwaters of a stream, which strikes the road to Monterey, at the house of D. Joaquin Gomez. J.C.F.”

Castro assembled about 100 men in front of the entrenchments. After remaining there three days, he concluded to retreat, when it was discovered that the party had quietly gone off, leaving some old saddles and trash which the Californians had magnified into munitions of war. Three hundred riflemen offered their services to Capt. F., but they were declined.

The movement against Lieut. Fremont seems to have been directed by the central government of Mexico; but it is not believed that the people of California entertained an ill-will towards him, or would willingly have done him harm. His own conduct in the whole matter seems to have been marked alike by courage and discretion. [JCB]

NNR 70.240 demand on ships for freights at New Orleans

FREIGHTS – NEW ORLEANS TRADE. – The Bulletin of the 1st inst. proceeds to account for the high rate of freights at that port, on other grounds, than that of an apprehension of losing their vessels in the war with Mexico – They say: - "On Tuesday last there were nine ships and eight barks less in port than at the same time last year; while the excess of receipts this year over last; would supply cargoes for two or three hundred vessels. We state them, in round numbers, as follows: -

5,531,000 lbs. bulk pork and bacon; 133,000 bbls. beef & pork; 25,000 tiersce of beef; 11,000 hhds, Pork, Hams and Bacon; 50,000 bbls. lard; 71,000 kegs do.; 559,000 bushels corn; 140,000 bbls. corn, in ears; 218,000 bbls. & sk.wheat; 261,000 do flour, 40,000 bushels oats, 18,000 bbls. whiskey, 3,000 hhds. tobacco; 22,000 pks. buffalo robes; 72,000 bales cotton.

The weight of the above cannot be short of 256 millions of pounds, making 114,223 tons, and requiring to transport it about 250 ships; of average size. We repeat, New Orleans offers a golden harvest to the shipping interest. [JCB]

NNR 70.240 Catholic Chaplains

CATHOLIC CHAPLAINS. As many rumors are in circulation respecting the Catholic chaplains to be sent to the army of occupation, we think that we would be doing a favor to our readers be stating briefly what we know on the subject from the best authority. A request was communicated to the superior of the Society of Jesus in Maryland, through two Catholic prelates, on the part of the United States government, that he should appoint two clergymen to go as chaplains to the army in Texas. – The request was laid before several bishops then on a visit in Georgetown College, and the principal clergymen attached to that institution. It was the unanimous opinion that it should be acceded to. Fathers McElroy and Rey were then proposed as proper persons to fill the office. All present approved of their nomination. – On the same day the superior, accompanied by two bishops, waited upon the secretaries of war and state, and had a full understanding with them. The two gentlemen are expected to depart for the army next week. [Catholic Herald]

NNR 70.241 The State of National Finances

THE STATE OF NATIONAL FINANCES. The message of the president, in compliance with the call of the senate, as to his views on ways and means, and the treasury estimates under a state of war with Mexico, are inserted in a following page. It will be seen that the deficiency of means under existing laws would be many millions. His principal reliance for improving the revenue is, by diminishing the duties payable upon importations, so as to induce a much larger importation of foreign goods. The effect would be, according to our notion, to distress the community in far greater proportion than it would relieve the government. True, perhaps, the government could get the duties, but so sure as it did the people would have the goods, thus flooded upon them, to pay for. Their prospect of paying forty or fifty millions more to Europeans per annum, for importations, than they now have to pay them, would be rather an embarrassing task, at the present prices for our produce. That it could be done, we verily do not believe. That the attempt would at once drain the country of its specie – and then spread ruin over the land, similar to what we have recently experienced, is most seriously to be dreaded.

There is no suggestion for sustaining the national credit beyond the brief period which the president seems to contemplate the present war with Mexico will be confined to. Should that war unhappily be procrastinated – a case certainly within the scope of possibilities, another year would find, according to the project submitted, an empty treasury – temporary expecients exhausted, and a resort to heavy direct taxation to retrieve credit, inevitable.

That a reduction of duties would increase the revenues, except for the moment, is extremely problematical. A sufficient flood of foreign goods would probably be inundated to prostrate our own establishments. Then would come the pinch of poverty. We could no longer import because we could no longer pay, and would have no credit left except by showing that we had provided sufficient taxes to meet the interest loans that would be required. NNR 70.241 offer of British ministers to mediate differences between the United States and Mexico

MEDIATION OFFERED. As a matter of course, when it was decided in the British cabinet to settle their own dispute with the United States amicably, they would become anxious for an immediate termination of the war between the United States and Mexico, otherwise they could hardly hope to keep Europe out of the fray. The question in the cabinet, as to offering the terms which Mr. Pakenham has offered, and which have been acceded to, was decided by a majority of but one vote, Mr. Peel, the minister, voted in the negative, though he acquiesced on finding a majority against him. Had the declaration of war against Mexico been received, Mr. McLane is said to have expressed his conviction that no such terms would have been offered. Having been made, the British cabinet now offer their friendly interference as mediators for a peace between the United States and Mexico, through Mr. Pakenham, and have dispatched a similar proposition to Mexico. NNR 70.242 June 20, 1846 Mexico, revolutionary movement in favor of Santa Anna, Vera Cruz blockade, neutral powers protest blockade.

Revolutionary Movements. Mazatlan and Tepec, principal ports on the Pacific, have declared against Paredes, and in favor of the return of Santa Anna.

The heavy demands made on the departments and on the clergy for funds had rendered Paredes unpopular. The death of the archbishop, was a death blow to the monarchical scheme, of which he was the main stay. The federalists of themselves, were not in sufficient force to contend with Paredes, but united with Santa Anna's adherents they would be an overmatch for him. Santa Anna and Almonte were expected at Vera Cruz, from Cuba

Our latest dates are from the Havana Diario del Marina, of June 9, containing Vera Cruz dates of June 1.

The consuls of neutral powers had protested against the Unites States blockade of the port, issued 20th May. Many families were leaving the city for the interior. Affairs were as in 1838, when blockaded by the French, except that the acts is in better condition. There are, including the water battery lately constructed, 200 pieces of heavy ordinance bristling from its portholes. Bravo, who commands, is a generous and liberal as well as a brave man.

The Mexican Congress, assembled on the 27th May. Bustamente, (ex-president) was elected to preside. [AEK]

NNR 70.243 Dr. William Maxwell Wood, bearer of dispatches from the Pacific squadron, passing through Mexico, meets and forwards to Com. John Drake Sloat intelligence of the war

The Steam frigate Mississippi, arrived at Pensacola on the 8th from Vera Cruz, bringing Dr. Wood, U.S.N. bearer of dispatches to the government from the Pacific squadron, who passes through Mexico without interruption. At the post office at Guadalaxara, he met the news of the capture of Captain Thornton, near Matamoros, and immediately employed a trusty person to take intelligence to Commodore Sloat, at Mazatlan, who would probably receive the intelligence five days in advance of the Mexicans, who had not expressed the intelligence. J. Parrott, Consul at Mazatlan, accompanied him. They left Mazatlan on the 30th of April, were at Guadalaxara on the 9th of May, and their express was expected to have reached Mazatlan again, by the 17th of May. [JCB]

NNR 70.255 report of taking of Matamoros

*Headquarters of the army of occupation,
May 18, 1846.*

Sir: I have the honor to report that my very limited means for crossing rivers prevent a complete prosecution of the victory of the 9th instant. A pontoon train, the necessity of which I exhibited to the department last year, would have enabled the army to cross on the evening of the battle, take this city, with all the artillery and stores of the enemy, and a great number of prisoners – in short, to destroy entirely the Mexican army. But I was compelled to await the arrival of heavy mortars, with which to menace the town from the left bank, and also the accumulation of small boats. In the meantime, the enemy had somewhat recovered from the confusion of his flight, and ought still with his 3,000 left him, to have made a respectable defense. I made every preparation to cross the river above the town, while Lieut. Col. Wilson made a diversion on the side of Barita, and the order of march was given out for 1 o’clock yesterday, from the camp near Fort Brown, when I was waited upon by General Reguena, empowered by General Arista, commanding in chief the Mexican forces, to treat for an armistice until the government should finally settle the question. I replied to this, that an armistice was out of the question, that a month since I had proposed one to General Ampudia, which was declined; that circumstances were now changed; that I was receiving large reinforcements, and could not now suspend operations which I had not initiated or provoked; that the possession of Matamoros was a sine qua non; that our troops would occupy the town; but that General Arista might withdraw his forces, leaving the public property of every description.

An answer to the above was promised in the afternoon, but none came, and I repaired at sundown to join the army, already in position at a crossing some two miles above the town. Very early this morning the bank was occupied by about two 18 pounders and three batteries of field artillery – and the crossing commenced – the light companies of all the battalions were first thrown over, followed by the volunteer and regular cavalry. No resistance was made, and I was soon informed from various quarters, that Arista had abandoned the town with all his troops the evening before, leaving only the sick and wounded. I immediately dispatched a staff officer to the prefect to demand surrender; and in the meantime, a commission was sent by the prefect to confer with me on the same point.

I gave assurances that the civil rights of the citizens would be respected, and our troops at once dropped down opposite the town and crossed at the “upper ferry,” the American flag being displayed at “Fort Paredes,” a Mexican redoubt near the crossing. The different corps are now encamped in the outskirts of the city. To-morrow I shall make suitable arrangements for the occupation of the town, and for taking possession of the public property. – More than three hundred of the enemy’s wounded have been left in the hospitals. Arista is in full retreat towards Monterey with the fragments of his army.

I deeply regret to report that Lieut. George Stevens, a very promising young officer of the second dragoons, was accidentally drowned this morning while attempting to swim the river with his squadron.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

Z.TAYLOR,

To the ADJUNT GENERAL of the army

Headquarters army of occupation,
SIR: On the 26th of April, I had occasion to advise the department that hostilities had actually broken out, and that in consequence I had found it necessary to use the authority with which I was vested, and call upon the governors of Louisiana and Texas for a force, each, of four regiments. The eight regiments thus called for would make a force of nearly 5,000 men, which I deemed sufficient to meet the wants of service in this quarter.

At the same time that I wrote to the governor of Louisiana requesting this volunteer force, I addressed a letter to gen. Gaines, desiring him to assist in organizing these regiments and having them promptly supplied. In my communication to the governor, the organization was very exactly proscribed, being that indicated from your office on the 25th of August, 1845. I find, however, that this organization has been exceeded, and, moreover, that gen. Gaines has called for many more volunteers than I deemed necessary, extending the call to other states besides Louisiana.

It will, of course, be for the government to decide whether the future operations in this quarter will require the amount of force (entirely unknown) which is coming hither. I only desire to say, that this reinforcement, beyond the eight regiments mentioned above, was never asked for by me, and that in making the call of the 26th of April, I well knew that if the Mexicans fought us at all, it would be before the arrival of the volunteers. It was for the purpose of clearing the river, and performing such further service as the government might direct, that I thought it proper to ask for reinforcements.

It is extremely doubtful whether the foot regiment from Texas can be raised, and I shall desire the governor, who is expected here, to suspend the call for them. None of the mounted companies, except Capt. Price’s, already in service, have reported to me.

I fear that the volunteers have exhausted the supply of tents deposited in New Orleans for the use of this army. We are greatly in want of them; and I must request that immediate measures be taken to send direct to Brazos Santiago, say 1,000 tents, for the use of the army in the field. The tents of the 7th infantry were cut up to make sandbags during the recent bombardment of Fort Brown.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your ob’t servant,

The ADJUTANT GENERAL of the army,
Washington, D.C.

Extracts from a dispatch from General Taylor, dated, "Matamoros, May 21, 1846.
"Our future movements must depend, in a great degree, on the extent to which the Rio grande is navigable for steamboats, and I fear that my expectations in this particular will not be realized. – Though, at times, navigable as high as Camargo, or even Mier, it is doubtful whether a boat can now be pushed higher than Remosa. Indeed, the “Neva,” which is in the river, and accompanied the expedition under General Smith, has not yet reached this place, though hourly expected.

I shall lose no time in ascertaining the practicability of the river for steamboats and shall occupy Reinosa, and such other points as a boat may be able to reach.

“All the cavalry (regular and irregular) of the army, under command of Lieut. Col. Garland, is in pursuit of the retreating army, to harass its rear, and capture prisoners and baggage. We have no authentic intelligence from the lieutenant colonel since his departure. Deserters are, however, coming in from the Mexicans.

“Lieut. Col. Wilson’s battalion, 1st infantry, with some 200 volunteers, was at barita on the 17th, and has since been reinforced by Gen. Smith, with about 700 Louisiana volunteers. This column is ordered to move up the right bank of the river, and I look hourly for its arrival.

A large amount of public stores, chiefly ordnance, has been found concealed in this town. We are gradually recovering it from the places where it was hidden. Two field pieces, several hundred muskets, and 200 shells are among the articles recovered.

Headquarters of the army of occupation, City of Matamoros, May 24, 1846. SIR: I have to report the arrival this day of gen. Smith, with the battalion of the 1st infantry, the Washington regiment of Louisiana volunteers, and a company of volunteers from Mobile. Another regiment of Louisiana volunteers is below, and will probably arrive this evening or tomorrow. This command was accompanied from the mouth of the river by the steamboat Neva, which succeeded without difficulty in reaching this place.

Lieut. Col. Garland returned on the 22nd from his expedition in pursuit of the retreating army. He succeeded in capturing a small rear party, after a trifling skirmish in the night, in which a man, and unfortunately a woman, were killed on the Mexican side, and two men slightly wounded on our own. – He pursued the route of the army for sixty miles and then returned agreeably to his instructions. – The scarcity of water and condition of his horse made it useless to proceed farther.

I would respectfully solicit instructions as to the disposition to be made of certain property captured in the camp of Gen. Arista. A pavilion and several pieces of massive plate are among the articles. His clothing, and other property purely personal, have been deposited in the city with a view of being returned to him. I would suggest that the pavilion be sent to Washington, to be disposed of as the president may direct.

The recovery of ordnance and other public stores still continues here. Two pieces of cannon have been taken from the river, and small arms in considerable numbers have been taken in the town.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

Z. TAYLOR,
brevet brig. General U.S.A. commanding.

The ADJUTANT GENERAL of the army,

Washington D.C.

FROM THE HOME SQUADRON. We subjoin a copy of the instructions of Commodore Conner to the commanders of vessels in the home squadron, showing the principles to be observed in the blockade of the Mexican ports. The ports already under blockade, are Vera Cruz, Tampico, and Alvarado:

INSTRUCTIONS to be observed by officers commanding vessels of the home squadron, in enforcing the blockade of ports of the east coast of Mexico.

1. No neutral vessel, proceeding towards the entrance of a blockaded port, shall be captured or detained, if she shall not previously have received from one of the blockading squadron, a special notification of the existence of the blockade. This notification shall be, moreover, inserted in writing on the muster roll of the neutral vessel by the cruiser which meets her, and it shall contain the announcement, together with the statements of the day, and the latitude in which it was made.

2. Neutral vessels which may be already in the port before the blockade of it, shall have full liberty to depart, with or without cargo, fifteen days after that upon which the blockade is established.

3. The ports of Vera Cruz and Tampico will remain entirely free for the entrance and departure of neutral non-commercial mail packets.

Mexican boats engaged exclusively in fishing, on any part of the coast, will be allowed to pursue their labors unmolested.

In its present political condition, the flag of Yucatan is to be respected.

D. CONNOR, commanding home squadron. United States ship Cumberland, Off Brazos Santiago, May 14, 1846.

EXTRACT of a letter from Commodore Connor, dated "May 28, 1846."
"On the morning of the 18th, a detachment of nearly two hundred seamen and mariners from the Cumberland and Potomac, under the command of Captain Aulick, in the boats of the two vessels, entered the Del Norte to co-operate with a detachment from the army, under the command of Lieut. Col. Wilson, for the purpose of establishing a post at Barita, on the right bank of the river, about fifteen miles from its mouth. This was accomplished without opposition.

"On the same day (it appears) our army crossed the river and took possession of matamoros, the Mexican army having abandoned it on the day previous in the greatest confusion and disorder. There being no longer and occasion for the services of our men on shore, Captain Aulick returned on board on the 20th." [JCB]

NNR 70.256 exhibit of force of the Gulf Squadron, unlikelihood of successful attack on Veracruz

THE LEXINGTON, sloop of war now at the Brooklyn Naval yard, has been converted into a store ship, and will leave in a few days for the Pacific with supplies for the Navy, under command of Lieut. T. Baily, partially armed – having 6 or 8 guns and 80 men.

The Gulf Squadron. The following is said to be a correct statement of the whole naval force in the gulf:

Three frigates, 156 guns, 1440 crew; Three sloops 66 guns, 600 crew; One steamer, 10 guns, 235 crew; One steamer, 10 guns, 166 crew; Three brigs, 30 guns, 240 crew. Eleven vessels, 292 guns, 2681 crew.

The aggregate of the crews of these vessels is full one-third of our naval force, as restricted by law to 7,500 seamen, &c..

A number of revenue Cutters, small steamers, and other vessels of light draft have recently been ordered to the gulf and will be serviceable, but the entire force is considered altogether inadequate to attempt an attack upon Vera Cruz.

A letter from an officer in the United States Navy, dated at Pensacola, May 30, says: - We shall probably sail, as soon as we are provisioned, for Vera Cruz, but I doubt if any attack will be made on the castle, as they have prepared it so well for defense; and if their practice should be equal to the fire on Gen. Taylor’s camp they would sink the whole of our navy. When the French attacked the castle, there were only twenty-five guns of small caliber at the point of attack; they have now over two hundred pieces, thirteen mortars, and Paixhan guns in quantities, on new batteries, at the same point, and one of our engineer officers says that if they were served well no fleet could ever make any impression. NNR 70.256 rumors of a British offer of mediation between the United States and Mexico

The English papers state that Mr. McLane and his lady were among the congratulatory callers upon the queen – of course Mr. McLane has recovered from his severe illness.

General Armstrong, Consul for the U. States at Liverpool, came passenger in the Great Western, on a visit to the United States. He is announced in N. York papers as the bearer of important dispatches from Mr. McLane.

Among the recent appointments by the President, confirmed by the senate was that of Mr. Thos G. Reynolds, as Secretary of Legion at Madrid.

Mr. Parrott, U.S. Consul at Mazatlan, and Dr. Wood of U.S. Navy, bearer of dispatches from the American squadron on the Pacific, passed through Mexico, to Vera Cruz and reached Pensacola, in about twenty-two days from Mazatlan. At Vera Cruz they were joined by F.M. Diamond, U.S. Consul of that port and seven other Americans. – The intelligence brought by them will be found under appropriate heads. [JCB]
THE TREATY, between the Great Britain and the U. States of America, relative to Oregon, negotiated between the right hon. Mr. PARKENHAM an the secretary of state, Mr. BUCHANAN, was signed by President Polk, and ratified by the United States senate, was taken out by the steamer Great Western, which left New York on the 25th, for the ratification of the British Government.

That British government had instructed Mr. Parkenham to offer the mediation of that government in hopes of restoring peace between the United States and Mexico, was so confidently asserted on the arrival of the Cambria, that the article first inserted in the "Union" in reference to such an offer, led us to the conclusion that such was the fact. The Union now states that if such was the fact, they at least are not advised of it. – The probability is, that the statement was at least premature. The application which had been made by the "Mexican association" in England, to the British ministers, for such a mediation, is inserted in this number, and may lead to the adoption of such a course, after the ratification on their part of the Oregon treaty. Prior to that, such an offer would certainly be out of place. – Their own quarrel with us should at least be settled before proposing to settle the quarrel between us and a foreign power.

The Union is evidently in now way desirous that such an offer should be made. Our own impression is, that it would be better for this country that no such offer be made. We should regret to ascertain that Mr. Parkenham had received such instructions; and this, not because we do not fervently pray for a speedy termination of hostilities, but because we do not believe that such a mediation would be likely to attain that object any sooner than it will be attained without it, if as soon, and because, if offered, we see not how our government can with propriety reject the overture, especially if, as it is said, they have offered the mediation of our government in the case of Buenos Ayres and the French, English, and Argentine quarrel.

An interesting item in relation to the views of the British government, which will be found under our diplomatic head, if true, sheds light upon the subject in hand. Mr. Webster, in his speech in the senate on Wednesday, alluded to the reported offer of mediation. He doubted whether there was any truth in the report. If true, Mexico must come down to a treaty at last. He was for sending a minister at once to Mexico, with full powers to treaty. "If I were to advise," said Mr. Webster, "I would advise to make Mexico and offer of a formal embassy. We can afford to do so; we can lose nothing in dignity by it. I would be for keeping ourselves entirely in the right. It is not stooping on our part, because all the world knows that the contest is very unequal.

This reference to a course of policy, so often urged in our columns, fortifies preconceived impressions. We go now one step further. The claims which conquest might urge, in any settlement with Mexico, we fervently hope will not be asserted. We would like to see our republic not only JUST, but MAGNANIMOUS. It belongs to the character of an intelligent republican people to be so. We have now an opportunity of exhibiting the fact, that the republic of the United States of America, is exactly such a republic, and the PEOPLE, exactly such a people. MILIONS FOR JUSTICE, - FOR CONQUEST, NOT A CENT. [JCB]

AUSTIN FRIARS, LONDON, June 2, 1846. My Lord: The committee of the South American and Mexican Association take the liberty to address your lordship, in consequence of the intelligence recently received of the republic of the United States of America having declared war against the republic of Mexico.

The previous evils certain to result from this unhappy occurrence, to all parties carrying on intercourse with, or having interests in Mexico, the committee need not point out your lordship. The blockading of ports, the warning off of vessels now on their way to Mexico, with cargoes expressly provided for that market; the impeding of returns being made for cargoes previously sent; the general interruption of the pursuits of commerce; the irregular state of warfare introduced by the issuing of letters of marque, often leading to unlicensed marauding of the seas, are the direct and unavoidable consequences of active hostilities between two nations, respectively situated towards each other as are these republics.

That a large portion of these evils must fall upon British subjects from the extensive nature of their intercourse and connexion with Mexico, your lordship will also be fully aware.

The committee venture to hope, that, on an examination of the grounds on which this declaration of war has been issued by the United States, it will be found that the grievance alleged by that power against Mexico is not so deeply rotted, but the friendly interposition of good offices between the contending parties by an independent power, standing in relations of amity and neutrality towards both, may be found available to remove it.

The President of the United States, in his message to the congress of that republic, declares the ground of offense to be – that a Mexican force had attacked a force of the United States, placed on the left bank of the Rio del Norte, between that river and the river Nueces, said act of hostility on the part of the republic of Mexico constituting in itself a "state of war."

The president further adverts, in his message, to the fact that Texas has, "by the final action of the congress of the United States, become an integral part of the Union.” But it is manifest that the integrity of this part of the Union must be decided by the geographical position of that state, previous to its separation from the mother country. There is not a map in existence, published previous to the separation of the province of Texas, that does not assign the river Nueces as the boundary of that province.

The only act by which it is assumed that the boundary of Texas could be obtruded to the Rio del Norte, is an act of the congress of Texas itself, passed in December 1836, Texas being at that time in insurrection against the parent state, and its independence not having been acknowledged by any power whatever. Upon a title of such questionable validity it is that the U. States has thought fit to direct its troops to occupy the territory in question, and to consider the attempt to dislodge them therefrom as an act constituting a declaration of war by Mexico.

It is to be remarked, that although claiming the whole of the territory in question between the rivers Nueces and river Del Norte to be their own, the Mexicans, so far from provoking hostility with respect to this disputed ground, had wholly continued themselves to the right bank of the Rio del Norte, until the troops of the United States had appeared on the other side, avoiding therefore on the side of Mexico all cause for irritation.

And if, indeed, there had been some manifestation of irritated feeling on the part of Mexico with regard to Texas, it might perhaps have been considered somewhat excusable. Several hundreds of British subjects are at this time dispersed throughout Mexico, carrying on, under the protection of the treaty between G. Britain and Mexico, their several legitimate pursuits to the advantage of the country in which they are settled and to their own. If these persons were found to congregate themselves together in a remote and thinly peopled province of Mexico, and there to foment an insurrection against the parent state, the a declaration of separation and independence, and, lastly, an act of annexation to the British crown, such a proceeding could hardly be viewed as otherwise than grievous toward the republic of Mexico, and not calculated perhaps to attract a moral sympathy in any quarter. It is now a matter of historical record, that when the signatures to the act of annexation of Texas to the United States came to be examined, they were found to be nearly all those of strangers, and not of native Texans.

The committee of the South American and Mexican Association respectfully bring these circumstances under the notice of her majesty’s government in the hope that it shall appear, on an impartial view of the political relations between the United States and Mexico, that there is no cause of rupture between the two parties but such as a friendly and respectful interposition of good offices might remove. Her majesty’s government may deem it expedient to endeavor, in that character, to put an end to a state of hostility between the two republics, embarrassing and injurious to both.

The committee do not conceal that it is from the desire to protect their commercial interests, that they address this representation to your lordship; but they trust that that motive comprehends nothing that is not in accordance with the general interests of civilized states. – At a time when the desire for the maintenance of peace is so generally and practically recognized by the powers of Europe, it cannot be out of place for Englishmen to express a hope that between the republics of the Western Hemisphere, possessing the most free institutions, and a boundless territory, with all the means within themselves of encouraging and rewarding industry and extending civilization and happiness, the elements of strife and discord may speedily be dispersed, and the bonds of amity and good will be strengthened, to their own common advantage, and that of all holding friendly intercourse with them.

I have the honor to be, my lord, your most faithful servant,

J.D. POWLES, Chairman of the South American and Mexican Association.

The right hon. the earl of Aberdeen, K.T., one of her majesty’s principal secretaries of state, &c., &c.

NNR 70.261-262 article in the "Southern Quarterly Review" reviewing the campaign, noticed

An article will be found in this number, extracted from the Southern Review, written evidently by a person conversant with the subject on which he treats, and of no ordinary talents. He scribbles with a keen pen, dipped occasionally in caustic ink, yet the facts, which an impartial reader will be able to ascertain in relation to the conducting of the war in which we are engaged, from this writer, are important towards forming a correct judgement of the premises. Some apprehensions which we took an opportunity to suggest at the time the army was about to proceed to Corpus Christi, as to precautionary outfit, and as to adequate information of the nature of the country about to be entered, the harbors, depths of water, roads, &c., &c., and of force and disposition of the occupants of the territory, have been so far indisputably realized, that we cannot help giving credence to far more of what is stated by the writer alluded to, than we like to do. That he is occasionally severe without due regard to circumstances which should excuse or palliate, we have no doubt. Readers however will judge for themselves. [JCB]

NNR 70.262 formidable force organizing against Santa Fe

EXPEDITION AGAINST SANTA FE. – The division of the invading army, which is assembling in the state of Missouri, and which is to be commanded by the old veteran officer General Wool, intending to proceed to Santa Fe and Upper California, is mustering with spirit and will soon be far upon their route.- The Missourians and the "We-tern Rangers" mount at the first blast of the bugle, rifle in hand, bowie knife at the girdle, and revolving pistols in their holsters, demanding only to know who is to lead them on to the west. The first requisition for volunteers for the expedition was deemed inadequate, and another regiment is called for. The frontier-men will have the whole of this frolic to themselves. We judge there will be very little fighting. [JCB]

NNR 70.262 Lt. Col. Henry Wilson marches against Reynosa

Our information from the army on the Rio Grande is to the 6th instant.

An expedition composed of four companies of the 1st infantry and some volunteers, altogether about 500 men marched from Matamoros on the 5th inst., under command of Lieutenant Col. Wilson, towards Reinoso, a town situated about 60 miles above, upon the Rio Grande. From thence they designed to proceed to Camargo, 30 miles still further up.

"The Corporal," two of whose letters are inserted, writes to the New Orleans Bee on the 6th, from the camp opposite Matamoros. "The wet weather and heat of the sun have somewhat impaired the health of our army, though it may yet be considered good. The disease most prevalent is the diarrhea, but I believe it is a milder state of the disease than generally prevails in this climate and at this season of the year. To prevent the spread of this, the surgeon of our regiment has protested against the use of green corn, and accordingly our colonel has totally prohibited its admission in the lines. I assure you there never was an action on the corn laws of England that produced so much dissatisfaction as this direct prohibition of our military ruler. It was utterly out of the question to hold public meetings on the subject, and had they been held, would have been to no avail, for our king rules without consulting the ministers or parliament, when the health of the troops is brought into question."

We are as ignorant here of our destination as you are, other than that we start up the river. Some are of the opinion that the army will be scattered and take and occupy posts on the river, while the larger portion seem sanguine that we march directly for Monterey, where the enmy’s forces are concentrating and fortifying themselves. Should the latter prophesy be verified, we will have warm work in reaching the point, as the sun is warmer in the prairies on the route than you can imagine. Monterey is ninety leagues from Matamoros, and eighty from the Rio grande, and were it not that rains keep the prairies pretty wet, it would be difficult for infantry to reach water when needed, and at easy marches."

Captain Stringer has established a post office at Matamoros, and demands his ten cents for postage on letters as if commissioned by postmaster Cave Johnson himself. A mail arrives daily.

General Worth had arrived. [JCB]

NNR 70.262 Gen. Zachary Taylor's letter complaining of want of transport and the large body of volunteers beyond what he had asked for

The last official information we have from Gen. Taylor is the following:

Headquarters of the army of occupation, Matamoros, June 3, 1846. Sir:  I respectfully enclose herewith a field return of the forces in and near Matamoros, both regular and volunteer. The corps known to have arrived at Point Isabel, of which no returns have yet been received, will carry the entire forces under my orders to nearly 8,000 men. I am necessarily detained at this point for want of suitable transportation to carry on offensive operations. There is not a steamboat at my command proper for the navigation of the Rio Grande, and without water transportation I consider it useless to attempt any extensive movement. Measures have been taken to procure boats of suitable draft and description, and one or two may now be expected. In the meantime, I propose to push a battalion of infantry as far as Reinosa, and occupy that town. For any operations in the direction of Monterey, it will be necessary to establish a large depot at Camargo, which I shall lose no time in doing as soon as proper transports arrive, unless I receive counter instruction from the department.

I trust the department will see that I could not possibly have anticipated the arrival of such heavy reinforcements from Louisiana as are now here, and on their way hither. Without large means of transportation, this force will embarrass rather than facilitate our operations. I cannot doubt that the department has already given instructions based upon the change in our position since my first call for volunteers.

Our last accounts of Arista, represent his force to be halted at Coma, an extensive hacienda on the Monterey road, about 100 miles from this point. – He has pickets covering the roads leading to matamoros, with a view to cut off all communication with the interior. The departmental authorities have issued a decree denouncing as traitors all who hold intercourse with us, or with those who do so. – I am, nevertheless, disposed to believe that in some quarters at least our presence is not unfavorably received. We have no intelligence from the city of Mexico. Ordnance stores, and other munitions of war, are continually discovered in the town. Five pieces of cannon, and a very large amount of balls, shells, and ammunition generally, have been brought to light.

I am, sir, very respectfully your obedient servant,

Z. TAYLOR,

To the ADJUTANT GENERAL of the Army.

NNR 70.262-263 letters from "The Corporal" at Matamoros

GENTLEMEN: Two days after I wrote you, we took up the line of march for this point, which we reached on the 25th. The country through which we passed was lovely to the extreme – being as level as a ball-room floor, and full of little chaparrals and muskeet groves. Our road, though not exactly following the meanderings of the river, touched its banks often enough to obtain water every mile or two. The citizens were friendly to us, and showed us little displeasure at the invasion. In fact, some of them expressed their wish that the country should be governed by Americans or some other people, that would guarantee them a liberal and stable government – so much had they been annoyed by the internal convulsions of their own. At every house we found three or four men, which induced me to believe that the press gang had met with poor success among them. They say it is not their disposition to play the soldier at any time, particularly the present, and when the call is made for troops they leave their homes in possession of the women and find business in the chaparral. They are happy, simple people, whose aim seems to be to make provisions for to-day, leaving to-morrow to look out for itself. All along the road they were found waiting with milk, a sort of bread which they call tortillas, cheese, poloncas of maple sugar, and assort of liquor resembling in looks and taste San Croix rum. We paid them liberally for all we obtained, which to them must have presented a strong contrast to the Mexican soldiery, who spread dismay and devastation among their own people, wherever they go. It seems to have been the desire of every man in our ranks to make the line of disparity between the American and Mexican soldiers as palpable as possible, and the good effect of such conduct, if not immediately developed, will in the course of time be more apparent. Our march was very heavy, particularly the day we left the Baritas, and some of our young men were very much used up. Two from company A were so much affected by the scorching sun as to be unable to proceed further, and stopped at the house of a Mexican, where they received the utmost kindness and attention during the night, and were furnished with horses in the morning to catch up with us.

It was about 10 o'clock in the morning when we reached the town of Matamoros, though its white buildings, so different from those we passed on the route, had attracted the eye long before that time. There was something far more attractive to the eye than the white buildings of the town – something to awaken a thrill of pleasure in the breast of the whole regiment – the Stripes and Stars were majestically floating in the breeze from the highest point in Matamoros, and between the river and the town hundreds and hundreds of white tents were pitched in such admirable order as to induce the beholder to think it a great town.

As we entered the town at the east end, thousands of people sallied out of their houses to look upon us, whose looks more bespoke a welcome to their own army than to that of the invaders. At many a half opened door or window was seen the head of a senora, whose timidity or modesty, (albeit they allow so little to the Mexicans,) forbade their emerging into the streets. Some of these women are indeed beautiful, though a great majority are indolent slovenly and destitute of that female delicacy which characterizes our own women. Their common dress is a white muslim skirt tied quite loosely around the body, without any bodice; their chemise being the only covering for their breasts, in which they wear their jewelry and cross. I did not see one pair of stockings in all the town. From this style of dressing you will infer that pride of dress gives way to comfort and ease, and that, too, in a greater degree, than I think the largest liberty would warrant them in indulging in. I went into a house yesterday evening, occupied by an old man and two daughters, both speaking a sufficiency of English to be understood. After being seated for a few moments, the eldest of the daughters went to the bed and brought to me a most lovely and interesting child, as white almost as any of our own people. She informed me that she was married about two years ago to a Texan prisoner, and that he had been killed whilst fighting under General Taylor. She spoke in the highest terms of her deceased lord, and seemed to worship his image in the child. She is a lovely creature, and I think deeply devoted to our cause.

Matamoros is a much handsomer place than I expected to find it. It covers two miles square though by no means as compast as an American city – every house except those around the public square having a large garden attached. The houses in the business part of the town are built after the American fashion, though seldom exceeding two stories in height. All the windows to these buildings are grated from top to bottom with iron bars, and half of the door only opens for admittance, which gives them the appearance of prisons more than business houses. The public square is in the centre of the town, and must have been laid off by an American or a European, for the Mexicans never could have laid it out with such beauty and precision. On the four sides of the square the houses are built close enough together, as in black, and are all of the same size and height with the exception of the cathedral, which, though unfinished, still towers above the others. In these houses are sold dry goods, groceries, and every kind of wares, with now and then an exchange of coffee house. They are principally occupied by Europeans, and you can hear French, English, Spanish, and German spoken at the same time. After leaving the public square on either side, the houses decrease in size and beauty for two or three squares, when the small reed and thatched huts commence, and continue to the extreme limits of the place.

In walking through the streets, my attention was attracted to a house in the door of which stood or leaned two half naked Mexicans, so wo begone as to cause me to halt. On my nearing the door a most disagreeable stench almost induced me to bout-face. I mustered courage to enter the door. On the floor lying upon mats without covering, were nearly fifty Mexicans, wounded in the late engagements, attended by some 10 or 12 women. The smell of the place was insufferable, and I had to leave it. The next door was the same, and so on for about 20 houses. – A friend of mine called my attention to a room in which there were at least forty of these miserable objects, and this room was scarcely 12 feet square. There was not positively room for the nurses to attend them. Some had lost a leg, others an arm, and some both legs and arms. I noticed one who will certainly get well, whose legs were shot off within two or three inches above the knee, and he seemed to me to have a greater flow of spirits than some who had only flesh wounds. I said to him, that had only his wounds been made by a Mexican shot he would have been dead, to which he replied, the American shot was very good – no poisonous copper in them. One had died just before I entered the room, and they were making preparations to carry him out. – He had been shot in the mouth by a rifle ball which passed under the left ear, and he had lived from the 9th up to this time. There are between 350 and 400 of these horrid objects in this place, and the sight of them would induce many a stout heart to lament the horrors of war. These men give the number of killed and wounded on the 9th much greater than the Americans ever claimed – some say twelve hundred, some say fifteen hundred, but enough of them.

Lieut, Wells, of the spies, informed me yesterday that General Arista had halted at the distance of 80 miles from this place, and is receiving reinforcements quite briskly. Lieut. Wells with a few men followed them 60 miles. The Mexicans say he (Arista) will certainly return and attack us at this place, but the best informed Americans entertain no such idea.

If things are left to Taylor's discretion, he will march from this place to Monterey, - on this river - and if he does, the Mexicans will give him a hard fight – men will turn out to defend their homes and property in that section that we have never had to cope with yet – men, who when called on heretofore to put down rebellion or to invade Texas, have paid two or three dollars for a miserable substitute, will now take their rifles, and march to the field of fight; and these Rio Grande rancheros know how to use a rifle too. From the manner in which they fought on the 9th, you may safely infer that the fight will be a hard one. They will iways manage to have two ro three to one when they fight us and we look upon it as an equalizing thing, (you may think this boasting but it is an absolute fact.)

An express was sent from this place to Washington six days ago, and the general belief is, that we will not move from here until advised by the government to that effect. In such a case we will drill during the interim, and make preparations for any contingency.

The United States Dragoons left yesterday, for Point Isabel, to get their horses shod; they are a fine looking set of men and did much good service in the field.

Captain Walker, (I believe now a major,) is here with his men. He rode by our quarters yesterday on Tornado, the horse sent from New Orleans to him. Tornado seems as fond of his backer as the backer does of him, and they were the observed of all observers. Walker's men say he has but one fault and that is too brave for his discretion. Capt. Price, also of the Texas Rangers, is here with a fine set of men, and is a rough customer for a Mexican to run against. Major Hayes is occupying the post at San Antonio by Taylor's orders and will remain there until we march. We were about issuing an Army Chronicle here, but before we could get possession of the office, some one took it, and paid or agreed to pay the original owner for the use of it.
Our troops are in excellent spirits and long for the moment which will place them face to face with the enemy. The two volunteer regiments from your city, are in particularly buoyant spirits, notwithstanding their rate heavy march. They have too much pride to complain.

P.S. – Since the commencement of my letter I have conversed with a gentleman of much intelligence, who informed me, that Gen. Taylor would positively cease offensive operations, until he heard from Washington. He says that Mtamoros was taken without orders, as the commands were emphatically to act defensive, and not cross the river under any pretence. He will not be blamed admitting he has overstepped his orders, for he has done some good service on the frontier. Unless Arista returns to Mtamoros, there will be no further hostilities until Uncle Sam tells his sons to go ahead. Yours, &c., THE CORPORAL.

Camp opposite Matamoros, May 28th, 1846. (10 o’clock A.M.) GENTLEMEN: From the date of this you will perceive that we are again on American ground, though within a stones throw of the enemy’s banks. Our stay on the Matamoros side of the Rio Grande was brief – too brief to satisfy the curious portion of our troops in the perambulations through the captured city. But I suppose it’s all right; as the policy of our commander is to annoy the inhabitants of the place as little as possible. We are, however, allowed to cross the river occasionally, in small squads, and to remain for a portion of the day. When I say we, I mean the volunteer regiments, for a greater part of the regulars, with the Rangers and dragoons, are on the other side – dividing the troops on the two sides.

A company of regular troops are encamped on the public square to preserve order, as is also a company of Mexican citizens, whom the general has induced to organize to keep their own citizens under proper restrictions. You must not infer from this that the liberty of the Mexican citizens has been in any manner curtailed – it is not so; for I myself, heard Gen. Taylor tell a citizen, (who complained of an injury received from one of his own people,) that he did not, nor would not, exercise the least civil jurisdiction over the place, but leave them to administer their own affairs so long as it did not conflict with his duty as commander of an invading army.

While at headquarters, two Mexican women cam crying to the general and entreated him to release their husbands, who were prisoners in the fort. He simply bade the interpreter tell them, he could not, and they went on their way, apparently not the least surprised at his refusal. A ranchero also wanted the release of some servants, saying that his cotton was full of grass, but his request me the same success.

Capt. Thornton, of the dragoons, whom, you will recollect, was sent out some time ago to take observations, who charged the enemy, was defeated and taken prisoner, is still under arrest, and wills hortly be tried for action without orders. It is not likely that anything will be done to him more then censure, if that. He is spoken of as a brave and worthy officer. Lieut. Deas, was exchanged for, though he suffered to remain with the enemy as punishment for his indescretion. He was taken for a spy, and that was the reason why gen. Taylor used to exertion to get him back, thinking 'twould be a bad precedent. No one thought him so, and attributed his singular conduct to a generous disposition to find out what had been the fate of Col. Cross.

Looking over the papers received yesterday, I saw several attempts at a description of a chaparral, but all is incorrect. It is a series of thickets of various sizes, from 100 yards to a mile through, with musket trees interspersed in various kinds of bushes, and briars, all covered with thorns, and so closely entwined together by their respective branches as to prevent the passage of anything through larger than a wolf or hare. When they are in the course of a traveler he must travel around them, sometimes four or five miles, before he can make half a mile on his route. In the middle of most of them you will find a small prairie with numerous beds of prickly pears, the fruit of which is often ventured for by those who are accustomed to its use and “know the ropes.” It was in one of these prairies where Captain Walker as first fired on in the commencement of battles – the enemy had cut down the bushes and drawn a piece of artillery to its edge and planted it just as Walker emerged from the thicket by a mustang trail, on the other side. In the large thickets, a good woodman can crawl on his belly without coming in contact with the branches, and thus approach near enough to its outer edge to take a deliberate aim at an object in the prairie.

Four o’clock, P.M. – I ceased writing this morning, because I had nothing to write about; put by implements and crossed the river in search of news. The first place I went was Walker’s headquarters, a place where all the news respecting the enemy is to be found. Walker with the greater part of his men are absent on a ranging or spying expedition, and when he returns he will advise us of the movements of Arista.
On the other side of the river the war bill has created quite an excitement, and the Mexicans look as though all hope of saving their country from being overrun is lost.
Fifty thousand men they think, or pretend to think, will ruin Mexico. Our soldiers too, seem cheered by the news, and anticipate a brilliant termination of the campaign, which a few days ago they feared would end in smoke.

One of the volunteers was found dead in the streets of Matamoros this morning, having been stabbed in the back, and another one is missing, supposed also to have been murdered. A Spaniard or Mexican was found dead in his house this morning early, and his wife came to Taylor’s quarters, complained of the deed and pointed out the murderer. He was promptly arrested and placed under guard for trial.

We have a regular mail arriving here every morning from Point Isabel, which leaves again in the evening for the same place, which will afford me an opportunity of sending you something in the way of words or news every day or two.

Yours,
THE CORPORAL.

NNR 70.263-264 Gen. Zachary Taylor’s letter of 22d April to Gen. Mariano Arista, relative to blockade of the Rio Grande

The following letter from Gen. Taylor to Gen. Arista, in reply to one from the latter remonstrating against the blockade of the Rio Grande, is worthy of being put on record among materials for a future history of the war. It shows General Taylor not less skilled in the structure of dispatches, than in the conduct of battle:

Headquarters, army of occupation, Camp near Matamoros, (Texas,) April 22, 1846.

Sir. I have had the honor to receive your communication of this date, in which you complain of measures adopted by my order to close the mouth of the Rio Bravo against vessels bound to Matamoros, and in which you also advert to the case of two Mexicans supposed to be detained as prisoners in this camp.

After all that has passed since the American army approached the Rio Bravo, I am certainly surprised that you should complain of a measure which is no other than a natural result of the state of war so much insisted upon by the Mexian authorities as actually existing at this time. You will excuse me for recalling a few circumstances, to show that this state of war has not been sought by the American army, but has been forced upon it, and that the exercise of the rights incident to such a state, cannot be made a subject of complaint.

On breaking up my camp at Corpus Christi, and moving forward with the army under my orders to occupy the left bank of the Rio Bravo, it was my earnest desire to execute my instructions in a pacific manner; to observe the utmost regard for the personal rights of all citizens residing on the left bank of the river, and to take care of the religion and customs of the people should suffer no violation.

With this view, and to quiet the minds of the inhabitants, I issued orders to the army, enjoining a strict observance of the rights and interests of all Mexicans residing on the river, and caused said orders to be translated into Spanish, and circulated in the several towns on the Bravo. These orders announced the spirit in which we proposed to occupy the country, and I am proud to say that up to this moment the same spirit has controlled the operations of the army. On reaching the Arroyo Colorado I was informed by a Mexican officer that the order in question had been received at Matamoros, but was told at the same time that if I attempted to cross the river it would be regarded as a declaration of war. Again, on my march to Frontone I was met by a deputation of the civil authorities of Matamoros, protesting against me occupation of a portion of the department of Tamaulipas, and declaring that if the army was not at once withdrawn, war would result. While this communication was in met hands, it was discovered that the village of Frontone had been set on fire and abandoned. I viewed this as a direct act of war, and informed the deputation that their communication would be answered by me when opposite Matamoros, which was done in respectful terms.

On reaching the river I dispatched an officer, high in rank, to convey to the commanding general in Matamoros the expression of my desire for amicable relations, and my willingness to leave open to the use of the citizens of Matamoros the port of Brassos Santiago until the question of boundary should be definitely settled. This officer received for reply, from the officer selected to confer with him, that my advance to the Rio Bravo was considered as a veritable act of war, and he was actually refused an interview with the American Consul, in itself incompatible with a state of peace. Notwithstanding these repeated assurances on the part of the Mexican authorities, and notwithstanding the most obvious hostile preparations on the right bank of the river, accompanied by aridged non-intercourse, I carefully abstained from any act of hostility – determined that the onus of producing an actual state of hostilities should not rest on me. Our relations remained in this state until I had the honor to receive your note of the 12th instant, in which you denounce was as the alternative of my remaining in this position.

As I could not, under my instruction, recede from my position, I accepted the alternative you offered, and made all my dispositions to meet it suitably. – But, still willing to adopt milder measures before proceeding to others, I contend myself, in the first instance, with ordering a blockade of the mouth of the Rio Brave, by the naval force under my orders – a proceeding perfectly constant with the state of war so often declared to exist, and which you acknowledge in your note of the 16th instant, relative to the late Colonel Cross. If this measure seem oppressive, I wish it borne in mind that it has been forced upon me by the course you have seen fit to adopt. I have reported this blockade to my government, and shall not remove it until I receive instructions to that effect, unless indeed, you desire and armistice, pending the final settlement of the question between the governments, or until war shall be formally declared by either, in which case I will cheerfully open the river. In regard to the consequences you mention as resulting from a refusal to remove the blockade, I beg you to understand that I am prepared for them be they what they may.

In regard to the particular vessels referred to in your communication, I have the honor to advise you that, in the pursuance of my orders, two American schooners, bound to Matamoros, were warned off on the 17th instant, when near the mouth of the river, and put to sea, returning probably to New Orleans. They were not seized, or their cargoes disturbed in any way, nor have they been in the harbor of Brazos Santiago to my knowledge. A Mexican schooner, understood to be the "Juanita," was in or off that harbor when my instructions to blockade that river were issued, but was driven to sea in a gale, since which time I have no report concerning her. Since the receipt of your communication, I have learned that two persons sent to the mouth of the river to procure information respecting the vessel, proceeded thence to Brazos Santiago, when they were taken up and detained by the officers in command, until my orders could be received. I shall order their immediate release. A letter from one of them to the Spanish vice consul is respectfully transmitted herewith.

In relation to the two Mexicans said to have drifted down river in a boat, and to be prisoners at this time in my camp, I have the pleasure to inform you that no such persons have been taken prisoner, or are now detained by my authority. The boat in question was carried down empty by the current of the river, and drifted ashore near one of our pickets, and was secured by the guard. Some time afterward an attempt was made to recover the boat under the cover of darkness; the individuals concerned were hailed by the guard, and failing to answer, were fired upon as a matter of course. What became of them is not known, as no trace of them could be discovered on the following morning – The officer of the Mexican guard directly opposite was informed the next day that the boat would be returned on proper application to me, and I have now only to repeat that assurance.

In conclusion, I take leave to state that I consider the tone of your communication highly exceptionable, where you stigmatize the movements of the army under my orders as "marked with the seal of universal reprobation." You must be aware that such language is not respectful in itself either to me or my government; and while I observe in my own correspondence the courtesy due to your high position and to the magnitude of the interests with which we are respectively charged, I shall expect the same in return.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

Senor Gen. D. Pedro de Ampudia, Commanding in Matamoros. [JCB]
Incidents of the battle field. The New Orleans Delta, of the 9th contains a long and interesting letter from Point Isabel, May 20th. After speaking of the battle of the 8th, the writer says:

"The first case of general Taylor was to visit the wounded and see that every comfort was supplied – the constant and well directed energies of the medical department left but little for him to do, every one, whether officer or soldier, had been attended to with unwavering care and watchfulness. The troops having partaken of their meal, the order was given to get the command under arms. General Taylor here summoned a council of war, composed of the heads of the different commands, in all thirteen, excluding the commander in chief. The general, after returning thanks for their support and bravery on the 8th, and wishing to be advised as to what they thought best to be done, called on each to give his opinion. I twas then ascertained that but four out of the thirteen were in favor of going ahead; the other officers composing the council voted, some to entrench where they were and await the assistance of the volunteers, and others to retire at once to Point Isabel, but the general said, "I will be at Fort Brown before night, if I live!"

He adds: "Those who voted for going ahead, as they watched the countenance of the general, might have seen the smile of approbation that lightened up the old man’s honest face at the moment; though he bowed with respect to the opinions of those who differed from him, and in saying engrave on the sacred banner of the stars and stripes the names of Taylor, McIntosh, Morris, Scott, and Duncan, I mean no reflection upon those who voted against them – they were men tried in many a field before, and their deeds on that day proved them equal to the best.

"Lieut. Ridgely, who was entitled to a vote in the council, was at the time in attendance on the lamented Ringgold, and therefore had no choice in the matter, but as he galloped up to the battery, on returning from his visit to the major, someone said:‘Ridgely, were you not at the council?’ he replied, ‘no, I did not know that one had been called, but I hope old Zach will go ahead and bring the matter to close quarters.’"

A full account of the battle is now given, and ample justice is done to the brave men who participated in the struggle. Alluding to the charge of May, the writer says:

"The enemy again wavered. Gen. Taylor ordered captain May to charge their battery, and on he started; but on reaching the point of the road where he would have been discovered by the enemy, he was stopped by Ridgely, who told him that the enemy had just loaded their pieces, and if he charged, then, he would be swept away. ‘Stop,’ says Ridgely, ‘until I draw their fire;’ when he deliberately fired each gun; so terrible was the effect of the grape, that the Mexicans poured their fire upon his piece, and then May charged like a bullet, drove off the cannoners, took la Vega prisoner, and retreated. Here lieut. Inge, a noble, gallant soldier, charging at the head of the squadron, was killed and stripped. Lieut. Sacket than whom there is no better officer, had his horse shot from under him, and was pitched foremost into a pond, rose again, covered with mud and water, and escaped. The squadron suffered very much. I am sure Charley May feels grateful to Ridgely fr his cool judgment and timely advice. Had he charged on the battery, loaded with grape as it was, I do not believe he would have saved a man."

The letter thus concludes: - "I returned shortly to camp and found that our troops were resting immediately on the battle gound. Alas! What a sad picture presented itself; around were lying heaps of dead, dying and disabled men – the sigh, the groan, the shriek of agony, filled the air, whilst the eye could not rest upon spot but it met with a head, a leg, an arm, a body cut off by the waist, of the more fortunate dead, who had received their death wound from the rifle or musket.

"Now my dear sir, how can I describe to you the personal acts of bravery – not only in one instance but in twenty – and not simply by the officer, but by the common soldier. The whole battle was fought by individual squads, led sometimes by an officer and frequently by the non-commissioned officers. I could not say too much for every man engaged. So eager were our men for the fight that I cannot better describe their enthusiasm than to give you the idea that struck me it was this: Every man, officer and soldier seemed impressed with the idea that there was but a given quantity of fighting to be had – not enough for every man to have his fill of it – and, therefore, it became every on to get what he could as soon as possible."
"Instances there were where one man in charging upon their batteries leaped astride their pieces and holding on with one hand bet of the gunners with their swords, and were cut down.

"An instance occurred when in a charge upon a piece Lieut. Joran was attacked by 2 Mexicans and bayoneted in two places, when lieut. Lincoln of the 8th, rushed up and with his own sabre made perfect mince meat of the two. Again, when Ridgely charged with his battery across the ravine, and was standing at one of his pieces, he was charged on by three lancers, he mounted his horse and drove them off with his own sabre. But it would take a volume to recite the whole, and I am sure that in gen. Taylor's detailed report all will appear – the fact is every man was a hero. If I may say the artillery under Ridgely, and the regiments of infantry, particularly the eighth and 5th. The charge of May's squadron was a gallant thing; its success however, was attributable to the timely advice of Ridgely and his willingness to receive the fire of the batteries, when it was believed sufficient to sweep whole squadrons – not to say but that May would just as leave have charged on the loaded gun as on the empty one – he is a brave, gallant and efficient officer." [JCB]

NNR 70.264-265 incidents of the battlefield

A letter from Point Isabel, dated June 2, to the New Orleans Picayune, contains the following interesting narrative:

"I left Matamoros yesterday morning, in company with captains Ramsay and Hardee, and four dragoons, and on the route to this place had another view of the two battle grounds. Resaca de la Palma battle ground is covered with the graves of our fallen countrymen, who fell, many of them, fighting hand to hand with the enemy. Terribly were they avenged, however, on the spot, for their antagonists are buried around them by hundreds. I was shown one grave, near the spot where brave Cochrane was interred, in which some eight Mexicans are said to have been placed, and there are many more which contain a score or two each of slaughtered foe. The grave of poor Inge was pointed out to me. It is near where one of the enemy's batteries was posted. It was with feelings of deep sadness that I recalled to mind the many virtues of this gallant and noble-hearted officer. He had left a young wife in Baltimore, and had arrived at Point Isabel with a body of recruits, just in time to march with general Taylor; had distinguished himself in both battles by his heroic bearing, and fell at the moment when that brilliant victory, to which he contributed so largely, was about to declare itself in favor of our arms. – Mexican caps and remnants of their clothing are scattered here and there over the battle ground, and the whole field is dotted with marks of the enemy's camp fires. It is a wild looking place, and advantageous was the position of the enemy, that it will ever remain a wonder to me that our little army was not entirely cut to pieces by their greatly superior force. Over a great portion of the ground on which our army prepared to attack them, the thickets are so dense that a dog would find it difficult to penetrate them. The men actually pushed each other through these thickets, and were divided into snail squads of three to six.

The Palo Alto battle field, on this side, near the edge of the chaparrals, is an open prairie, quite level, and a most magnificent place for the meeting of two armies. The positions of the Mexican lines were pointed out to me, and we rode over part of the field where the battle raged the hottest. They are represented as having presented a very warlike as well as wild and picturesque appearance as our troops approached them; their compact line extending from an elevated point of chaparrals on their right, about a mile; their left extending across the road near its entrance to the pass. I visited the place where some of their heavy artillery opened upon our army, and against which our two 18 pounders were for a time directed. Convincing evidences of the skill with which our artillery was used against them was still perceptible upon that part of the field; for although they were permitted to bury their dead, and afterwards returned in numbers and spent considerable time in that employment, I counted some thirty dead bodies, stretched out as they fell, in that immediate vicinity.

Some had been nearly severed in two by cannon ball, others had lost part of the head, both legs, a shoulder, or the whole stomach. Of many of them nothing but the bones, encased in uniform, was left; whilst others had been transformed into mummies, and retained the expression of countenance which their death agonies had stamped upon them. One man had been shot between the hips with a large ball, lay doubled up as he fell, with his hands extended and his face downward between his knees. – Another whose shoulders and back were shot away, seemed to have died in the act of uttering a cry of horror. Dead horses were scattered about in every During my stay with the army near Matamoros, nothing of consequence occurred. Rumor is always busy enough, spreading ridiculous tales from one encampment to another, and the wags and 'green 'uns,' and literary aspirants, have no doubt kept the newspapers abundantly supplied with the species of "important news." There is no probability of the army moving from its present position for a month at least. This you will have heard before this reaches you, from intelligence officers, one of whom has sent to procure boats, &c. for the transportation of supplies up the Rio Grande. In the mean time the volunteers will be drilled, and those who are not at Matamoros with those who may arrive here, will be sent to Barita, to remain until their services may be needed.

There are now about four thousand volunteers out here. So far as I have been able to learn, their health is good, and they are doing very well in the way of drill and discipline.

We had another heavy wind last night, which like the recent gale, overthrew many tents. The tent in which I slept, in the 2nd dragoon camp, was stripped from over us as if it had been a sheet of tissue paper, and the way the lighter articles of our wardrobe dance about the prairie was quite uncomfortable to behold, especially to me, who gave chase to a portion of them.

It was stated at Matamoros, and generally believed, before I left, that a proclamation had been received from some high functionary, declaring that any Mexican citizen who should hold communication with persons in gen. Taylor's army, would be punished as traitors, and any Mexican citizen who should hold communication with those who held communication with our troops should likewise be punished as traitors! [JCB]

NNR 70.265 June 27, 1846 National Military Route from Matamoros to Monterey and Saltillo, Mexican Republic

We publish says the Washington Union, with great pleasure, the following description of the national route towards the city of Mexico. It is drawn up by a gentleman who is perfectly familiar with the localities he mentions:

From Matamoros to Guadalupe village. This village contains about 200 souls; herdsmen and farmers, grazing and water abundant--3 leagues.

From Guadalupe to the Rancho Ensenada--wood, water, and pasture, good - 7 leagues.

From Ensenada to the village of Reynoa, situated on a high rocky hill; has 2,000 souls, mostly herdsmen of black cattle--8 leagues.

To Las Morillos Rancho--of cattle, wood, water and grazing fine---3 leagues,

To Reynosa Viego--500 souls; corn and stock farms--3 leagues.

To Tipalagquaje farm. The to right-hand road, tow miles off, is a village called Las Cuevas, of 300 souls; has abundance of corn, meat and water--5 leagues.

To Camargo, village of 3,000 souls, on the St. John's river, 1 mile from the mouth that empties into the Rio Grande--5 leagues.

Here the road continues on the other side of St. John's river, which is 150 yards wide, ahs 10 feet of water at its month, bank steep, they ferry across in flat-boats. Steamboats can ascend up to this, and some three leagues above, from Matamoros, not to draw over 6 feet of water, on account of bars; there is considerable trade here in cattle from the neighboring ranchos; there is a ford some 40 miles upstream; but very boggy and bad.

To El Guardado, village of 500 souls; good road, good pasture, well-stocked; wood and water; 3 leagues.

To Mier, village of 800 souls; everything scarce--From Matamoros to this you are never 11/2 miles from the Rio Grande; but now leave the river nearly a west course--6 leagues.

To Creiso, ranchito of 100 souls; wood, water and pasture--3 leagues.

To Papa Gallos Rancho, 100 souls; meat and corn, wood and water 7 leagues.

To Ramos Rancho, 100 souls; meat and corn, wood and water--4 leagues.

To Aqua Frio, village of 400 souls, good pasture--8 leagues.

To Marina, village of 1,000 souls; abundance--5 leagues:

To Monterey city, 12,000 souls--8 leagues.

This last eight leagues has many ranchos and sugarcane farms on and off the road. A fine stream of pure mountain water runs through the city; well paved streets, and mostly one story buildings; lies at the foot of the trade-land. From Matamoros to this by government measure, is 100 leagues castillanos.--here the mountains become lofty and abrupt; the road now all up-hill, dry and broad, winding through the canones up to the next village, called -3 leagues.

Santa Clara, which contains 400 souls, farmers. The road to Tampico forks off here, or in the city of Monterrey; water by the road side, but no wood; country sterile, to the vicinity of the La Renconada Hacienda, which is 6 leagues.

Here are abundance of provisions and fine streams of water. The mountains here precipitate themselves like curtains. A determined enemy could make a storm resistance here; long 18 pounders would soon clear the track. The road is wide and good for artillery; the face of the lands here is very broken and covered with the prickly pear and dwarf bayonet plant; soldiers on foot should have on good boots.--from this place the road is bad, steep, and very fatiguing; country dry and barren to Los Muestos, a poor rancho, distant, ascending more rapidly over a bad road--3 leagues.

To Oja Caliente, which is hot water spring--2 leagues.

To Santa Maria Hacienda--5 Leagues.
You are now ascending on plains very broad.—this estate is very large, produces abundance of wheat and corn, and barley, well watered, about 3,000 feet above the level of the sea, latitude 26°—has some 600 souls.

To the Capilleanea village, 2,000 souls, is 5 leagues.

Scattered along the road, the water now generally is brackish.

To Saltillo city, of 12,000 souls, all dishonest rascals, notorious robbers and petty thieves; water from springs in abundance; the country yields abundance of wheat, corn, and barley; extensive grazing estates in the vicinity. Horses, mules, sheep, goats, in abundance and cheap. From this leads off the great roads to Mexico, and to the west and south. From this to the city of Mexico is 300 leagues.

Mexican force in the actions of the eight and ninth May

The official of General Arista, under date of Matamoros, May 14, 1846, published in the government Diario of May 25th, at the city of Mexico, show clearly, so far as they can be relied upon, that the Mexican force amounted to very nearly, if not quite, 5,000 men.

It says:—

"The file of documents contained in No. 1 will make known to your excellency our number of killed and wounded, and of the dispersed who have not yet presented themselves, and that the corps of the army are reunited, forming a total of 4,000 men, including the prisoners received in exchange, and exclusive of the numerous reinforcements, whose reports have not yet come in at the moment when this express is despatched." [AEK]

NBR 70.265-266 movement of the Mexicans

Movements of the enemy. A traveler from Tampico met a government courier between that place and Victoria about ten days ago, hunting for the Mexican army, for whom he bore orders, he said, to retreat upon Tampico. This would seem to indicate that the government consider the day as tentatively lost in this quarter, or were unable to reinforce their army sufficiently to enable it to stand another battle, and were collecting its fragments for the defense of Vera Cruz.

The port of Tampico was not blockaded, he states, as vessels were entering and departing, though an American sloop of war – the St. Mary's – was in sight. Mr. Schatzell and the other Americans, who were so rudely driven from Matamoros by Ampudia, had reached Tampico safely, though shaken in health by their forced journey of three hundred miles. They took shipping on the 23rd ult, for this place, where they may be hourly expected.

In order that friends abroad may not be apprehensive as to the troops stationed here suffering for the absolute necessaries of life, we will inform them that of all things necessary to subsist so large a body, there is sufficiency, and to spare; besides scarcely any of the delicacies which our southern cities present but what can be obtained here in abundance. Eggs, milk, poultry, fresh beef, and a variety of vegetables are constantly huckstered round by the Mexicans among our troops, and though the rates they impose upon us are rather exorbitant, they are cheerfully paid, as an inducement for them to continue their supplies. Coffee and eating houses under the supervision of Americans, are becoming numerous throughout the city; and taking all things together – barring the fleas – Matamoros is not a bad place to live in.

Gen. Ampudia. We are compelled to cut down somewhat of an article upon this Mexican brave: - an amusing story is told by a ranchero's wife of the haste and trepidation in which he crossed the river on he afternoon of the 9th of May – a day likely to be remembered in his calendar. The good woman says that Ampudia came to her house soon after the firing commenced, at full speed and alone, and begged her husband like a hound to cross him over the river before those shouting devils, the Americans, could overtake him. The poor husbandman complied and ferried the poor crest-fallen, terror-stricken hero across; but he had no sooner landed and placed the broad river between himself and his pursuers, than he became the haughty, supercilious Gen. Ampudia again, and ordered his preserver to play lacquey...

He is notorious in this city for his meanness in pecuniary matters, especially in swindling the people from whom he hired the furniture of his house, since his last arrival – and for his cold-blooded cruelty to our consul, Mr. Schatzell, a man near 70 years of age, whom he ordered to leave the place, under a guard, for the interior, in such basic as to compel the old man to go on the floor, and sleep for the first night in the open air, in a severe nother. He is also remembered as the first man from the field of battle, who, as an apology for his own cowardice, swore that the entire Mexican army was destroyed. One of the many rumors afloat is, that Ampudia has charged Arista with treachery – with having sold the army to the Americans. A hard bargain, indeed, to Arista, for his only pay was cannon balls and cold steel. Ampudia says further, that he would have won the day had he had command. The lying braggart – the man who ran at the first volley, when second in command, to talk of what he would have done as chief.

Arista's retreat will doubtless continue to the mountains. After losing the day with five to one at Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma, it is not likely he will make a stand on the plains. Gen. Taylor takes the field with so overwhelming a force, and so admirably equipped in that terrible arm of light artillery, that it would be madness in the enemy to fight again, where defeat would be certain and retreat impossible. Monterey is the first position of any natural strength, and it also commands the entrance to the mountain pass to Saltillo. It is there, in all probability, that Arista will make his great effort, which the importance of the object, his wounded pride, and the advantages of the ground, will all conspire to make a brilliant but a bloody day in the history of this war.

We understand that Canales is at Olmitos Rancho, five leagues on this side of Reynosa, levying contributions upon the people, and plundering them of all their mules and movable property. He has closed the roads and intercepts all communication from this direction, treating all those who are suspected of coming from this place with the greatest harshness.

The steamboat Neva entered the river last week and came up to this place. She found five feet of water at the bar, and five feet scant in the shallowest places inside. [JCB]

NNR 70.266-268 review of the campaign from the "Southern Quarterly Review"

From the Southern Quarterly Review. A military expedition has been recently sent out solely under the direction and control of the chief of the war department, as the commanding general was set aside. With an overflowing treasury, with arsenals teeming with arms of every description, with an experienced and energetic officer to carry out his minutest instructions, with disciplined officers ready to follow their officer even to inevitable destruction, and last, though not least, with the warnings of the past, surely we might have reasonably expected from the secretary a faultless combination of excellence in the outfit, skill in the plan, and efficiency in the conduct of this campaign. We propose an impartial review of this campaign, from its commencement until the present moment, and though truth will compel us to be unsparing of censure, yet it will be given with reluctance, and only from the sincere hope, that the exposure of past management may prevent their recurrence.

In the spring of 1844, pending the negotiation for the annexation of Texas, two regiments of infantry and one of dragoons, constituting a corps of observation were concentrated near the Sabine. The command of this corps or army, was entrusted to General Taylor, a veteran officer, distinguished for his gallantry on many a bloody field, and for his enduring constancy on many an arduous campaign. He was instructed, in general terms, to protect Texas from Mexican invasion during the negotiation, and, for this purpose, was vested with large definite and discretionary powers, such as are not even granted to the commander-in-chief, but upon extraordinary occasions. In fact, so unbounded was the confidence reposed, that, as the opposition presses complained, the war making power was delegated to a subordinate officer of our petty army. But ample were his powers, by some strong fatuity, Gen. Taylor was not authorized to make any exploration of the country with whose defense he was entrusted, nor any survey of its coasts, bays, harbors, inlets, etc. And this country was Texas, concerning which, there were ten thousand contradictory statements, and absolutely no reliable information whatever, - the Utopian dreamer and interested speculator representing it as the El Dorado of hope, the land of promise, - the disappointed settler as a timberless waste, fit only for the wild horse of the desert, and the gaunt wolf of the prairie. Time rolled on; the senior, in their wisdom refused to add another brilliant star to our glorious constellation. The "Tyler treaty" was rejected, but "the army of observation" was still left on the banks of the Sabine to inhale noxious vapors, and broil beneath a tropical sun, poorly sheltered by wretched huts and tents. Forgotten by all their friends, the devoted little corps awaited, with anxiety, the result of the stormy presidential contest, upon which their subsequent movements depended. A recent historian assures us, that democracies have a liquorish appetite for the acquisition of territory. In this instance, Mr. Allison's assertion proved an "axiomatic fact," as a Georgia member says. "The sovereigns" of our vast republic declared that they had not breathing space, and would have more, and adopting the rallying cry of "texas and Oregon," elected, by an overwhelming majority, the more territory candidate. Of course, the first measures of the new administration were directed to regain, if possible the rejected prize. The previous instructions to our Charge to "the republic of the lone star" were renewed. He was "to make liberal offers, to promise a large and splendidly appointed army, for the protection of the frontier, against the depredations of the marauding Mexicans," etc. Won by his overture, the Texans had once more consented to unite their destinies with the great American people. It remained for the new administration to make good those pledges. In compliance with our Charge's promise, the "army of observation," augmented by an artillery company from Carleston Harbor, S.C., was ordered to the southern frontier of Texas in midsummer, 1845. The "large" army, promised by our Charge, consisted then but of two regiments of infantry, one of dragoons, and a single company of artillery, in all fifteen hundred men. The authorities in Washington thought that there would be an immense sacrifice of life among troops sent upon an active campaign, to a tropical region in the month of July. They therefore ordered out a minimum force, which they deemed competent to guard the Texas frontier until time for the winter operations to begin. The "army of observation" was then the forlorn hope, the advanced guard, - to perish by disease or the sword of the enemy. To conceal its weakness, the pioneer detachment was baptized with the sounding title of "army of occupation," and it was pompously announced, that a magnificent corps of artillery was one of the elements of this army. But the Texas army was not only to be "large," but "splendidly appointed," also. Let us examine its splendid appointments.

The dragoon regiment had just been formed from a rifle corps, half of the men were raw, undisciplined recruits, many unable to ride; their horses recently purchased, were small, weak, and undrilled. The infantry regiments were enfeebled by their long exposure, in miserable tents, to the withering heat and drenching rains of a low southern latitude. The artillery were without their guns. Such was the "splendidly appointed" army sent to a distant frontier, to repel the invasion of a country numbering nine millions of inhabitants! But, although the army was small and inefficient, yet, doubtless, the plan of the campaign was masterly and ably executed under the auspices of Secretary Marcy, a hero of the last war, and a man of lofty order on intellect. We will see. In the latter part of June, 1845, an artillery company, equipped as infantry, at Fort Moultrie, Charleston, S.C., was ordered to New Orleans, there to receive further orders. This company, armed only with muskets, sailed from Charleston on the 26th of June; neither officers nor men having the remotest idea of the nature of the orders awaiting them in New Orleans. On their arrival in that city, the 19th July, they found that though ignorant themselves of their ultimate destination, the whole army, and all their citizens curious about military movements, had known it almost from the moment of their embarkation at Charleston. The expected instructions to the Lieutenant commanding, informed him that his company was to be mounted and equipped, as flying artillery, for the Texan campaign under Gen. Taylor, that horse would be sent him, and a battery for his use shipped from New York for, New Orleans, upon the arrival of which, he was ordered to proceed with it to join Gen. Taylor at the mouth of the Sabine. – As the age of giants, as well as that of chivalry, is gone, it would have been a serious undertaking for the company, unprovided with horses, to have dragged their cannon by hand through the marshes of Louisiana. Fortunately for them, they found Gen. Taylor in the crescent city, with a brigade of infantry, (the 3rd and 4th regiments,) ready to embark for Aransas bay, Texas, without having the slightest intention of approaching within two hundred miles of the Sabine. The 3rd infantry left New Orleans on the 21st, the 4th infantry and the company from Charleston, on the 23rd July. Their cannon no having arrived, the artillery sailed without them. These guns reached two months afterwards; their horses have not yet made their appearance! To some it may seem strange, that the artillery company was sent away with muskets only, leaving a splendid battery in park, at Fort Moultrie, where such battery was utterly useless, to await, in New Orleans, the arrival of another battery from Watervielet arsenal, with all the contingencies of delay in the outfit, delay in shipment, delay by baffling head winds, etc., etc. It was part of that wise, but mysterious policy of the war department, which only the initiated can understand.

Gen. Taylor sailed from New Orleans with three ships and two steamboats in search of the Bay of Aransas. His orders were to cross the Nueces, and he was told in New Orleans, the western coast of Texas was a terra incognita, and no reliable chart of it could be procured. A pilot, however, was at length obtained for enormous wages, who professed a thorough knowledge of the Texan waters in general and almost a friendly intimacy with the briny particles of the Bay of Aransas. He was put in charge of one of the vessels loaded with troops, and satisfactorily demonstrated, on his first entrance into port, that Texas pilots, unlike popes, are not always infallible, by running the vessel aground among the breakers, where it inevitably would have gone to pieces, had not timely assistance been rendered. The captain of another of the vessels sailed along the coast, in sight on land, for several days, seeking an inlet to enter. And when his ship was at length anchored of St. Joseph’s Island, he roundly asserted, that it was the island of Espirito Santo! Gen. Taylor has been blamed for not using the United States topographical chart. The accomplished and indefatigable chief of the topographical bureau had, with infinite pains and much ingenuity, prepared a map of Texas from a vast collection of Texan maps and charts, each one differing, in toto from all the others. Remembering the maxim, in medio veritas, and that the just middle is always just right, our worthy chief split the difference between them all, i.e., for instance, one map gave the length of some rivers, a hundred and twenty miles, and another but one hundred, he jotted down the length as one hundred and ten miles! The ingenious novelist, Dumas, wrote his fascinating incidents of travel without ever having been beyond the precincts of “the joyous city.” His thrilling adventure with brigands, and his perilous ascents of the Alps, by no means interfered with strolls on the Boulevards and saunters in the Champs Elysees. The French, with just pride, boast of the originality of their ingenious writer. – But surely we have more cause to celebrate the creative imagination and bold conception of our illustrious topographical chief. It was under the revelations of inspired genius, he was prompted to make a map of Texas in his cozy studies at Washington. – That was no ordinary mind, which conceived the bold design of making a map of a country thousands of miles distant, without or exploration, jotting down a shoal here, a reef there, an island in this place, and an inlet at that. The accuracy of this map may seem incredible, but we advisedly assert, that no place in Texas is more than 40 miles from its topographical position. Upon the whole we are disposed to exonerate Gen. Taylor from all blame in not using the geographical chart. In fact, he have heard that our distinguished topographical chief prized his pet bantling as the apple of his eye, and far too highly to entrust its guardianship to other hands. It is, therefore, highly probably, that Gen. Taylor was not provided with the ingenious chart.

By the 3rd of August, the whole “Army of Occupation” had landed at St. Joseph’s island, about thirty miles from the Nueces. In compliance with orders, that river was yet to be crossed. A spot on Corpus Christi bay near “Kinney’s Rancho,” and about three miles south of the Nueces, was selected as the site for the encampment. The Bay of Corpus Christi, though large and tempestuous, is connected with that of Aransas by a shallow tortuous channel. The army now found that, in their ignorance of the country, they had brought as lighters, steamboats drawing several feet of water too much for the channel. They were, therefore, unable to move from St. Joseph’s island, and by no possibility could have ever crossed the Nueces, with the means with which they left the United States. Fortunately for them, Kinney’s Rancho, a smuggling village, contained some light craft, which the smugglers generously proffered for a consideration. A few sail and row boats were chartered, at enormous rates, and, with these, a single company was first sent across the Nueces. A detachment of forty men, armed only with muskets, to begin the invasion of a populous nation! Forty men were landed on the enemy’s territory on the first day, but the average number per day afterwards, did not exceed thirty. The disembarkation of troops is usually effected under the protection of a powerful battery of cannon, but in this case, there was a necessary departure from the usages of war, as the guns of the artillery company were snugly housed in the Watervliet arsenal! Fifty resolute Mexicans, with one field piece, could have repelled all the skiffs that Gen. Taylor could have mustered, and prevented the landing of even a single United States soldier. Secretary Marcy projected the first campaign with infantry alone, that is to be met with in the annals of all times. Napoleon gained a diadem and immortality by despising the musty military maxims of his day. Surely our secretary deserves at least a congressional medal for inventing a new mode of invasion, regardless of the vulgar prejudice concerning the essential necessity of cooperation of dragoons and artillery with infantry. The economy of this original system of warfare will recommend it to those time and money-saving utilitarianists, who scoff at time hallowed opinions and usages, and are sturdy advocates of turnpikes and railroads to knowledge; soon may we expect them to add a shilling edition of “War made easy,” to their splendid library of cheap publications, such as “French,” “German,” and “Italian without a master,” “Astronomy taught in four lessons,” etc. etc. etc. We have said that our secretary was a man of lofty order of intellect, and has not his genius soared far above the loftiest flight of napoleonic? Even that skeptical general had some faith in the long established military principale, that infantry is weak and inefficient, unaided by the dragoons and artillery. But the Herculean mind of the modern Caesar, was not to be shackled by the vulgar prejudice, though hoary with age. The 2nd dragoons, an important, if not essential portion of the "Army of Occupation," were not put in motion from Fort Jessup, in time to cooperate with the infantry on their first landing at Corpus Christi, and did not arrive for a month afterwards. We have every confidence in the wisdom of the war department, and do therefore implicitly believe, that the dragoon regiments were delayed for some weighty reasons; perhaps it was to demonstrate the practicability of the secretary’s new mode of warfare.

Our sensitive pay department, taking seriously to heart the foul aspersion of being "mercenary." That has been cast upon the United States' troops, resolved to show the world, that they would endure the hardships of a campaign, and incur the dangers of the field, "without money and without price." To effect this noble design, a portion of them were therefore kept without pay for six months, and the rest for four months, although the law strictly requires payment every two months. All were without the prospect, almost, without the hope, of ever being paid, for although it was frequently reported that pay masters were coming, the oft told store was at length disregarded, and the soldiers began to believe the pay masters had dissolved in their own golden showers; and when a real live one actually showed himself in camp, he was an object of astonishment as the Grand Mogul would have been. The malicious have insinuated, that the nonappearance of the paymasters, for so long a period, was not owing to their wholesome dread of the Dons, and to their refined antipathy to the "tented field." We, however, are more charitable, and unhesitatingly give them credit for an honest, though mistaken, zeal to elevate the "hireling soldiery" in the yes of the "sovereign," so disinterested in all their actions. But although the pay masters, in their experimenting, were actuated by purer motives than the quarter masters, yet the pay like the mustang experiment, was disgraceful and melancholy in its results. Officers and soldiers, destitute of food, were compelled to borrow, upon the strength of pay due, of their more fortunate companions, or of the Shylocks in search of victims that polluted the camp. Sick soldiers directed by their surgeons to return to the United States, had either to remain and die, or to submit to being shaved by unfeeling villains in their pension certificates and pay accounts, and though the law requires the pay masters to cash them in specie. The soldiers who had encountered the parils of a dangerous coast without chart or pilot, who had braved the horrors (ideal though they were) of southern malaria, and a savage foe; who had endured hardships, discomforts, and privation, until disease was preying upon his vitals, was left to dies, like a dog, in camp, or owe his salvation to the tender mercies of note-shaving knaves! We decrepate a repetition of the cruel experiment of the pay department, though it showed, that the hands of the "mercenaries" would still grasp firmly their colors even when "yellow dirt" did not glue them there.

The cup of army suffering wanted but one drop more to be full to overflowing; that drop was not wanting long. On the first landing of the 3rd and 4th infantry at Corpus Christi. "Kinney's Rancho," though a lawless, smuggling town, under the vigorous sway of its martial proprietor, was as quite and peaceful as a village in New England.
But every fresh arrival of troops was followed by some portion of that vast horde of liquor selling harpies, that are ever to be found in the train of all armies, ready to prey upon the simple and unsuspecting among the soldiers. In a short time, hundreds of temporary structures were erected on the outskirts of the "Rancho," and in them, all the cut-throats, thieves, and murderers of the United States and Texas, seemed to have congregated. No sight could have been more truly melancholy that of southern malaria, and a savage foe; who had endured hardships, discomforts, and privation, until disease was preying upon his vitals, was left to dies, like a dog, in camp, or owe his salvation to the tender mercies of note-shaving knaves! We decrepate a repetition of the cruel experiment of the pay department, though it showed, that the hands of the "mercenaries" would still grasp firmly their colors
even when "yellow dirt" did not glue them there.
man thousands of miles off, who ignorant and regardless of their wrongs and sufferings! The high compliments of veterans, who had served in Europe, were perhaps not merely idle words, when they said, that “the soldiers of the ‘Army of Occupation,’ in discipline, military skill, and martial bearing, were not inferior to the choicest troops that rallied around the eagles of Napoleon.

Although we have already extended this article beyond our original intention, we cannot conclude it without adverting, once more, to the inefficiency and shameful misconduct of the quarter master’s department. With the expectation of remaining in camp, at Corpus Christi, during the rainy season, General Taylor, at its commencement, ordered the quarter master to provide tent floors, so that the troops might not be compelled to sleep in the mud and water. With all the enterprise that so distinguishes their department, they did succeed, in less than four months, in procuring plank for tent floors, but not until the rainy season was over, and General Taylor was daily expecting orders to break up his encampment. Without a single accruing benefit, all that expense was incurred, which might have materially contributed to the comfort and health of the army.

Again, six months after the army had taken the field, there were not teams and wagons enough to transport one half of the troops; so that, in case of hostilities, had a forward movement been ordered, it could only have been effected by detachments and, in consequence, that most fatal of all military error would have been committed, of permitting the enemy to attack and beat the detail. The few teams furnished, it is natural to think, were the choicest to be found in the west. For, it had been said, that though the ‘Army of Occupation’ was small, the great celerity of its movements, from the superiority of American horses, would contribute, as well as the greater bravery of its men, to make it more than a match for the largest Mexican force. Can any one for a moment suppose, that the quartermasters were insane enough to adopt the weakness of their enemy, - to harness their baggage wagons and provision trains, Mexican horses instead of American? How then can it be believed, that they only purchase little mustangs and oxen, to ensure rapidity in military operations; though the mustang is as much inferior to the Mexican horse as the Mexican is to the American? Ninety yoke of oxen and several hundred mustangs were bought, but not a single American horse. Such madness is rarely to be found beyond the walls of a lunatic asylum.

We have said that three batteries of artillery were added to the one which, at length reached the company from Charleston. Horses were sent with two of them, to maneuver them rapidly on the field of battle, and to transport them wherever the army might go. But the third came unprovided with horses, - none have yet been furnished it, and, if General Taylor advances to the Rio Grande, as he now has permission to do, it must be left on the ground at Corpus Christi, or to be dragged by oxen, - and, in that case, be useless in an engagement. For all the services that this battery can render, it might as well be at Fort Monroe, Va., whence it came.

When the New Orleans volunteers left Corpus Christi, their artillery horse were turned over to the company from Charleston. This company, having always acted as infantry, had never even seen a flying artillery drill, - half of the men could not ride, - many had never ridden at all, and, in mounting for the first time, made Mr. Wu \'inkle's mistake as to which stirrup to use. It was certainly an original idea in our secretary, and one worthy of his genius, to convert, in a single day, a company of foot into light artillery. The military authorities say, that very few soldiers are fit for the light artillery arm, - that it requires picked men, bold and expert horsemen, etc. - and that these only become good light artillerists after long practice in riding, driving, managing, and attending their horses, and in using the sabre; - and our secretary, untrammeled by the musty maxims, decided that his selection and long practice was entirely useless, and that all that was necessary was simply to write light company, A or B, instead of company A or B, and, presto, the men would ride like Cossacks, and drive like Jehus. However, as horses had at length been given to the company from Charleston, it was the ardent desire of the lieutenant commanding – the peculiar views of the secretary to the contrary notwithstanding, - to teach his men to ride and drive, and the sabre exercise. This seeming reflection on the quartermaster resolved to prevent, and, at the same time, to show to the world how economical they were. They, therefore, refused to purchase any more hay and told the dragoons and light artillery, that they, themselves, must cut and haul the dry and sapless broom straw of the prairie, and forage their horse on that. We approve this measure, - it was good economy; and it taught the men the use of the scythe. We all know that it is far more important to tech troops to mow, than to be expert in military exercises, because farmers are more needed in a campaign than soldiers. Oh, that the golden vision and poetic fancies of our quartermasters could be realized. We should see meek oxen with dilated nostrils and sparkling eyes, proudly dashing along eith splendid batteries of artillery; we should see the fiery natives of the prairie, the wild mustangs with slow plodding pace, quietly dragging cart loads of pork and beans; we should see men who had been shivering all day from want of fires, in the wet and cold, lying laughingly at night in mud and water; we should see fierce veterans, whose delight was to inhale the reeking atmosphere of the carnage field, laying aside their muskets, and grasping their scythes, in order that they might enjoy the perfumes of the new mown hay; truly we should see such wondrous changes on this little globe of ours, as would make us fancy ourselves in another planet! – Both dragoons and infantry were compelled to suspend drills and military exercises, and turn farmers in earnest. But in consequence of the horrible condition of the prairie, they were not able, with the most strenuous exertions, to procure a sufficiency of the juiceless broom straw; so that, for days in succession, during the terrible months of November and December their horses were without a mouthful of this wretched substitute for hay. The suffering of these poor animals, under the terrible “northers,” would have softened the hearts of the most unfeeling miser, and would have induced him to open his purse strings for the purchase of nutritious forage; but our conscientious quartermasters, in their scrupulous care of the public funds, refused, thought with hearts bleeding with compassion, to incur what they deemed an unnecessary expense. – Those in the encampment, who could not appreciate the Brutus like firmness of the quarter masters, insinuated that, as the army regulations positively require them to furnish an abundance of the best forage, they by dispensing with some of their superfluous luxuries purchased with the United States’ money, might have relieved the sufferings of the horses, and, at the same time, retrenched the public expenditures. We decline expressing any opinion on the subject, as we could not see their hearts, and read the high motives at work there.
But we could deprecate the cruel system of economy, did we not feel in our inmost heart, the essential necessity of teaching soldiers how to use a scythe. In order, however, to teach this sublime art, it was found necessary to sacrifice much military instruction. We have said, that on taking the field, one of the companies of light infantry had never been drilled at all; and that the regiment of dragoons having been formed but a short time previous, a large number of the men never having been taught to ride. As all drilling had to be suspended for foraging purposes, the artillery company, at this moment, cannot perform a single maneuver or evolution on the field – and many of the “blood dragoons” dare not venture a brisker gait than an honest, plough horse canter. – And yet, it has been the earnest desire of both the light artillery and dragoon officers and soldiers, to perfect themselves in the duties of their particular service. We admire the zeal of the quarter masters for retrenchment, but would it not be better economy to disband the undrilled light artillery company, and the dragoons who cannot ride, since both must be useless in an engagement!
Would it not be still greater economy, to disband the whole “Army of Occupation?”
The medical department has been indefatigable in its exertions to relieve the sufferings in camp, and the commissariat has furnished an abundant supply of excellent provisions. But, if an advance movement be made towards the Rio Grande, we learn, that with the present inadequate means of transportation, there will be dreadful suffering among the troops, from want of medical stores and the necessities of life. We remember that though commissary supplies, in the greatest profusion, have been furnished the unfortunate Winchester, the quarter master’s department, inefficient then as now, having provided no horses, his brave troops could only secure rations for a few days, by harnessing themselves to wagons, and, when led into battle, had been subsisting on nuts and bark for a week. The rejoicings around the war fires of the Indians, and the wailings of the houses of Kentucky, announced the melancholy result of this wretched state of things. We are no croakers, and we believe, that in courage, discipline, and efficiency, our soldiers are inferior to no troops in the world, - but as human ingenuity has been tortured to the utmost in inventing obstacles and obstructions to impede and employ them, may we not fear that the terrible scenes of the River Raisin may be witnessed again on the banks of the Rio Grande? [JCB]

NNR 70.272 Reynosa and Camargo taken

Mexican War. – Latest. The Fashion, landed troops from N. Orleans at Brazos Santiago, all well, and left there on the 14th instant. The captain thinks the distance can easily be performed from N. Orleans to that port in 60 hours. Just before leaving a report reached Brazos, that Reinosa and Camargo, had both surrendered to Col.
Wilson without resistance. [JCB]

Most of the regulars are on the right of the river; Capt. Desha and the Washington and Jackson regiments of La. on the left.

The Alabama companies, St. Louis and Louisville Legions are at Brazos Island. Col. Dankin’s Peyton’s, Davisis’, and Featherston’s regiments of Louisiana volunteers are at Brazos. [JCB]

NNR 70.272 Gov. James Pinckney Henderson reaches Rio Grande accompanied by Tonkawa Indians

Gov. Henderson, at the head of about one thousand Texas troops, reached the banks of the Rio Grande on the 10th inst. Seventeen warriors of the Tonkaway tribe of the Indians accompanied the Texans. The sight of these Indians created much alarm to the inhabitants of Matamoros and its vicinity, as they fear that Gen. Taylor will let them loose upon them. [JCB]

NNR 70.273 March on Barita

We have Brazos Santiago, dates to the 20th, brought to New Orleans by the steamer James L. Day.

Col. Edward Featherston’s regiment, took up their line of march for Burrita, on the 19th.

Reinosa was taken possession of by the detachment under Col. Wilson, without opposition. Canales published an order a few days before Wilson reached Reinosa, calling the citizens to their allegiance and commanding them to hold no communication with the Americans. He, it is believed, was in, or near the town, and had expressed himself desirous of having a “talk” with Wilson. The supposition is that his band is within the immediate vicinity of Reinosa, and should an opportunity present itself, would co-operate with such of the rancheros as might wish to dispute the progress of the Colonel’s march. A great many of the citizens kept aloof or had quitted the place. Col. Wilson encamped in the public square of Reinoso, on the 11th, thinking it impossible to throw up fortifications. The place was nearly deserted. [JCB]

70.273 July 4, 1846 deaths of Mexican wounded, deserters from Mexican forces

A Mexican captain, wounded in the battle of the 9th, died at Matamoros, on the 15th, and the church bells were tolled throughout the day. Nearly all of the prisoners in the hospitals have recovered or died of their wounds. Near 200 deserters from the enemy have arrived here amongst their friends, who state that many others are on the road. [JCB]

It is said that Gen. Arista and Gen. Ampudia have both been taken to Mexico to answer for the recent defeats of the army, or Ampudia is sent for to sustain the charges against Arista. Many Mexicans believe that Arista sold his army to the Americans. [JCB]

Major Gen. Gaines. A court of Inquiry, to consist of Brevet Brig. Gens. H. Brady an G.M. Brooke, and Col. J. Crane, members, and Brevet Capt. J.F. Lee, recorder, is ordered by the president to assemble at Fort Monroe, on the 18th of July, to investigate the late conduct of Major Gen. Gaines, in calling upon governors of states for volunteers, in organizing and mustering certain volunteers, and in giving orders to officers since 1st of May, 1846, for subsistence, stores, &c., and for payment to certain individuals or bodies of men, &c. NNR 70.273 July 4, 1846 Yucatan declares independence

Yucatan. The congress of Yucatan have declared independence, and no longer admit the authority of the Mexican government. A vessel from thence has arrived at New Orleans under the national flag of the new republic, which exhibits three stars, in the manner of our union flag.

The design of the Yucatanese to take this step, was suspected by our naval officer in command on the Mexican coast, at the time he received information of the declaration of war, and he dispatched a sloop of war to communicate with the authorities, at the same time exempting their coast from the general blockade, until he ascertained the facts.

It will be recollected that the Yucatanese sent a deputation to the United States, asking to be admitted into the Union, long before the annexation of Texas was proposed at all. The United States government declined to recognize the commissioners. – A war ensued between Yucatan and Mexico, which was terminated, after the defeat of a Mexican army, by a treaty, in which Yucatan agreed upon certain conditions, to return to their allegiance to Mexico. They now assert that those conditions have not been fulfilled on the part of Mexico, and once more they proclaim independence. [JCB]

NNR 70.273 July 4, 1846 revolution in favor of Gen. Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna and federalism at Jalisco

A revolution in the province of Jalisco, commenced on the 20th of May, in the city of Guadalajara. The battalion of Lagos, followed by other bodies of military and by the enthusiastic populace, attacked the palace of the governor. The assault was so prompt that the defenders had scarcely time for a single discharge of artillery, by which one man only was killed and one wounded. This cry of the assailants was "Long live the Republic, and death to a Foreign Prince." The revolution as to that department was conclusive. The government commander had to submit, and was allowed only to the 22nd to quit with his forces for the city of Mexico. The 6th article of the treaty dictated by the revolutionists, was to the following effect.

“As Gen. Don Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna had the glory of founding the Republic, and whatever may have been his errors, has been its strongest support, in spite of policy of Europe and the instigations of some perverse Mexicans, and opposed himself to the usurpations by North America; the garrison of Jalisco proclaims the said general as the chief of the grand enterprise for which this plan is entered into.” [JCB]

NNR 70.274 July 4, 1846 a plea for peace
Amongst the incidents of the day in which we live, the organizations of a Peace Society, embracing philanthropists of many nations and Christian members of many denominations, is a remarkable incident. Their ramifications have extended into associations throughout several countries. It is hoped that good may come of so humane an object. Such certainly should be the influence of concentrated efforts from such a body of men, most of whom are individually respectable, some highly influential in communities amongst whom they labor and with the government under which they live, especially in an age when public opinion is coming into so much sway, and cannot well be disregarded.

Another movement, not less striking, and perhaps more practical in its influences, as it is far more simple and unpretending in its measures, and apparently better adopted to the object proposed, has grown out of the late apprehension of a war between England and America, and which deserves to be recorded.

It is well known that the Society of Friends, or Quakers, have been pioneers as a society in many of the most benevolent reforms of the last two centuries. They were the first to testify against the African slave trade, and to protest against their members holding their fellow men in a state of slavery, - the first to move in the temperance reform, having for a century been in that respect, a temperate society, - the first of the modern religious sects to assert the principles on which the peace society, above referred to, is predicated.

We mention the foregoing facts merely as an introduction to the incident that follows.

Another reform, for which the Society of Friends ought to have credit, or for which they should be accountable, as the case may be, is that of recognizing to a large extent, the equality of the female sex with that of males, in departments of church, as well in social relations. Females are allowed to preach as ministers of the gospel, and the females have their own meetings separate from those of the males, in which their church affairs are conducted.

There has been, nevertheless, a certain control exercised by the males, in their meetings over that, or at least in correspondence with the meetings of the females.

The earnest effort of the Friend’s Society has ever been exerted for the prevention of war, and for the preservation or restoration of peace to the nations. When it was perceived that there was danger of a war between Great Britain and America, the subject was introduced in one or more of the regular meetings, and measures were proposed for an appeal to the friends of peace in both countries to endeavor to avert so awful an evil.

One of the female meetings that at Exeter, a populous town near the center of England, understanding that the subject was agitated in the meeting of the males, proposed to associate in the labor of love. After some consideration, the men’s meeting declined this offer, as deeming the subject more immediately belonging to their sex.

With this conclusion, the female meeting at Exeter was not entirely satisfied, and they decided to originate a movement of their own, and to execute it in their own characteristic way.

The meeting prepared an address from the females of Exeter, in England, to the females of Philadelphia, upon the subject. We had a copy of the address, and as it was brief, and breathed the spirit of affectionate regard to human family, we intended to insert it, but it has been mislaid. It was signed by 1,623 women of Exeter, and forwarded by one of the steamers that arrived during the last month.

The females of Philadelphia have promptly responded to this movement of their sisters over the big waters.

A large meeting assembled in consequence of the following notice:

"The women of Philadelphia are particularly invited to a meeting to be held at the Franklin Hall, Sixth St., at 4 o’clock, to hear and reply to an address from 1,623 women of Exeter, England, to the women of Philadelphia, on the subject of peace. As this is a subject which appeals to the highest interests of mankind, a large and general attendance is requested.

Mrs. Sidney Ann Lewis, J.R. Chandler, Sarah Tyndale, Lucretia Mott, R.V. Massey, Win. Morrison, Miss Sarah Pugh, Hannah L. Stickney, Susan Grew, and Margaret Jones, Mrs. J.N. Bennett.

In conformity to the above call, a meeting was organized by electing Mrs. Sarah Pugh, president, and Mrs. Anne D. Morrison, Secretary.

The address of the women of England was then read and received with demonstrations of much satisfaction.

The following address was then read by Lucretia Mott, and adopted in answer:

From the women of Philadelphia, U.S.A, in answer to the friendly address of the women of Exeter, England, on the subject of peace.

Dear friends and sisters: Your communication has met with a cordial reception by us. Heartily do we respond to your earnest desire, that so terrible a calamity as war between your country and ours, may never come upon us. We feel assured that the fraternal addresses, sent by thousands of English men and women, will do much to avert so fearful an evil.

We rejoice that your attention has been awakened to this subject, and that you have been thus ready to acknowledge the bond of human brotherhood – a bond far more holy, than that mistaken patriotism “which would make the people of two nations whose interests are identical, enemies of each other, thus impeding the progress of peace and good will to man.”

We hold it to be the duty of women to look with an attentive eye, upon the great events which are transpiring around them; in order that, with an enlightened judgement, as well as with a feeling heart, they may direct the force of their moral influence against the iniquitous spirit of war. Great is the responsibility of woman in relation to this subject. The false love of glory, the cruel spirit of revenge, the bloodthirsty ambition, swelling in the breast of the soldier on the battle field – these are often but the ripened harvest, from the seed sown by the mother’s hand, when in his childish hours, she gave him tiny weapons, and taught him how to mimie war’s murderous game.

Let us then, dear sisters, be unceasingly faithful in all our relations, whether of the social circle, or the more extended sphere, employing the mighty influences that cluster around the domestic hearth and the way-side, the pen and the press, in bearing testimony to the superiority of Christian love and forgiveness, over the law of physical force.

We are gratified that the late difficulties between our countries are in progress of amicable settlement – but let us not forget that we have other brethren entitled to our sympathy, urging upon us the duty in impress upon the heart of this generation the idea of the brotherhood of the race. The war waged by your government against India, and that of ours against Mexico, admonish us that it is now, as ever, important to instill the principles of justice, mercy, and peace.

For your word of counsel and cheer, we thank you; and would unite with you in prayer, that the kingdom of our Father in heaven may come; and the Gospel of His dear Son, breathing peace on earth and good will to men, may extend from “sea to sea, and from the rivers to the ends of the earth.”

After adopting the address, a committee was appointed to further the object, and in the course of a few days 3,525 signatures, of which the editor of the Philadelphia Inquirer takes occasion to say: “We looked over the signatures with no little delight. All were clearly and distinctly written, and many in a style of elegant penmanship. The address is about two yards long, and embraces 24 sheets foolscap. The Exeter document was signed by 1,623, so that the response contains more than double that number of signatures. Mr. Peter, the British consul for Philadelphia, has kindly consented to forward the response – the whole matter being under the care of Elihu Burritt, the “learned blacksmith,” whose praiseworthy efforts in the cause of peace, entitle him to the kindly regards of every friend of humanity. The movement reflects infinite credit upon our mothers, wives, and daughters.

The province of the female in this transaction is certainly far more appropriately presented, than in the instance which we find commended in the following paragraph: [JCB]
NNR 70.274 July 4, 1846 toast to the Heroine of Fort Brown

“Among the toasts offered at the entertainment which was given at Matamoros by Gen. Taylor to the committee of the Louisiana legislature, was the following, by Lieut. Bragg, of the artillery:

The Heroine of Fort Brown. In offering this toast he said that “during the whole of the bombardment the wife of one of the soldiers, whose husband was ordered with the army to Point Isabel, remained in the fort, and though the shot and shells were constantly flying on every side, she disdained to seek shelter in the bomb-proofs, but labored the whole time cooking and taking care of the soldiers, without the least regard to her own safety. Her bravery was the admiration of all who were in the fort, and she has thus acquired the name of “The Great Western.” [JCB]

NNR 70.276 July 4, 1846 discussion of general officers chosen to conduct the war with Mexico

Congress have decided, after very brief discussion, some knotty points in relation to the command of the armies, and to the appointment of officers for the volunteer army.

The president a few weeks since, gave or signified his intention to give the command of the army, ambracing both the regular army and the volunteer forces, intended to operate against Mexico, to Major General Scott, as senior officer of the United States army. Before he quit the capital on that service, a misunderstanding occurred: he was deprived of the command and retained in service at the seat of government.

A bill within the same brief period was brought in, and after warm debate, was passed into a law, by congress, Which authorizes the president at the close of the existing war with Mexico to reduce the number of officers which the state of war may call into service, by striking from the roll any of the major generals, so as to leave but one in service on restoration of peace. We know not whether the object contemplated was, or was not, to enable the government to remove either General Scott or General Gaines, or both of the old generals, Scott and Gaines, from the army, but certain it is the apprehension that such will be the result, is very general.

The command of “the Army of Occupation” has been confirmed to General Taylor, - "Old rough and ready." As he was but a colonel in lineal rank, a brigade general only by brevet, it was necessary to promote him, or other officers now ordered to the Rio Grande would have outranked him. He had won a fair title to promotion; the government has promptly awarded it, and the people applaud the measure. General Taylor is now a major general in the United States army, - and in command of the force now concentrated upon the banks of the Rio Grande.

For the command of the volunteer forces, the law which passed congress this week, and dates 26th of June, 1846, authorizes the president to appoint two major generals, and eight brigade generals.

William O. Butler, of Kentucky, was nominated and has been confirmed by the senate as a major general under the act.

Gen'l Patterson, of Philadelphia, is nominated as the other major general, and will no doubt also be confirmed.

Six of the eight brigadier generals authorized by the law, have been nominated to the senate.

The present arrangements in relation to the command of the army destined for the invasion of Mexico we understand to be, that General Taylor will move one division from the Rio Grande, towards the city of Mexico.

Gen. Wool of the United States army, in command of the division which is now mustering in the northwest, will move forthwith upon Upper California.

Col. Kearney, United States army, will command a division which is already concentrating at Fort Leavenworth, and is to proceed against Santa Fe. – We may throw in a few interesting items as to this service, clipped from papers just received. [JCB]

NNR 70.276-277 various incidents of the late battles, the field after battle, &c.

A visit to the battle fields. A correspondent of the New Orleans Picayune, writing from point Isabel, says:

I left Matamoros yesterday morning, in company with captains Ramsay and Hardee, and four dragoons, and on the route to this place had another view of the two battle grounds. Resaca de la Palma battle ground is covered with the graves of our fallen countrymen, who fell, many of them, fighting hand to hand with the enemy. Terribly were they avenged, however, on the spot, for their antagonists are buried around them by hundreds. I was shown one grave, near the spot where brave Cochrane was interred, in which some eight Mexicans are said to have been placed, and there are many more which contain a score or two each of slaughtered foe. The grave of poor Inge was pointed out to me. It is near where one of the enemy’s batteries was posted. It was with feelings of deep sadness that I recalled to mind the many virtues of this gallant and noble-hearted officer. He had left a young wife in Baltimore, and had arrived at Point Isabel with a body of recruits, just in time to march with general Taylor; had distinguished himself in both battles by his heroic bearing, and fell at the moment when that brilliant victory, to which he contributed so largely, was about to declare itself in favor of our arms. – Mexican caps and remnants of their clothing are scattered here and there over the battle ground, and the whole field is dotted with marks of the enemy’s camp fires. It is a wild looking place, and advantageous was the position of the enemy, that it will ever remain a wonder to me that our little army was not entirely cut to pieces by their greatly superior force. Over a great portion of the ground on which our army prepared to attack them, the thickets are so dense that a dog would find it difficult to penetrate them. The men actually pushed each other through these thickets, and were divided into snail squads of three to six.

The Palo Alto battle field, on this side, near the edge of the chaparrals, is an open prairie, quite level, and a most magnificent place for the meeting of two armies. The positions of the Mexican lines were pointed out to me, and we rode over part of the field where the battle raged the hottest. They are represented as having presented a very warlike as well as wild and picturesque appearance as our troops approached them; their compact line extending from an elevated point of chaparrals on their right, about a mile; their left extending across the road near its entrance to the pass. I visited the place where some of their heavy artillery opened upon our army, and against which our two 18 pounders were for a time directed. Convincing evidences of the skill with which our artillery was used against them was still perceptible upon that part of the field; for although they were permitted to bury their dead, and afterwards returned in numbers and spent considerable time in that employment, I counted some thirty dead bodies, stretched out as they fell, in that immediate vicinity.

Some had been nearly severed in two by cannon ball, others had lost part of the head, both legs, a shoulder, or the whole stomach. Of many of them nothing but the bones, encased in uniform, was left; whilst others had been transformed into mummies, and retained the expression of countenance which their death agonies had stamped upon them. One man had been shot between the hips with a large ball, lay doubled up as he fell, with his hands extended and his face downward between his knees. – Another whose shoulders and back were shot away, seemed to have died in the act of uttering a cry of horror. Dead horses were scattered about in every direction, and the buzzards and wild dogs were fattened upon the carrion.

The Battles of Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma. But now the eventful moment was drawing nigh, and scarcely had we entered the second chaparral, when word came from the advance that the enemy were in force at Resaca de la Palma, and within five hundred yards of the advance guard. Orders were immediately given to park the wagons, and from the order of battle. The wagons were placed as designated in the map, and the artillery brigade, with Duncan’s battery left to protect them. Capt. Kerr’s squadron coving the extreme rear. – The 3rd, 4th, 8th, and 5th infantry, with May’s squadron, were posted along the road, within the chaparral. Gen. Taylor the ordered Ridgely, with his battery to go forward and clear the way – Capts. McCall and Smith to deploy on the right and left, as skirmishers, until reinforced by the 5th and 8th. – Ridgely waited not a moment, but started his battery at full speed, determined to have no more long faw shooting, but to test the Mexican metal at close quarters. As he charged, with one loud shot from his men, the Mexicans opened their artillery and musketry upon him. On he went, until he halted within one hundred yard of the muzzle of the enemy’s pieces and commenced the action. Smith and McCall soon deployed, and engaged the infantry.

The fire from the Mexican guns was awful. The infantry were engaged within twenty paces of Ridgely’s battery, and the whole fire of their nine pieces concentrated on his battery, the first shot from the Mexican battery knocked over one man and three horses at our first piece. The enemy fired too high, as on the day before. The 5th and 6th infantry soon came up, deployed as skirmishers, and took a hand in the game – the space separating the two lines of infantry not exceeding twenty paces. Our men and officers seemed particularly determined to have a close hug of the enemy, and so cool and collected were all hands, that not a shot was thrown away. – The command from one end of the line to the other was, not to fire until you could see the whites of their eyes.

At this time, no adequate idea can be had of the showers of grape, canister, and round shot that flew from the enemy’s batteries – it was a perfect hailstorm. Their battery, composed of nine pieces kept up an incessant roar, whilst Ridgely gave it to them at a rate of four guns per minute from each piece. The cannoneers threw off their coats, tied their suspenders around their waists, rolled their sleeves to the shoulder, and plied the match unceasingly. For twenty minutes the battery, supported by the 5th and 8th bore the concentrated fire of the enemy. As yet the enemy budged not an inch, but soon the entering wedge was placed; the 5th and 8th, under cover of our battery, tried the effect of cold steel, and wherever a soldier missed the Mexican with his shot, he advanced – as did the brave Mexican – and whoever got the first stab at the other was a lucky man.

A moment before this enemy pressed Ridgely’s battery very hard; the infantry covering his battery, in deploying, got to far at times from his pieces, and left them exposed. I was requested by Ridgely to ride back and say to the general that they were pressing his pieces hard, to send up some infantry. I at once did so, and met the general riding along as though nothing was going on. – He replied to the message – “Oh, never mind! He is doing very well. Let him alone – there is no fear of him.” I returned and found them driving the enemy.

By this time the 3rd and 4th came gallantly on, deploying on the right and the left. Then came the heavy blows that kept the wedge moving. First came a round from the battery, then a blow from the left by the 8th and 4th; and so it was – the word was “Push along – keep moving!” until our men stood on the same ground that had been held by their infantry, and which was then covered by their dead and wounded.

By this time General Taylor was up in the front rank of the fight, with Colonel McIntosh, Pyne, and his staff. His attention was riveted on Ridgely’s battery as though wondering if it were possible a light artillery battery could do so much service: - entre nous, the general was not particularly an advocate of this arm before this campaign. Very soon it appeared as though the enemy in retiring with their batteries across the ravine to the point C, had arranged it so as to have the General and Ridgely’s battery both in their line of fire, for the grape flew thick and fast around him. Adj't General Bliss advised him to change his position, but no, he saw very well from where he was, and did not leave it for some time.

At this time the struggle was tremendous, the infantry had captured one piece of artillery on this side of the ravine, and was charging across the pond of water. At times an intervals would be left between two of our companies, and the Mexicans would charge across the ravine and take apposition there. – In one instance, Lieutenant Deas, the gallant adjutant of the 5th, with ten me, asking me to rally as many more and follow, charged into the bushes where a party of Mexicans on our side of the ravine, were obstinately disputing inch by inch with our men, and after placing men in position, we wheeled to ride out for reinforcement, when seven Mexicans jumped from behind us, and within ten paces of us, and fired, as we charged past them without doing any injury, however the consequence. For some time the cannonading and musketry, though doing tremendous execution, could not drive the enemy, but at last, as the infantry closed the distance, the enemy had to move. Every regiment of infantry did its duty, the fighting assumed the character hand to hand combat, the bayonet was crossed and the sword was used. Ridgely still plied the dash of grape and round shot with terrible effect; his Lieuts. Shover, Fremont, and French, were often engaged in carrying ammunition to the guns and loading them. Just here, Lt. Duncan came up with his battery, but was unable to bring it into action for some time, from the fact that there was no room to place it and open on the enemy without endangering our own infantry in front.
The enemy again waived. Gen Taylor ordered Captain May to charge the battery, and on he started; but on reaching the point of the road where he would have been discovered by the enemy, he was stopped by Ridgely, who told him that the enemy had just loaded all their pieces, and if he charged then, he would be swept away. "Stop," says Ridgely, "until I draw their fire;" when he deliberately fired each gun; so terrible was the effect of the grape, that the Mexicans poured their fire upon his piece, and then May charged like a bullet, drove off their cannoneers, took La Vega prisoner, and retreated. Here Lieutenant Inge, a noble, gallant soldier, charged at the head of the squadron, was killed and stripped. Lieutenant Sackett, than whom there is no better officer, had his horse shot under him, and was pitched head foremost into the pond, rose again, covered with mud and water, and escaped. The squadron suffered very much. I am sure Charley May feels grateful to Ridgely for his cool judgement and timely advice. He had charged on the battery, loaded with grape as it was, I do not believe he would have saved a man.

The Mexicans returned to their guns, and immediately the 5th infantry took the matter in hand, and resolved to try the bayonet again. On they went, and piece by piece fell before their determined bravery, until the entire battery was taken. The infantry and cannoneers fought hand to hand between the wheels. Ridgely and Duncan then pushed their batteries across the ravine, and both opened on the retreating enemy. The 5th, 8th, 3rd, and 4th were all across, having each driven everything before them. The route commenced, the whip was applied, and the battle was won again. The 5th charged on the enemy's camp, where the savory odor of the dinner in the act of preparing for a grand jubilee by the Mexicans had probably lured them, knowing that the Mexicans would fight the harder for his dinner. Here the struggle was short; they captured everything, even to Arista's private baggage and portfolio, their entire camp equipage, and 300 mules.

Now my dear sir, how can I describe to you the personal acts of bravery – not only in one instance but in twenty – and not simply by the officer, but by the common soldier. The whole battle was fought by individual squads, led sometimes by an officer and frequently by the non-commissioned officers. I could not say too much for every man engaged. So eager were our men for the fight that I cannot better describe their enthusiasm than to give you the idea that struck me: it was this: Every man, officer and soldier seemed impressed with the idea that there was but a given quantity of fighting to be had – not enough for every man to have his fill of it – and, therefore, it became every one to get what he could as soon as possible.

Instances there were where one man in charging upon their batteries leaped astride their pieces and holding on with one hand bet of the gunners with their swords, and were cut down.

An instance occurred when in a charge upon a piece lieut. Joran was attacked by 2 Mexicans and bayonetted in two places, when lieut. Lincoln of the 8th, rushed up and with his own sabre made perfect mince meat of the two. Again, when Ridgely charged with his battery across the ravine, and was standing at one of his pieces, he was charged on by three lancers, he mounted his horse and drove them off with his own sabre. But it would take a volume to recite the whole, and I am sure that in gen. Taylor's detailed report all will appear – the fact is every man was a hero.

And let me not overlook the non-commissioned officers and privates, to them the country owes a deep debt of gratitude for their unflinching bravery during both days. As to our good general and his intelligent and efficient staff, too much cannot be said – the peals of approbation are heard from Maine to Georgia, and the page of history will be graced through time with the names of Taylor. [JCB] government, would have rejoiced in a new political existence. The halt upon the left bank of the Rio Grande afforded an opportunity to the Mexican agents and priests to appeal to the people and assure them that the Americans were their common enemies."

The author of the article, in memoranda, which he has appended, states that the Paredes revolution was extensively a military one, to which a large portion of the Mexican people are opposed – that the provinces of Tamaulipas, New Leon, Coahuila, San Luis de Potosi, Zacatecas, and Chihuahua, are especially opposed to the Paredes movement, and only await a favorable moment to declare in force their opposition. Gen. Arista, it is said, desires the independence of these provinces, and would have set up the standard of revolt some months since, and previously to the Paredes demonstration, if the troops of the United States had taken a strong position on the Rio Grande.

The writer then enters on his plan of campaign, in some detail, which is as follows: first stating that the naval operations in the Gulf of Mexico should be strictly confined to the blockade of the ports of Mexico, and the possessions of Tampico, with a view to its establishment as the main depot of supply to the army after it reached the Panuco of Tampico river and San Luis de Potosi.

"The coast of the Pacific should be blockaded, and Monterey and St. Francisco taken possession of by the naval forces in the Pacific. The reasons for this are briefly stated: The reduction of St. Juan d'Ulloa could only be effected, if properly defended, by great loss, and when taken would exhibit a point in our possession neither affording facilities as a depot nor as a starting point for an invading army on the city of Mexico. The road leading from Mexico to Vera Cruz could easily be defended by a very inferior force. The force considered necessary to march upon Panuca is the thousand men; say five thousand regulars and five thousand volunteers, of which there should be three thousand Texans, who have held arms in their hands for ten years, and two thousand volunteers from Louisiana. If more troops were required, the northern provinces of Mexico would furnish them, under able officers, of whom General Arista is acknowledged to be the ablest. – The squadron operating before Tampico should be supplied with one thousand marines and artillerists, to assist in the reduction of that place. The plan of campaign is as follows: Five thousand men march from Loredo, on Satillo. The two columns march on converging roads to San Luis Potosi, and the communication with Tampico along the line of the Panuco is established. The Panuco thus becomes the base of operations, from which negotiations with Mexico would most probably be begun. If the government of Mexico, after being reinforced by ten thousand men, the principal part of which might be landed at Tampico.

"The road from Mier to Monterey, and thence to San Luis de Potosi, is said the be a very good one, and the country affords ample provisions and water. The road from Laredo, by Satillo, afford equal facilities except, in the supply of water on a distance of forty-eight miles only. This distance could be overcome in two days by forced marches. The object in marching in two columns to San Luis de Potosi is to secure the only two roads leading to that point from the Rio Grande. A favorable impression would also be produced among the population by the prudent conduct of the troops. A detachment must remain at Laredo to observe the road to San Antonio, and keep the Indians in check. One thousand mounted riflemen should be assembled at Bent's Fort, and march thence on Santa Fe. It would only be necessary to send 2, 000 regulars to the present army of occupation, and raise 5,000 volunteers, which could be effected in one month from the date of orders. In six weeks the whole army could be en route beyond the Rio Grande. In thirty days after, the line of the Panuco will be established. This brief memoir does not enter into details, for the military man will at once appreciate the demonstration it possesses; and the statesman will as readily grasp it consequences as most favorable to an honorable peace with Mexico; And to the improved political condition of a new born contiguous republic, whose people desire protection and peace in order to develop the bounteous resources of their country; and to the interests of the United States by securing a well defined frontier, and an increase of internal trade." [JCB] exhibited the greatest bravery on the field. And Captain May, too, is from Washington city, which you know, is a part of Maryland. May’s charge was equal to that of McDonald’s, under Napoleon, at Wadram, so graphically portrayed by Allison. However, give the Missouri boys a chance, and we will show you some “tall” fighting. They know nothing about the “scienc,” but when it come to the “strong” they are thar. [JCB]

NNR 70.278 July 4, 1846 accounts of wounded officers, suspicion that Mexicans use shot containing arsenic

The wounded. – We learn from Lieut. Stevenson who left the army on the 2nd instant, that most of the wounded are doing well. Col. McIntosh is however still very low and not out of danger. His worst wound is the bayonet thrust in the mouth and neck. Lieutenant Colonel Payne was shot through the abdomen, and the ball is still in him. The crifice of the wound is large but the surgeons are unable to determine whether it was by a musket ball or grape shot. He suffers too much pain and his condition is critical. Captain Hooe, who lost his right arm above the elbow, is nearly well. He is by this time on his way north. Lieutenant Luther was wounded in the calf of the leg, not in the lip as heretofore reported. Captain Page, it is thought, will recover, notwithstanding the dreadful nature of his wounds.

The shot of the Mexicans, except the musket and carbine balls, are of a composition which has not yet been fully ascertained. It is supposed to contain arsenic. Wounds received from these shot are slow to heal. Lieut. S. had one in his possession which he proposes to have analyzed. The army generally was in good health and faring sumptuously in the “quarters of the enemy.”

Among the hairbreadth escapes it may not be improper to state that Lieut. Stevenson had the sole of his foot taken off by a grape shot, without the least injury to his foot. [Detroit Adv. [JCB]

NNR 70.278 Lt. July 4, 1846 Theodoric H. Porter's body found

The body of Lieut. Porter, of the 4th infantry, has been found about 26 miles from Matamoros, on the other side of the river. It was recognized by a peculiar mark upon one arm.

A party passing from Point Isabel lately saw the remains of no less than seven of the unfortunate Rogers party, so cruelly murdered, a few weeks since. Five skeletons, one of them apparently a female, were lying upon the banks, where they had drifted, after their throats had been cut. Two others were discovered near the wagon. The wolves and buzzards had done their work upon all. [JCB]

NNR 70.278 July 4, 1846 >account of the wounded in the hospitals

A person writing from Matamoros, says he recently passed through the hospitals, and looked at the poor fellows who were wounded in the two battles. Of whom three had died in the hospital at Point Isabel. Fifty have been sent to St. Joseph’s island. There are twelve cases of amputation of thigh, leg, and arm under treatment, and are most of them doing well. [JCB]

NNR 70.278 July 4, 1846 compliment by Gen. Romulo Diaz de la Vega to Gen. Zachary Taylor on the quality of Taylor’s troops

Mexican fighting. I am told that Gen. Vega, after he was prisoner in our camp, and saw for himself the number and kind of men composing our army, remarked to General Tyler that with ten thousand such troops he might march to the city of Mexico without difficulty; and I have little doubt this might be done by Taylor, for certainly he is the man above all others that we know to make war with the Mexicans. He understands them perfectly, and knows they will not and cannot stand the charge of the bayonet, which is his favorite arm and mode of fighting, though he had but little opportunity of using it in the late battles, as the enemy kept pretty much at artillery distance, which is their favorite arm. And the general himself told me (for he paid us a visit at Point Isabel since the battles) that he thought they loaded and fired their pieces with as great celerity and accuracy as we did ours, though they did not maneuver them so well in the field. – Nearly every death and wound on our side was from their cannon shot. [JCB]

NNR 70.278 July 4, 1846 hunting for "Rio Grande deer"

Rio Grande Deer. – Largest on record. – There are wandering over the prairies in the vicinity of our camp on the Rio Grande a large number of the finest large horned cattle in the world. “Our volunteers,” wishing for a fresh steak, would make some of them occasionally bite the dust. An order came that no more "killing beef" must take place, and no more beef was killed. Scouting parties now went out for venison some good shots were fortunate enough to kill one. It was dragged into camp and duly divided up among the knowing ones of the regiment. When daylight appeared, suspicions got out that beef had been killed, this was stoutly denied, and the reports were contradicted by the assertion, that a deer had been killed weighing over eight hundred pounds. This caused universal surprise, especially among certain officers, who demanded to see the horns. After a great deal of delay they were produced, and examined by a court martial, who solemnly decided that the venison of the Rio Grande had horns perfectly smooth, and resembling those of an ox species, in other parts of the world. [N.O. Tropic [JCB]

Mariano Arista's invitation to American soldiers to desert

Official dispatches from the army. We have been permitted to lay before our readers the following extract from the last official dispatches of gen. Taylor, which have been received at the war department:

Headquarters of the army of occupation,
Matamoros, May 30, 1846.

I enclose an original draft, found in gen. Arista’s papers, of an invitation of our soldiers to desert. A similar call was previously made by Ampudia, and has already found its way into the public prints. – The department may see from these documents what arms were used against us.

I am, sir, very respectfully your obedient servant,
To the Adjutant General of the army, Washington, D.C.

General Arista’s advice to the soldiers of the U.S. army.
Headquarters at Matamoros, April 20, 1846.

Soldiers! You have enlisted in a time of peace to serve in that army for a specific term; but your obligations never implied that you were bound to violate the laws of God, and the most sacred rights of friends! The United States government, contrary to the wishes of a majority of all honest anf honorable Americans, has ordered you to take forcibly the possession of the territory of a friendly neighbor, who has never given her consent to such occupation. In other words, while the treaty of peace and commerce between Mexico and the United States is in full force, the U. States, pressuming her strength and prosperity, and our supposed imbecility and cowardice, Attempts to make you the blind instruments of her unholy and mad ambition, and force you to appear as the hateful robbers of our dear homes, and the unprovoked violators of our dearest feelings as men and patriots. Such villany and outrage, I know, is perfectly repugnant to the noble sentiments of any gentleman, and it is base and foul to rush you on to certain death, in order to aggrandize a few lawless individuals, in defiance of the laws of God and man!

It is to no purpose if they tell you that the law for the annexation of Texas justifies your occupation of the Rio Bravo del Norte; for by this act they rob us of a great portion of Tamaulipas, Coahuila, Chihuahua, and New Mexico; and it is barbarous to send a handful of men on such an errand against a powerful and warlike nation. Besides the most of you are Europeans, and we are the declared friends of a majority of the nations of Europe. The North Americans are ambitious, overbearing, and insolent as a nation, and they will only make use of you as vile tools to carry out their abominable plans to pillage and rapine.

I warn you in the name of justice, honor, and your own interest and self respect, to abandon their desperate and unholy cause, and become peaceful Mexican citizens. I guarantee you in such case, a section of land, or 230 acres, to settle upon, gratis. Be wise, the, and just, and honorable, and take no part in murdering us who have no unkind feelings for you. Lands shall be given to officers, sereants add corporals, according to rank, privates receiving 320 acres as stated.

If in time of action you wish to espouse our cause, throw away your arms and run to us, and we will embrace you as true friends and Christians. It is not decent or prudent to say more. But should any of you render any important service to Mexico, you shall be accordingly considered and preferred.

M. Arista, com’der in chief of the Mexican army.

NRR 70.279 reception of deputation that delivered the thanks of Louisiana to Gen. Zachary Taylor

Louisiana and gen’l Taylor. – The committee appointed by the legislature of Louisiana to present the resolutions and thanks of the general assembly the gen. Taylor, arrived at Matamoros on the 8th inst., and were presented to the brave old chieftain at 11 o’clock on the 8th by Col. Labuzan, one of the aides of Governor Johnson. On being presented to the general, his staff, and officers of the army, the colonels and their staff and officers of the army, the colonels and their staff who were invited to be present on the occasion, Mr. Zacharie, chairman of the committee, said –

“General, I have the honor of presenting to you the resolutions and vote of thanks and the act appropriating a sword which were unanimously passed by the state of Louisiana, to you, your brave officers, and the army under your command, for the gallantry displayed by them in the battles of the 8th and 9th of May. I am no orator, General, but my own heart and the heart of every Louisianian approves of the beautiful sentiments of these resolutions. In behalf of the state of Louisiana, I thank you and your brave army for the additional luster which those glorious victories have shed upon American arms.”

To which the general, briefly and with much emotion, replied: “My heart feels too deeply and sensibly the high honor that has been conferred upon me, my officers, and men, to respond to your expressions of gratitude and thanks. I always felt assured that the patriotic state of Louisiana would be among the first to rush to the assistance of our little army in time of need. I well knew, as did also my officers and men, that she was a gallant, brave, and noble state; that chivalry, noble daring, and ardent patriotism were her high attributes. Her volunteers have readily abandoned their homes and business, to assist us in the hour of danger. We feel deep debt of gratitude to them and to you.

The generous and timely action of the legislature of Louisiana will never be forgotten by us; its name will be embalmed on our hearts as a cherished memorial. We feel that we have only done our duty; yet we cannot but feel highly gratified to have gained the approbation of our fellow citizens. Together with the love of country, which is common to us all, it is that approbation which cheers and animates the soldiers in the hour of battle. Gentlemen, I am unaccustomed to public speaking; I, therefore, in the name of my officers and men, thank you and the patriotic state which you represent for the honor conferred upon us.”

At the conclusion of his reply, the general invited the committee and all present to a splendid collation which he had ordered to be prepared for the occasion, and to which ample justice was done. Numerous toasts were drunk. Mr. Zacharie gave "Old Rough and Ready – long life to him."

Mr. Carrigan gave: "gen. Taylor – Ampudia has at least discovered that he was a tailor who understood well how to take his measures, and that the officers and army under his command had shown to the Mexicans and to the world that they perfectly understood the art of making breeches.”

Mr. Ashbel Smith gave: “American Independence – It was not proclaimed and maintained by the heroes of ’76. It was confirmed upon the plains of Chalmette in ’14 – ’15. It was again asserted and maintained in 1836 at the battle of San Jacinto, and in 1846 will be thoroughly established throughout the whole extent of Mexico.”

Rev. Mr. Crenshaw, chaplain of the Andrew Jackson regiment, gave the following:

“The Church and State, may they never be united. We will pray for the one and fight for the other.”

The ladies and volunteers of Louisiana were severally toasted.

The next day the committee were invited to a dinner given by the officers of the army at the headquarters of General Arista in Matamoros. Colonel Twiggs presided. Gen. Taylor was present. A splendid band of music performed occasionally on the gallery, and hundreds of citizens of Matamoros thronged the plaza to listen to the exulting and joyous strains.

Governor Henderson of Texas and suite, together with Ashbel Smith, Generals Hunt, Johnson, Cook, Burleson, and others were present. The festival was kept up until midnight and right merrily did the wine sparkle around the board intermingled with toasts and songs. This was the first time since the battles of the 8th and 9th of May that officers had met together as a body upon a convivial occasion, and you may depend the shots directed by them as effectual as they were a month previous, although there were not so many killed or wounded. NNR 70.281 July 4, 1846 comments on the expedition against Santa Fe

The march to Santa Fe. The St. Louis Reveille has some timely and sensible remarks, addressed to those about to engage in the expedition to Santa Fe, showing them that it is no holiday service they will be called to perform. We copy the following:

“Those who will be afforded ample opportunity to display the most commendable qualities of soldiers – subordination, fortitude, patience, and endurance. They must be prepared for privations greater than those of the army in the neighborhood of Matamoros. The march across the prairies to Santa Fe – a distance of 1,000 miles from independence and 1,300 from this city – will subject them to alternate exposure to burning sun, rude storms, scarcity of water, scarcity of provisions, and other circumstances “too tedious to mention,” which will all prove their soldierly qualities by the severest tests. They must have, at least, stomachs which cannot only digest any kind of food present, but which can submit to “short allowance,” when necessary. Going to matamoros may be going to fight; but it is not, now at least, going to starve. Going to Santa fe is going to endure a toilsome march on limited supplies, with precarious means of subsistence when there, and on the return. Hence, let none undertake the trip who have not soldiers’ hearts, and, we may add, soldier’s bodies and soldiers’ stomachs. – But let all who go, do so, with the gallant determination to act up to their parts through all the trials.

It is a mistake to suppose that a soldiers only business is to fight. His first business is always to be prepared to fight – his second, to fight when necessary. On this Santa Fe expedition, the greatest difficulty will be to keep up this very preparation. Subordination, discipline, and endurance, will be essential; and woe to him who undertakes the trip unprepared for them.

We throw out these hints, on the suggestion of a friend, that the expedition ought not to be underrated, as involving none of the exposures, perils, &c., which make up the account of military effort, and result in the sum total of military glory. We have no idea of discouraging any, but rather to stimulate, by showing the service to be one really worthy of brave men. Such, in truth, it is; and it ought so to be regarded. Men familiar with the sort of life which the troops will lead, will tell you it will be a glorious trip, and all that sort of thing. – but only, because it is such a trip as we have represented. They would not prize it – if it were a mere jaunt of pleasure, like the journey to a country wedding, through a cultivated rural district, with green meadows and lowing herds on every hand.” [JCB]
The following pithy paragraphs, taken very much at random from numbers that we find in papers which have reached us by this weeks mails, show something of what is going on in this department.

We have numerous accounts and from various places of strong discontent being expressed by the volunteers that had preferred their services and left their homes in hopes of a tour of duty, but whose services could not be accepted, the requisition having already been filled.

Still stronger expressions of dissatisfaction are uttered by those volunteers who assembled under the requisition of General Gaines, and whose services were subsequently declined by the government. We have room at present only to mention the existence of those complaints. [JCB]

Seven companies of Tennessee volunteers took their departure from Nashville on the 4th ultimo. – Thousands were assembled to witness the departure and the scene was one of touching interest. Four companies of Tennessee volunteers left N. Orleans on the 16th for the Rio Grande, viz: Memphis Rifle Guards, Capt. E.F. Ruth; Gaines Guards, Captain M.B. Cook; Avengers, Captain Jones; Tennessee Guards, Capt. Murray; all under command of Capt. Ruth. [JCB]

Alabama Volunteers. – Twenty-three companies altogether have reported to the governor as ready to march to the Rio Grande. [JCB]

Volunteers for Santa Fe, New Mexico. – We learn from the St. Louis papers, that Col. R. Campbell, aid to the governor, has raised several companies of volunteers under the requisition of General Gaines, and marched them into St. Louis. He reported them to Col. Davenport, of the United States army, who refused to muster them into the service of the united States, because Gen. Gaines authority to make requisition had not been acquiesced in by the government! This, says the Cincinnati Gazette, is anything but right. Here are hundreds of men, brought into the field by the state executive on the requisition of a commanding general of the army, in service, and they are turned loose, to get home the best way they can, and to bear the lose of time and expense of equipment because the requisition is disapproved. If the requisition is regular, and the men have been brought out under it, the least that could be done, it seems to us, would be to receive them into the service, supply them with rations, &c. and disband them. [JCB]

While these men are thus turned aside, it is said that Col. Grimsley and Mr. Bent, the latter long engaged in the Santa Fe trade, have succeeded in engaging some 883 recruits, drawn from trappers, &c., of the country, for a mounted regiment to march for the Santa Fe towns, New Mexico. Many of these have seen service in the country, are inured to its hardships, and perfectly familiar with the duties required them. Such men cannot but be useful in such a campaign. [JCB]
More blunders. – There appear to be much blundering and miserable management in calling out volunteers, that subject the volunteer companies to much vexation, trouble, and expense. A large number of volunteers have been called out in Illinois and marched to the appointed place of rendezvous, and when they arrive it appear that the officers of the United States are not authorized to muster them into service or to provide for their subsistence, and they will have to return home and wait for further orders from Washington city. The brave volunteers from Missouri were trifled with and harassed in the same manner. This course is unjust to the gallant volunteers of Illinois and tends to discourage persons from entering the volunteer service. From the St. Louis New Era [Amer. Sentinel] [JCB]

Volunteers at Fort Leavenworth. – We are informed by the officers of the steamer Amaranth that they left Fort Leavenworth on Tuesday last. – Three volunteer companies, numbering about 300 men have already arrived there. More were hourly expected and from the number that were reported as raised and on their way to that point, Colonel Kearney thought that he would have his full compliment of troops in a short time, and would be able to leave the fort for New Mexico. [St. Louis New Era, June 12.]

There were at Fort Leavenworth, on the 18th of June, 884 volunteers, of which one company is infantry. Capt. Fisher’s company, to arrive, would increase the force to 1,000. It was thought that Brigade Gen, Kearney would start from the fort about the 22nd or 23rd ult. [JCB]

A heroine. – The Indiana volunteers were all mustered into the service of the United States on Friday, June 19. On Saturday, one of Capt. Walker’s company, from Evansville, lost a hankerchief. On sitting down to mess he observed it sticking out of the bosom of one of his comrades. He immediately took hold of it, when, to his surprise, he discovered that his messmate was a female. On inquiring into this strange proceeding, she stated, that being very poor, and wishing to go to her father, who resided in Texas, resolved to join one of the volunteer companies. She afterwards came to this city, and her fellow soldiers raised a subscription to carry her to her father. [Louisville Journal.] [JCB]

Ohio Volunteers. – The adjutant general of Ohio has given notice that officers returns have been received at Columbus of the full compliment of volunteers to fill the requisition on Ohio. The whole number of men will be in Camp Washington at an early day. More offered than could be accepted. [JCB]

The requisition of the state of Illinois for volunteers has been filled; and 1,500 men were at Alton, at the last accounts, awaiting the arrival of Gen. Wool, who was expected in a few days to muster them into the service of the United States. [JCB]

Volunteers. – The latest accounts from the volunteers now with Gen. Taylor on the Rio Grande, is from the letter of “The Corporal” with whose productions our readers are already familiar, dated June 15, which says: “The most perfect apathy prevails among the volunteer troops here now, and every day the inroads of discontent are more apparent. The sun is unusually warm, and from 10 to 4 o’clock, it is so intense that but for the prairie breeze, it would be imposable to stir about. Our tents are gradually made of common Lowell cotton and afford little protection either from rain or sun. All such things combined with no occupation for the mind leaves nothing for excitement, and all that can be said is that we are here. If they would only march us a few miles up the river, or get up a few false alarms, it might, in a measure, tend to dispel the apathy and wind up the chain of excitement.” [JCB]

Soldiers from the seat of war. A detachment of 28 soldiers from the Rio Grande, belonging to the 7th regiment of U.S. infantry, arrived in this city (Baltimore) on Saturday night and put up at Burk's hotel, Pratt street. They are of those who defended Fort Brown so gallantly during its bombardment of 7 days by the Mexicans. The detachment left this city for Boston, under the command of Capt. Hawkins. Their object is to obtain recruits.

Companies B and K, 1st regiment .S. dragoons, numbering 115 non-commissioned officers and privates, 119 horses, and 15 mules reached St. Louis on the 27th ult., from Forts Atchison and Crawford, under command of Capts. E.V. Sumner and P. St. G. Cook, Lieuts Hammond and Davidson, Surgeon R.A. Simpson. They are to join the expedition against Santa Fe, at Fort Leavenworth.

Capt. Page, who was so dreadfully wounded in the battle of the 8th inst., has arrived at new Orleans. Amongst the melancholy incidents to which the campaign has already been fruitful, we have met with none more truly painful than that of this gallant officer and his devoted wife. The latter was at the city of Baltimore when intelligence arrived of the fate of her husband. Without a moment's hesitation she determined to proceed to administer a wife's attention and consolation to her wounded husband. - She embarked for New Orleans, and thence took passage in a steamer about to leave for Point Isabel. The steamer had to stop at Mobile, and was there delayed some days. On reaching Point Isabel, she ascertained that Capt. Page had embarked for New Orleans a few days before, where we sincerely hope she may soon join him. [JCB]

NNR 70.289 July 11, 1846 Army depot established at Robinson's Ferry on the Trinity

The steamship Alabama arrived at Galveston, the 22nd June, and left again the following day for Brazos Santiago. She landed at Galveston some government stores for a new military depot which has been established at Robinson's Ferry, on the Trinity, to supply volunteers on their march through Texas. The stores are forwarded from Galveston to the depot by steam. [JCB]

NNR 70.289 July 11, 1846 Maj. Thomas Turner Fauntleroy ordered to proceed to San Antonio with dragoons

The Austin New Era says that orders have been received by Maj. Fountelroy, requiring him to proceed immediately to San Antonio with the company of dragoons under his command. [JCB]

NNR 70.289 Bibles forwarded to Army in Texas

The Bible. We are gratified to learn, says the Savannah Republican, that the army in Texas applied to the American Bible Society for the scriptures – and that four thousand copies of the New Testament have been forwarded for their use. If it is desirable to inculcate the love of peace among soldiers, the New Testament is the best of all books for them. [JCB]

British Troops. The 14th, 89th, and 60th regiments are under orders to proceed to Halifax this autumn.—They are to be replaced by the rifle brigade, 77th, and a regiment from the West Indies.

H.M. troop ship Athol arrived at Halifax on 13th from Portsmouth, with a detachment for the rifle brigade; also, troop ship Arabian, from Cork, with detachments for 77th, 33d, and Newfoundland Veterans. The rifles and 77th landed on the 15th, and joined their respective regiments in that garrison. [VRD]

THREE SHIPS OF THE LINE. The Pennsylvania, of 120 guns, and the North Carolina, of 74, both at Norfolk, and the Ohio, 74, at Boston, have been ordered to be got in readiness for active service. A heavy bombardment is no doubt thought of.

The Boston Journal states that commander Breese, a brother of senator Breese, is ordered to the command of the Albany. We have seen no official announcement of her commander. There are said to be thirty urgent applicants for the command. She is expected to be ready for sea in thirty days.

The Boston is nearly ready for sea, though her destination is unknown. No officers have yet been ordered to her.

Sloop of war Preble is only waiting the complement of her crew, to sail to the Gulf of Mexico.

Store ship Erie, lieutenant Bullus, is fitting out to carry stores to the Gulf.

Texan Navy. A survey of three vessels comprising the navy of the late Republic of Texas has been made recently by captain Randolph of the U. States Navy. Their hulls were reported to be in excellent order, but the upper works had been much injured by exposure in a warm climate. The "Archer," an 18 gun brig, draws two feet and a half less with everything on board that our largest class of schooners. The "Austin," a ship, has a heavier battery for her draught than any vessel in our navy, and draws three feet less than any of our sloops of war. The "St. Bernard" is a schooner of 7 guns.

The Austin, late Texan sloop of war, was towed to sea from Galveston on the 24th ult. Bound to Pensacola for repairs, after which it is said she is to be placed in commission in our navy under command of George N. Hollins, esq.

The steamboat Whiteville, purchased by captain Sanders, intended for government transport on the Rio Grande, left Cincinnati, on the 30th ult. For N. Orleans. She is a substantially built, light draft boat, and just the kind of craft to navigate the shallow waters and short turns of the great Southwestern river.

The Lawrence, U.S. brig, arrived at Pensacola on the 25th ult. In seven days from Brazos, St. Jago, having been employed blockading the Rio Grande and Brazos, and co-operating with army 103 days. [VRD]

NRR 70.290 July 11, 1846 accounts of the attacks of the Saint Mary's on the fort and gunboats at Tampico

The St. Mary’s U.S. sloop of war, captain Saunders, is blockading Tampico. A letter from a gentleman on board, dated the 17th ult. States, that the decree of expulsion of all American citizens from thence, issued on the 17th May, was duly enforced on the 7th June, he had to leave Tampico in consequence, and was kindly received on board the St. Mary’s.

A letter from an officer of the St. Mary’s dated the 13th published in the Norfolk Beacon, gives a long account of an affair which took place on the 8th June. "We discovered the enemy erecting another fort on the north side of the entrance of the river, got the slip under weigh under topsails, stood in, and when within a mile of the fort and gun boats, the latter, three in number, and tonnage about one hundred, opened fire upon them both. Being upon a lee shore and in shoal water, we were not able to fire more than eight shot, before it became necessary to claw off, which we did but at three o’clock returned and continued the firing until we had fired 70 shells and 29 round solid shot. In the last reconnoiter the enemy returned our fire with about ten shot from 18 pound guns, four of which passed near us, two fell directly under our ‘fore foot,’ one passed between the fore and the main top mast, and one over the foot, the others fell at a distance. The first shell which burst over the fort, ejected every soldier from the neighborhood the whole of them taking immediately to the wood. One of our shells passed between one of the schooner’s masts, and exploded beyond her, a fragment having struck the bowsprit and bulwarks, tearing both considerably, as we have learned since the fight. One corner if the custom house was knocked down – a house on the north side of the river, was fired by the explosion of a shell; and a soldier at the fort on guard, by bursting of another shell, exchanged his musket for vacancy, it having been shattered, without I believe, injuring his valuable person. Having driven the party, from their embryo fort, we returned to our anchorage at half past three.
On the 16th an officer writes – "As circumstances, beyond our control, prevented us from reaching the three gun boats, (spoken of in my letter of the 13th inst.,) moored in Tampico river, and which we had desired to cut out, our captain determined to greet the enemy at long shot from the ship, and accordingly at 7 A.M. we ran out a kedge on the quarter, and brought our guns to bear on the gun boats, and fort under which they were anchored. The boats anchored in a line abreast across the river, with springs on their cables anticipating an attack from us. As soon as we opened our broadside upon them they returned fire briskly; but two of our Paixhan shells, which exploded over the fort, silenced it, the boats still maintaining the action – they fired I suppose about fifteen shot, all of which proved harmless. In return for these civilities we presented him with 19 Paixhan shells and 11 solid shot. The bar intervening between us and the fort and the gun boats, we rendered it impossible for us to choose our distance; we were therefore reluctantly compelled to engage them at long shot. Discovering that we did not do the execution which we desired, the captain thought this child’s play caused a useless waste of powder and ball, and therefore gave order at 8 A.M. to cease firing, when we weighed the stream and kedge and stood out to our anchorage.[VRD]

NNR 70.291 July 11, 1846 account of the Princeton in the blockade of Veracruz

The Princeton, U.S. steamer, arrived off Vera Cruz in 17 days from Boston, and a letter states that for 12 days she had been underway just out of reach of the guns of the Castle. When vessels make their appearance she makes sail for them, and when they are very fast and wish to run, she fires up – goes alongside and places a prize officer on board. She is the admiration of the English and French men-of-war here. The P. is more useful here than three frigates.[VRD]

NNR 70.291 July 11, 1846 California expedition fitting at New York

The Expedition, fitting out at New York, which is to proceed round Cap Horn for California, the N. York Express says, is going on famously. The regiment of which Jonathan D. Stevens is to be the colonel, is filling up with considerable rapidity. It is said that whole companies have been enrolled at the same time; and that several West Point cadets, and even one professor at the same institution have eagerly joined the expedition. The transportation is to be effected on commercial vessels of from six to eight hundred tons barthen, laden for the occasion; and they are to be conveyed by several ships of war, carrying engineers, men of skill and companies of artillery. The regiment is to be reviewed on the 20th inst. And immediately afterwards put into motion. [VRD]

NNR 70.291 July 11, 1846 three schooners being constructed at New York for the Mexican government purchased by the American government

Three schooners, which were built at New York for the Mexican government, have recently been purchased by government, and are now fitting at Brooklyn navy yard. Their officers have been appointed.

The Reefer, is commanded by Lieut. Com’g. J.S. Sterrett

The Petrel, by Lieut. Com’g. T.D. Shaw.

The Bonita, by Lieut. Com’g T.G. Benhain.

They are fitting for the gulf service, of course.

Enlistments for the navy are progressing, - $20 bounty for seamen, and $15 for ordinary seamen, are given.  [VRD]

NNR 70.293 July 11, 1846 recruitment of regulars commended for a foreign invasion

70.293 notice of various troop movements
RECRUITING FOR THE ARMY

We have never believed otherwise that that, if the war with Mexico is procrastinated to a second campaign, from any cause whatever, and it should become necessary to push an army towards the city of Mexico, that army, to insure success, must be composed principally of regulars.

For the defence of our own terra firma, our cities, property, firesides, and families, armed citizens, volunteers, and militia, may be depended upon, to a large extent. For operations beyond boundaries of civilization, in the wilderness and wilds of the west, in sparse settlements as Santa Fe, and the like, frontiersmen and dashing volunteers are exactly the kind of troops required. But for entering an enemy’s country where troops that are disciplined as well, and fight as obstinately as the Mexican troops did at Palma Alto and Resaca de la Palma, we must have disciplined troops, and troops whose tour of service will not expire in the midst of a campaign.

If the army of 30,000 volunteers now ordered to the Rio Grande, can be concentrated there in sufficient force, in a sufficiently short space of time, and be sufficiently disciplined, and have on the spot all the requisite "fixings" to undertake a dashing movement upon Mexico, something effective may be done. The government no doubt believe, and having the whole subject before them, they ought to be able to judge in the premises, - they certainly believe that one dashing campaign will terminate the conflict, and they have concluded to rely upon volunteers furnishing three-fourths of the requisite force for that service.

Such having been announced by government as their reliance and their course, no true American would attempt to defeat their object. Every facility and encouragement should be, and so far has been given, fairly to test the efficiency of the project. - The number and description of forces asked for by the president, the officering of the forces by men of his own preference, the money asked for, for carrying on the war, the laws which the occasion calls for, all are promptly voted both by political opponents as well as by political supporters of the administration. The volunteer ranks are crowded by men without the least regard to political distinction. Fifty thousand volunteers are asked for by the president on the 26th of May. By the 1st of July eighty thousand, it is stated, have offered their services. Many of them, without waiting official movements, have hurried off to the field on their own resources and responsibility, ready to be recognized when the "due form of law" gets up.

There has been no hesitation. Whatever the government asked for, it has been promptly accorded. It is to be hoped that their purpose of making a short war of it may be successful. Nothing that would obstruct that aim, ought to be thought of. - We fervently desire that hostilities may terminate with the present campaign, and that honorably.

But it is gratifying to notice, as we have a war on hand, that the attention of the government has been directed to the necessity of earnest efforts for obtaining recruits for the regular army. No man can pretend to say how long the war with Mexico may last. Let the present campaign terminate without obtaining peace, and an army be required for a second campaign to march some five hundred or a thousand miles into the interior of the settled portion of Mexico, and regulars will be required, our word for it. NNR 70.293-294 July 11, 1846 requisition on Massachusetts for troops, extract from the general orders of Gov. George Nixon Briggs

MASSACHUSETTS. The governor and the commander-in-chief of the militia of Massachusetts, having received from the secretary of war a requisition for a regiment of infantry, to consist of ten companies and 778 men, officers included, has made a call upon the people of the state, for the enrollment of volunteers. The volunteers proposed to be enrolled will constitute the first regiment of Massachusetts infantry, and will be a distinct corps from the present volunteer militia of the state, although the companies belonging to the existing regiments, should they tender their services, will be incorporated into the new regiment.

Gov. Brigg, in his general orders, says- "Whatever may be the difference of opinion as to the origin or necessity of a war, the constitutional authorities of the country have declared, that war with a foreign country actually exists.

"It is alike the dictate of patriotism and humanity, that every means, honorable to ourselves and just to our enemy, should be employed to bring "said war to a speedy and successful termination,' and thus abbreviate its calamities, and save sacrifice of human life, and the wasting of the public treasures.

"A prompt and energetic co-operation of the whole people in the use of those means, is eminently calculated to produce that most desirable result.

"To that end, I call upon the citizen-soldiers of Massachusetts at once to enroll themselves in sufficient numbers to meet this request of the president of the United States; and to hold themselves in readiness to be mustered into the service of the republic when the exigencies of the country shall require it.”  [VRD]

NNR 70.294 July 11, 1846 complaints about Gov. Thomas Ford of Illinois in mustering volunteers for Mexico

ILLINOIS. Serious Complaints. We learn from Alton, that the Clinton county volunteers are not the only company which received harsh usage at the hands of Gov. Ford. The Clark county volunteers, it is represented to us, enrolled themselves at an early day- their officers were elected- they reported the company as ready for duty, to the proper officer at Springfield, and they were accepted and registered as one of the thirty companies to compose the three regiments. Gov. Ford named them in the list of companies published in this paper, as having been received. But it seems that suspicions of favoritism and unfairness were aroused. The company determined to present themselves at the rendezvous for inspection, and to be mustered into the service; and accordingly made a forced march, traveling all night, and arriving at Alton yesterday morning. – There they found that they had been overslaughed, and other companies received, although this is the only one from the Wabash line. They complain, also of the neglect of the proper officers in furnishing them with provisions, but this they do not seem to care so much about, as the rank injustice which has been done to them by the governor. They still insist upon the right of admission into one of the regiments; and, if possible, they ought to be gratified. They have already incurred a heavy expense, in preparing for the expedition, and in marching to Alton, and it would be a shame to disappoint them. [St. Louis Rep., 27th June. [VRD]

NNR 70.294 July 11, 1846 comments on arrangements for payment for clothing for volunteers

Payment for clothing. The St. Louis Reporter states that paymaster Stuart has been authorized to pay the Illinois volunteers their commutation money for clothing, which is $42 for each man, and that the whole sum required for this purpose will be about one hundred and thirty thousand dollars.” –(for the Illinois quota, we presume).

[There certainly must be some mistake as to this matter. It is not likely that government would pay the whole sum to the volunteers for the clothing required for a twelve months’ tour, in advance. If they do, many a poor fellow will be bare foot, and bare backed too, before the city of Mexico blesses his eye sight. The harpies that always hang round a camp watching to grab the soldiers’ pay, would get most of the cash, --and before a month’s wear was had of the clothing; and then what quarter-master would supply the wants of the improvident for the ensuing eleven months?—Ed. NNR 70.294 July 11, 1846 dissatisfaction of Missouri volunteers at Fort Leavenworth

MISSOURI. --Volunteering. It is rumored that some of the volunteers who went to Fort Leavenworth did not find volunteering what is was cracked up to be. When their rations were issued to them in the morning, some of them ate or wasted at breakfast the rations for the whole day, and were much surprised that they had to go hungry at dinner and supper. But a little hungry experience taught them more economy. Some of them were terribly surprised that their food was not cooked for them, and swore that they would starve before they would cook; but a few weeks’ service will teach them the fashionable accomplishment of cooking. One young man, who has been clerk in a mercantile house in this city, was found driving a cart from the river to the fort and was not altogether pleased that he had been put at such work; but he will probably be benefited by learning the useful business of ox-driving. A portion of the volunteers were dissatisfied, but would soon be enured to actual service. [St. Louis Rep., 27th June. [VRD]

NNR 70.294 July 11, 1846 movement of companies of Texas volunteers toward the seat of the war

TEXAS—Volunteers. The Galveston News of the 9th ult. says—"A full company, under Capt. Arnold, have arrived by the steamer Samuel M. Williams, on the 5th inst. They are from Nacogdoches, and carry a standard with the words "Old Nacogdoches" on it. They are fine looking men, and have a most fatiguing march on foot, of several hundred miles. They have been mustered into service and received their arms, which could hardly fall into better hands to do good service.

"A company from Jaspar and Jefferson counties arrived from Sabine, by water, last Saturday, the 6th, commanded by Capt. Cheshire, who was in the battle of San Jucinto. These have also been received, and left for Point Isabel on the schooner Vesta, Capt. Frisk, this morning.

NNR 70.294 July 11, 1846 statement of Cassius Marcellus Clay on the war

Cassius M. Clay of the True American, the anti-slavery journal, has left the editorial chair to be occupied by some assistant, whilst he takes command of a company of mounted volunteers, and is off for the Mexican frontier. On leaving, he publishes an address to his readers, commencing thus—

"We have volunteered for the war; and will say a word, in parting, to our friends. We have denounced, enspairingly, the annexation of Texas, as a boldly flagitious scheme, and a war with Mexico as kindred with that disgraceful and degrading act—degrading alike to the government that consummated, and the people that submitted to it. The one is perfected; Texas, unfortunately, is apart of our Union. The other is just begun That the war with Mexico might easily have been avoided—that the commonest regard for justice, and a moderate share of prudence on the part of the government, could have prevented it—is palpable as the day. But though this be so, we cannot change the fact. War exists—It has been declared by a government chosen by the people themselves.

Our Opinion is, that war, with so unjustly and wickedly begun, should be pressed with vigor. It is the only alternative left. Clouds and darkness, in consequence, rest upon our path in the future; but it has to be trod. We act upon this necessity, and do not hesitate to support the government; to peril all to sustain it; for we war not against slavery; and when there is a common foe in the field, and the summons comes to the citizen soldier, we know and can know but one country and one duty, and would not urge another to go where we are not willing ourselves to lead." [St. Louis Rep., 27th June. [VRD]

NNR 70.295 July 11, 1846 Gen. Robert Desha's prompt response to news of the outbreak of hostilities with Mexico

GENERAL ROBERT DESHA.

In awarding due meed of praise to those who do signal service to their country, we perform a pleasing duty, and at the same time do public good, by stimulating others to deserve equal praise. The alacrity with which the chivalrous sons of the south and west have responded to the recent call for volunteers, entitles all who have so gallantly offered their services to the country to the highest praises, and among these, conspicuous above all others, stands the name of the veteran soldier-gen. Robert Desha

On the 3d day of May- a quiet Sabbath morning- our city was startled by the intelligence that hostilities had commenced on the Rio Grande. Point Isabel was represented to be in the most imminent peril, and the whole "Army of Occupation" in great danger of starvation and defeat. In addition to the perilous situation of the "pioneer army," the honor of the country was at stake. Upon the history of American arms, heretofore unstained in its glories, a dark and bloody page was about being written. Inspired by the noblest patriotism, General Desha saw at a glance what was necessary- immediate action. With other patriotic citizens he at once pledged himself to pay the expenses of equipping and transporting volunteers who were willing to embark immediately for Point Isabel, and gallantly placed his own name at the head of a roll of volunteers; thus, without stopping to look at the consequences, offering his purse and his sword to the country. On the 4th of May he was on his way to the scene of danger - was the first volunteer that reported to gen. Gaines "present and ready for action." And the first that reached Point Isabel. It must be recollected too, that his dangers, so far as his knowledge extended, were not the ordinary dangers of ordinary warfare. He had every reason to believe that Point Isabel would be attacked by forces of cruel and merciless, numbering perhaps ten to one, and the struggle would be bloody and desperate. In this enterprise an example if boldness and daring courage was presented which has had a powerful influence in kindling the patriotic fire still burning in the bosoms of the brave soldiers now in the service of their country. In deeds like these, there is a moral grandeur - a sublimity which acts like electricity upon the masses - stimulating the patriotic and the ambitious to dispute with each other the positions of greatest personal peril and adding fresh laurels to the country's fame.

Gen. Taylor's valor, it is true, prevented general Desha from rendering that service which his patriotism burned to perform; but this detracted nothing from honors justly due his. He has heretofore fought nobly for his country, under the lamented Harrison, and had he met the enemy, as all believed he would. At Point Isabel, he would have given a glorious account of himself and his little band of volunteers - and had there been a sufficient number of volunteers raised in this city to justify the chartering of a vessel direct for Point Isabel, which was gen. D's anxious desire, he would have reached gen. Taylor's army in ample time for the glorious battles of the 8th and 9th of May. Major Chase remarked in this city, and the correctness of the remark was evident, that one hundred volunteers sent at the time gen. Desha left here, were of vastly more importance than five hundred a few days later. With such men as gen. Desha to raise and lead volunteers to battle, it might truly be said that the "militia are the standing army of the country."

The circumstances thus noticed, when viewed in connection with the facts that gen. D. is advancing towards the "sere and yellow leaf" of life, is without political aspirations - is engaged in extensive commercial and planting business requiring his constant attention, and has an interesting family, to which he is devotedly attached, to bind him to his house, fully establish his claim to the highest praises yet won by any volunteer for the Mexican wars. Should opportunity offer, he will entitle himself to still higher praises by actual service. Gen. Taylor reposes the greatest confidence in gen. D. and has already sent him on two expeditions where there were strongest hopes of active service - to Barita and Reynosa. He possesses many of the highest qualifications necessary to the good soldier, and in several respects strongly resembles gen. Jackson, particularly in decision and prompt execution. He is an entire stranger to fear, and though ardently rash, is yet cool and calculating when in dangerous positions, and never fails to turn every advantage to the best possible account.

While, to the relinquishment of all the delights of home, of competence and social enjoyment, they are toiling through dangers, privations and the inclemencies of the climate, with no motive but patriotism, to protect the rights and reputation of the country against foreign hostilities - that country should not be forgetful of their names or services - and we at home should always be ready and proud to give them the meed of the highest praise. This is the only adequate recompense of the citizen soldier, and it is a public duty to see that it is paid. Alabama should then proudly point to gen. Desha as one of her contributors to the cause of the country - the prompt patriot, the gallant soldier, the first volunteer. He is in some sense, in this war, the Cincinnatus of our state, and when he shall lay aside the sword and return to the avocations of peace, we are confident that he will not find his fellow citizens forgetful of his gallant conduct and patriotic devotion. [Mobile Daily Advertiser. [VRD] proposed an armistice, which General Ampudia had declined. He stated that he was receiving large reinforcements, that he would not then suspend hostilities which he had not invited no provoked; he also said that the possession of Matamoros, was a "sine qua non," and that the American troops would occupy the city, at the same time giving to Gen. Arista and his forces, leave to withdraw from the town, leaving behind the public property of every description. Gen. Taylor remarked that "Generals Ampudia and Arista, had promised that the war should be conducted agreeably to the usage of civilized nations, and yet the Mexican forces had in the battles of the 8th and 9th, stripped our dead and mutilated their bodies."—General Reguena replied, that "the women (!) and rancheros did it, and that they could not be controlled." Gen. Taylor said he would come over to Matamoros, and control such people for them.

The answer promised by Reguena to be delivered to Gen. Taylor, positively at three o'clock, did not come. It afterwards appeared, that while the delegation was treating with Gen. Taylor, Gen. Arista was busy in getting out of the city; that even the promise to give Gen. Taylor a positive answer at 3 o'clock, was a mere subterfuge. Gen. Arista taking advantage of the delay, succeeded in moving much of the military stores, securing two or three pieces of cannon, and with the fragment of his army, that very night, abandoned Matamoros and fled precipitately towards Monterey. At sundown, Gen. Taylor perceiving that no word was to be sent to him, he repaired from Fort Brown, to join the army two miles above the fort, in position for crossing the Rio Grande.

Early on in the morning of the 18th, the east bank was defended by two 18 pounders, and the three batteries of our artillery; and the crossing commenced, Co. Twiggs ordering the bands to strike up Yankee Doodle. The light companies of battalions, first went over, followed by the volunteer and regular infantry. Lieut. Hays, of the 4th infantry, and ten select men, with Capt. Walker of the Rangers, first crossed the river with orders to ascertain and report the number and position of the enemy, if near the river. Immediately after Lieut. Hays had crossed, the flank companies of the 3d, 4th, and 5th infantry, were thrown across, commanded by Capt. Buchanan, and Capt. Larned. After these commands had crossed, Capt. Smith of the artillery battalion, crossed with two companies, followed by Capt. Kerr’s squadron of dragoons. After this force had crossed, Ridgely’s artillery was dismounted and taken over in parts.—In the meantime, the infantry already over, had advanced, and occupied the hedge fence covering the crossing; after occupying this position some two hours, a civil deputation from Matamoros presented itself, requesting to see Gen. Taylor. The deputation was sent over the river, in charge of an officer, to meet the general who had not then crossed. The object of the deputation was to inform the commanding general of the American forces, that Gen. Arista and the Mexican troops had abandoned Matamoros, together with his sick and wounded, and wishing to know from Gen. Taylor, what treatment the city might expect from him. Gen. Taylor, finding on inquiry, that this report was true, ordered that portion of the American forces that had not crossed the river, to return to Fort Brown and cross there. Gen. Taylor informed the prefect that the civil and religious rights of the citizens, would be sacredly respected. While this was going forward, the dragoons under Captain Kerr, passed below where they had landed, and raised up on the walls of Fort Paredes, "The Star Spangled Banner."

The different regiments already on the west side of the Rio Grande, were marched to their respective places of encampment, without noise or disorder, save when the flag of our country, was unexpectedly seen waving from Fort Paredes; discipline then gave way to feeling, and nine hearty cheers rent the air, and announced the occupation of Matamoros by American troops.

That evening, a small guard was established in Matamoros, to keep the peace. No troops except under command that night, visited it. The civil and religious rights of the citizens were guaranteed, and the Metamorians slept secure under the protection of the American government, a boon ever denied to them by their own.

A gloom was thrown over the brilliant events of this day by a most unfortunate accident; Lieutenant George Stephens, a graduate of West Point, in 1843, a most promising officer in the second dragoons, was swept by the swift current from his horse while crossing the river at the head of his command. He had distinguished himself on the brilliant days of the 8th and 9th, and his untimely death was universally lamented. His friends, two days after he was drowned, had the melancholy satisfaction of recovering his body and giving it the ceremonies of a soldier’s burial. [N.O. Tropic, June 25] [VRD]
INTERESTING MEXICAN ITEMS.—Commerce on the Rio Grande—This river, under the influence of American enterprise, is assuming a very busy appearance. The steamers Frontier and Cincinnati have arrived at Matamoros, giving to the port of the town a lively appearance. “River front lots” will soon become valuable in that city, and stores will be erected on the water’s edge. There was never but one steamer on the Rio Grande, we believe, before the army occupation arrived on its banks, and that was owned by one of the Texas Austins, as far back as 1827. The boat carried on a very brisk trade as high up the river as Comargo, in hides, tallow, bones, etc.; but the ranchero muleteers, who had the commerce of the country in their own hands, complained to the government of Mexico, and Austin’s boat was ordered off, and ever after prohibited entering the Rio Grande. [VRD]

Mexican ladies—The Republic states, that the Mexican ladies of Matamoros are fast becoming reconciled to “our people,” and begin to believe that the Americans at least “are not cannibals.”

This may be true, but we heard one “volunteer officer” say, that he saw one Signoreta living in Calle Independencia that looked so sweet under her rebza and dark eye lashes, that he felt as if he could “eat her up.” [VRD]

Mexican compliment to American behavior after their victories

The “Republica de Rio Grande,” has an editorial drawing a comparison between the treatment of the English on the Sutlej, and the Americans on the Rio Grande. The contrast between our troops after their victories, and the English after their triumphs, is certainly astonishing, and opens a fine field for the speculations of the philanthrophist. [VRD]

Death of Capt. Jose A. Baragan

Died—On Sunday morning, at 6 o’clock, Captain Jose A. Baragan, of the Mexican army, wounded in the battle on the 9th of May. Capt. Baragan was a brave and meritorious officer, and behaved gallantly on the field of battle. He was much esteemed by the American officers, and received from them every respect and attention. [Matamoros Republic of the Rio Grande.

We had the melancholy pleasure of seeing Capt. Baragan, while in Matamoros. He was confined to he bed by wounds he received in the battle of the 9th. He was an object of interest to the officers of the army, because of his gallant bearing in the field of battle, and for the manner he acted while suffering under his wounds. We heard Col. Twiggs observe, that if he died, he should ask permission from headquarters to bury the brave Mexican officer with military honors, as a last token of admiration for his virtues. These incidents are interesting, because they display the better side of the soldier’s feelings, and the soldier’s heart. [VRD]

Pursuit of Arista. —The day following the taking of Matamoros, Lieut. Col. Garland with all the regular and irregular cavalry of the army, about two hundred and fifty dragoons and rangers, started in pursuit of the retreating Mexicans, with orders to harass their rear, and to capture prisoners and baggage. ON the 22d, Col. Garland returned from his pursuit. He succeeded in capturing a small rear party, after a slight show of resistance on their part in which two Mexicans were killed and twenty two taken prisoners, two of our own troops slightly wounded, one wagon with ammunition and clothing of an artillery company was captured. The scarcity of water, the barrenness of the country, and the condition of the horses compelled Col. Garland to return to Matamoros, having penetrated over sixty miles into the enemy's country.

The retreating army of the Mexicans, under Gen. Arista, was but twenty four hours ahead of our cavalry, and our officers stopped at the ranches where the enemy had the night previous. A ranchero, at one of these stopping places, inquired with great simplicity of Capt.---- where the Americans were going; he was told in pursuit of the retreating Mexican army. "Retreating army!" said the fellow with astonishment, "why Gen. Ampudia stopped at my house last night, and said that his troops had conquered the Americans, and that he was on his way to Mexico to take the news." The man remained confounded, for it was impossible to believe his nation had been whipped in battle, and still more incomprehensible, that a small number of American dragoons should seriously and for purposes of war really drive before them over three thousand troops. NNR 70.296 July 11, 1846 interview between Col. Matthew Mountjoy Payne and Gen. Romulo Diaz de la Vega

70.296 examination of the trophies of the war, including the flag of the Tampico guards

FRIENDLY INTERVIEW.—The first meeting of the gallant officers, Col. Payne, of the United States army, and the Mexican general, VEGA, after the battles of the 8th and 9th of May, in which both were engaged, took place in the ladies' parlor of the St. Charles hotel, N. Orleans. The N.O. Delta says—

"The meeting between these two brave soldiers was one of cordial greeting, and a kindly interchange of compliments. The general expressed his regret to the colonel at seeing that he was wounded, and indulged the hope that he would shortly recover from the effects of it. The colonel thanked him for his sympathy, and congratulated him in having escaped a similar infliction; he trusted that he would find his residence in the United States as agreeable as the circumstances would admit or: he assured him that his gallantry was appreciated by the officers of the U. States army, and by the citizens of the United States."

The pleasure of this friendly greeting was greatly enhanced by the presence and approving smiles of a numerous assemblage of ladies, invited by Mrs. Gen. GAINES.

Col. Paine, it will be recollected, has brought with him a number of military standards captured from the Mexicans. They are thus noticed in the Tropic:

"The trophies of war. —Among the most interesting relics obtained in the battles of the 8th and 9th, are the standards of the different companies and regiments. We spent half and hour in examining these pomps and circumstances of war with the greatest interest. We found eighteen in all, seventeen of which are of tri-colored woollen or baize cloths, ornamented with the appropriate letters and symbols. They were mounted on staffs sharpened with iron, and were not only ornamental, but dangerous as offensive weapons. But the flag of the most absorbing interest, is that lettered

GUARDA COSTA
DE TAMPICO.

This magnificent and torn flag, apart from its associations, is remarkable for its appearance and the materials of which it is formed. It is of large size—its field, of tri-colored silk, green, white, and red. In the centre is embroidered the Mexican coat of arms, more beautifully than we conceived any modern Penelope had power to do, even if her delicate fingers were over skilled at the work. The Mexican eagle, with its outstretched wings, fairly lay before us, each rustle of the flag on which it rested, causing the prismatic colors of the atmosphere to play over the brilliant floss silk needlework as brilliantly as if it had been the plumage of the bird itself. Some fair Mexican damsel's bright eyes must have grown weary under their long dark lashes, in thus delicately counterfeiting nature. Perhaps it were the work of cloistered nuns, it is so elaborate,—some holy sisterhood, who by ascetic life, have long attenuated fingers, and thus made more nimble, than those possessed by the "world’s gazers" of their sex. The members of a whole convent, probably, have said their matins and then by turns wrought upon that banner, which they fondly hoped was destined to lead gloriously the arms of their country in every fight. Alas! For the fortunes of war.

That flag, in the battle of the Palo Alto, was torn by our cannon shot, and now bears upon its folds the the shattered shreds thus rudely made; at the Reseca de la Palma, it waved over the breavest troops, and floated in the wind as long as its regiment lasted before the terrible tire of our arms. When all was lost, its bearer tore it from its staff, and fled to save it from the stain of capture. Such, however, was not to be its fortune. The brave man was met by one of our troops, and hand to hand they fought for the prize,—the Mexican nerved by every feeling of patriotism, the American by every feeling of a soldier’s ambition. The brave standard—bearer bit the dust, and the precious objec of his care became an object of curiosity in the hands of his enemy. May it ever be respected among our people, as the only evidence existing of the once brave "Batallon de Tampico." These trophies are in charge of Colonel M.M. Payne, and will be by him carried to Washington."

TREATMENT OF AMERICAN PRISIONERS BY THE MEXICANS – Capt. Hardee, who was taken prisoner in the capture of Thornton’s company, states in a letter to a friend in Savannah, that they are treated with the greatest consideration and kindness. – Gen. Arista received the prisoners in the most gracious manner, and said that “his nation had been regarded as barbarous, and that he wished to prove to them the country.” Capt. Hardee said – “Lieut. Kane and myself are living with Gen. Ampudia, lodge in his hotel, and sit at his table. We are not on parole, but in company with one of the genre4al’s aids- go pretty much where and when we please. Two of his aids speak excellent English, and the general himself speaks French, so that we are admirably off in this respect. Every one around us use their utmost endeavors to make out time pass pleasantly, and if anything could make us forget our captivity it would be the frank and agreeable manners and generous hospitality of Gen. Ampudia. – He and General Arista are both men of high tone and character.” These facts are highly honorable to the Mexicans.

ARISTA’S OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE EVACUATION OF MATAMOROS.

Headquarters in the Rancho de la Venada, May 18, 1846.

Division of the North- Commander in chief: All the means of subsistence of this division being consumed, its activity paralysed, and its artillery diminished, while that of the enemy has been greatly increased in the number of pieces and the calibre of his guns, in such a manner that, were he to open his fire, the city of Matamoros would be instantly destroyed; to the utter ruin of national and foreign interests, I have decided to retire from it with the forces under my command before I find myself summoned and very likely obliged to evacuate it with dishonor, which I shall thus avoid; for the march is slow, out pieces being drawn by oxen and our munitions in carts. My object now is to defend the soil of these departments, which have been entrusted to me; and for that purpose I am going to post myself at those points most convenient and within reach of supplies, of which I will hereafter inform your highness, though your communications must seek me by the road of China or that of Linares. – The step to which I have referred has saved the national honor; and I communicate it to your highness for your information, recommending you to secure the camp equipage, placing it in a convenient point and preserving the 16 pounders in that city, to which, moreover, I will order reinforcement. MARIANO ARISTA  To the commandant gen’l of Tamaulipas.
NNR 70.304 July 11, 1846 proposed expedition against Yucatan, denial that the American government intends to support it

 Expedition for Yucatan. The Philadelphia Sentinel of the S., states that

"George Washington Dixon, has been parading our streets in a general’s uniform for some days past, representing, it is said that “he is in the pay of the government” and making arrangements for an expedition to Yucatan."

The Washington "Union," in referring the subject, says: "We deem it our duty, therefore, to expose the impostor. G. W. Dixon has no commission, and no species of authority from the government of the United States. We warn our western friends to beware of such an imposition. The plan, too, which is here attributed to him is abhorrent to the policy of our government. Conquer Yucatan! Why Yucatan is already independent of Mexico, and is the friend of the United States. We have no disposition to “annex that portion of Mexico to the (American) constellation,” whether it be by conquest of her soil, or even by the voluntary consent of her people. Let no man, therefore, be taken in by this adventurer."

The plan of the expedition which the Union speaks of is described by the Sentinel as follows:

"The movement is remarkable on many accounts-The men are generally resolute-tearless fellows, who will fall head up wherever they may be thrown-and their objects are not merely to defend American rights with the bayonet, but also to revolutionize Mexico by means of pronunciamientos, pamphlets, &c. Aided by some of our best mercantile houses, Gen. Dixon ah has already sent on a printing press, types, and Spanish compositors to Laguira, Yucatan, where part of the company will a proceed, and there, (where popular sentiment will be in their favor, and where the central government of Mexico is least powerful,) these dauntless fellows will operate with greater certainty of success than ten times their number could have from the bayonet alone. Many who at first were disposed to see it chimeneal, now see its feasibly, and see also that these pioneers will ere long attract thousands from this place.” [VRD]

NNR 70.304 July 11, 1846 British view of the Mexican war, sympathy with Mexico, British mediation suggested

Paris, June 15. The Journal des Debats lately published a remarkable article on the state of affairs between Mexico and the United States. Out contemporary, says an English paper, asserts that Mr. Polk has only gone against Mexico to compensate for his defeat in Oregon, and to regain popularity. It thinks Mexico is totally unable to resist the United States, and that existing hostilities will result in its dismemberment. It thinks that the states will endeavor to seize the Californias to make up for their being obliged to lose Oregon, and that the Californias are infinitely more valuable. It views all this with regret, but beyond a few sneers at Mr. Polk, for whom it appears to have cherished the most profound contempt, it says nothing offensive to the United States. It points out the necessity of France and England interfering in the matter, in order to bring about a reconciliation, and to protect Mexico. It alleges that France has interests at stake in Mexico which call promptly for such interference. [VRD]

NNR 70.304 July 11, 1846 Charles Bent, Saint Vrain, and Folger arrive at Saint Louis and report, Gen. Jose Urrea said to be advancing to relief of Santa Fe

70.304 Santa Fe traders pushing forward rapidly in advance of US troops

SANTA FE. Messrs. Bent, St. Vrain, and Folger, traders to New Mexico, for whose safety there had been much solicitude, reached St. Louis on 2sd inst. all safe. They left Santa Fe on the 27th May at which time nothing was known there of the war now existing. Mr. B. in a conversation with ARMIJO the commandant of New Mexico, did learn that Gen. URREA was on his route to Santa Fe, with a force of from three to five thousand men, gathered in Sonora, Zacatecas and Durango. The object of this expedition was not stated, if known, by Gov. ARMIIJO; but there can be little doubt that the presence of Gov. URREA there, at such a time, was the result of his orders from the Mexican government, and with an intention to resist any invasion from this quarter.—There were only 180 troops in Sante Fe at the time of Mr. BENT’s departure.

Mr. BENT did not see the advance party of the traders, composed of one of the Armijo’s, Speyers, Colburn, and others; but he learned from a company of about 100 Mexicans, who were out hunting buffalo, that they were met by them at Sand, near Simarone, and sixty miles from Arkansas. They were pushing on with great rapidity, travelling at the rate of thirty to forty miles per day. An express from Independence had informed him of the intention to send a detachment of dragoons to stop the progress of Speyers, as was then understood, but as we know, of all the traders; and hence the rapidity of their travelling.—So intent were they upon getting along that a hundred extra miles were purchased, and when a wagon broke down it was abandoned in the road after transferring the goods to another. Capt. MOOR’s command of dragoons were met on the 17th between the Pawnee Fork, and the Caches of the Arkansas. He was six or eight days, travel behind Speyer’s party, and it was supposed that he could not overtake them.

Mr. HOWARD, the gentleman dispatched by Government on a special mission to New Mexico, was met on the 16th, at the crossing of the Arkansas, with his pack-mules broken down. He had, however, dispatched two men as an express to Santa Fe on fresh mules, and they were expected to reach there in nine days. From thence they were to return to the foot of the Taos mountains, where Mr. H. was to await their coming.

Mr. Bent saw on the route one hundred and thirty wagons belonging to the traders. He met two long trains of provision wagons—the first within twenty miles of Council Grove and the other at Dragoon creek. They were ordered to stop at Fort Bent, where it is understood the whole expedition will rendezvous. The party arrived at Westport on the 27th, thirty days from Santa Fe. Mr. F.P. Blair and George Bent were left at Taos. [VRD]

NNR 70.304 July 11, 1846 federal government accepts services of Missouri mounted regiment and artillery for operations against New Mexico

“The president has accepted the services of another regiment of mounted volunteers, and a separate battalion of artillery, to be composed of five companies. These troops are to rendezvous at Independence, it is said, by the first of August next, and, whatever others may say to the contrary, are to reinforce the command of Col. Kearney, destined to operate against New Mexico. The president, although he has no more authority, under our law, to do it that we have, has agreed to accept the services of the Hon. Sterling Price, now a member if congress from this state, as colonel; and Major D.D. Mitchell and Wm. Gilpin are named as the other field officers of the regiment.

“We hear further, that the traders who have gone ahead of the expedition, and in pursuit of whom Capt. Moore’s command of dragoons was sent forward, are only to be stopped until Col. Kearney’s force can pass them. He is to precede them, if it be possible, into Santa Fe, they will follow, each in possession of his own property. The traders will be protected, Mexicans as well as our own people; but it is possible, we surmise, that the duties on the goods will be paid, if paid at all, to another government that now administered by Armijo.” [VRD]

NNR 70.304 July 11, 1846 Santa Fe expedition

THE EXPEDITION AGAINST SANTA FE-The volunteers under Col. Kearney have started from Fort Leavenworth. Captains Waldo’s and Reed’s companies took up their line of march on the 22d June. Lieutenant Col. Ruff marched on the 27th with the companies under Captains Walton, Parsons, Moss, and Johnson. Col. A. W. Doniphan and Maj. Gilpin marched on the 29th with the companies under Captains Hudson, Rogers, and Harrison. Captain Agney’s and captain Murphy’s companies of infantry left the same day. Captains Weightman’s and Fischer’s companies of flying artillery, and Col. Kearney with his staff started on the 30th. All the troops in excellent health and spirite. [VRD]
NNR 70.305 July 18, 1846 withdrawal of troops from our Indian frontiers, leaving them exposed to outbreaks

The Northwest Frontier.-If any reliance is to be placed upon the last accounts that we have from the northwest, and which are inserted under the Indian journal head, the movement of what few troops were left for the protection of that frontier will be very inoperative. The Detroit Advertiser says: "An order was received yesterday by Col. Riley, from the war department, to move the 2d regiment of infantry, stationed on the frontier, at once to Point Isabel, Texas. The company at this post and one at Fort Gratiot will march forthwith. Orders have been dispatched to the companies to Lake Superior to follow Company C, Captain Byrne, stationed at Mackinac, will remain at that post. The other companies are at Buffalo, Fort Niagara, and Sacketts Harbor. No information has been received by whom their places are to be supplied on the frontier. [VRD]

NNR 70.305 July 18, 1846 volunteers reach the Rio Grande
70.305-306 lack of authentic intelligence from the interior of Mexico

ARMY JOURNAL.

Official-Army of Occupation, June 24, 1846.

"Some volunteers have arrived at Brazos Santiago from Tennessee, presumed to be of the twelve months quota. The volunteers which previously arrived from New Orleans have nearly all moved to Barita, except two regiments in this place. I shall bring them up the river as soon as I can procure transportation, which we are impatiently awaiting. The volunteers from Texas are encamped near Point Isabel, and are now organizing under the direction of the governor.

"We have no authentic intelligence from the interior of Mexico. The army at Linarez is believed to be moving towards Monterey, much reduced in numbers by desertion and sickness. It is rumored that Bustamente is at the head of the government, and that Paredes is advancing with a large force to this frontier." [VRD]

NNR 70.306 July 18, 1846 present of exploded shot by Capt. D.S. Miles to the Baltimore high school

PRESENT FROM THE 7th U.S. INFANTRY, TO THE BALTIMORE HIGH SCHOOL.

To his honor, Col. JACOB G. DAVIES, Mayor of Baltimore, Md.

DEAR SIR: Understanding that one of the High Schools of Baltimore is making a collection of curiosities, I take pleasure in sending through you, to be presented to it, a sample of exploded shells and round shot, thrown by the Mexicans from their batteries opposite this place, into Fort Brown, during its bombardment, viz: from 5 o'clock, A.M., on the 3d of May, till 5 o'clock, P.M., on the 9th of the same month ultimo.

It may be interesting to you to say, the regiment to which I am attached, the 7th infantry, together with on company of the 2d artillery, commanded by Captain Lowd, and another company 3d artillery, commanded by Lieutenant Bragg, constituted the garrison of Fort Brown; and among the officers in command of these troops, a number are natives of Maryland-those marked with a *, natives of Baltimore, vis: placed according to rank.

Captain D. S. MILES, 7th infantry.
A. DRANE, 5th infantry
R. H. ROSS, 7th infantry
1st Lieut. A. ELZEY, (formerly Jones,) 2d artillery.
1st Lieut. H. LITTLE, 7th infantry.
2d Lieut. L. GANTT, 7th infantry.
I am, sir, with great respect, your ob’t serv’t,
D. S. MILES,
Captain 7th infantry U.S.A. [VRD]

NRR 70.306 July 18, 1846 account of the rank and file in the late battles

THE RANK AND FILE OF THE ARMY.-All the officers with whom we have conversed, who were engaged at Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma, speak in terms of the greatest enthusiasm of the conduct of the rank and file on those trying occasions. Not only did the men behave well in the fight, but they manifested the utmost anxiety to get into it. Lieut. Crittenden related several incidents to us which places the conduct of privates and non-commissioned officers in the most favorable aspect. After Colonel McIntosh had been wounded on the 8th, one of the men was detailed to take charge of him. He complained bitterly. He loved his colonel, he said, and would be proud to nurse and take care of him; but he did not like to lose his chance in another fight, and begged to be excused. One of the corporals was wounded by a ball in the forehead, which at first looked as if it would prove fatal. He pressed his hand to his head and said “I am hurt, I am mortally hurt.” Then reflecting, he said “No I ain’t; I am good for something yet!” He then bound up his head with his handkerchief, went into the fight, and did his duty like a man. By the time, however, his head had swollen greatly, and he was forced by his officers to place himself in the hands of the surgeon. This noble fellow is now in the detachment commanded by Capt. Marcy and Lieut. Crittenden, and leaves with them to day.

After battles of the 9th, when more hot work was expected, Lieut. Crittenden and his men—or what remained of them, for he had suffered severely in these engagements—were bivouacked on a spot near the river. Early in the evening he was called upon by Lieut. Hays, of this state, who had received an order from General Taylor to cross the river in the morning. Ten of the best men were required for duty then believed to be full of peril, and Lieut. Hays wanted to know if he could obtain this sort of metal in the ranks of Crittenden’s company. The latter thought he could accommodate him.—Most of his men were lying on the ground asleep, or overcome with fatigue. He woke them up “Men,” said he, “Mr. Hays wants ten daring cool fellows to cross the river with him in the morning. All who are willing to go will rise—though all must be aware that it is an enterprise full of danger.” Every man jumped to his feet in a moment! A selection had to be made, however. Those who were not taken were loud in their complaints, and one of the sergeants came to Crittenden several times during the evening, and begged to be detailed. His lieutenant told him that privates not officers were required. “O, never mind,” said the sergeant, “you’ll find that I will play the private very well.”

Is it wonderful that against such a spirit the best torps, and the overwhelming numbers of the foe, were unavailing. [Pennsylvanian of Monday. [VRD]

ARMY OF OCCUPATION. We have but little that is new from the army on the Rio Grande, and have been actually amazed at the impatience which we find expressed in various directions, and even exhibiting itself in congress in the form of a resolution to enquire why the army upon the Rio Grande has remained so long inactive since the victories of the 8th and 9th of May? Persons who indulge in such inquiries must be grossly ignorant of the nature and difficulties of a campaign, or of the preparations which are indispensable to a successful prosecution of a foreign invasion. Flatter ourselves as we may, the fact is that, owing to an error in estimating the capacities of the enemy, the army under General Taylor made a narrow escape from almost utter annihilation, an escape, to effect which, good fortune as well as severe fighting was indispensable.—Had Gen. Arista anticipated Gen. Taylor’s movement from Fort Brown to Point Isabel by a single day, and taken that post, with the stores then there, (and why he did not is to us incomprehensible: it was a fatal error to him and his army;) had he made that movement, Gen. Taylor’s predicament would have been irretrievable. Even with the advantage which Arista’s want of generalship in this particular gave to Gen. Taylor—his predicament still was such, that it seems almost miraculous that he reached Fort Brown with the supplies of which they were there so much in want. The battle of the 8th was most gallantly maintained by the Mexicans. The anxiety with which every officer and man under Gen. Taylor grasped his arms, instead of reposing upon them during the gloom of that night, was unexpectedly relieved in the morning by finding that the many hours bravely fought for. And the battle of the 9th too, seemed to turn upon the coincidence of a variety of circumstances of the moment, as disastrous to the Mexicans as the want of these coincidents might have been to Gen. Taylor's army, if “fortune” as well as superior generalship had not favored them.

One lesson of this kind, we venture to predict, will be a sufficient admonition to Gen.
Taylor. He will not be apt to adventure again so far upon Mexican imbecility. He will be cautious to keep his troops within reach of supplies and to have at hand the means of transportation. We should like Gen. Taylor, in maintaining the appellation of “rough and ready,” not to forget the pre-requisite of “safe and sure.” Another such a state of anxiety for the safety of the army as was awakened at its recent predicament, we hope may not be courted.

NNR 70.309-311 July 18, 1846 Gen. Zachary Taylor, for want of transports and supplies, unable to improve his victories, inundated by volunteers of whose services he cannot avail; items from the Rio Grande; letter from the seat of war

That Gen. Taylor will improve to the very best advantage the resources he has at command, we have full confidence. But he is embarrassed by an inundation of volunteers, whose term of service will not enable him to fit them for effective operation and for whose supplies and subsistence even, much less for whose transportation, adequate provision had not been made. The water in the river, in the meantime, it appears is falling, and it is quite uncertain whether, by the time the flat and light draft boats reach, will find sufficient water to enable them to ascend to where the advance corps, under Col. Wilson, is already pushed. The steamer Neva left Reynosa, on the 24th June, at which time the river had fallen three feet from what it was when it ascended.

The Neva, after arriving at Matamoros, was found to require repairs, and was ordered round to St. Josephs to be overhauled. The 7th infantry, which were to have gone to Reynosa, had to be disembarked on the 30th of June. The distance from Matamoros to Reynosa by the river, is 180 miles, by land about 80 miles.
Notwithstanding the fall of the water of the river, the quantity of rain that had fallen rendered it almost impossible to transport provisions, munitions, &c., on wheels.
The movement of troops must of course be delayed.

But suppose the principal part of the army under Gen. Taylor, by great efforts, were now either marched or steered up the Del Norte as high as Camargo—what then?
Where are the wagons, or horses or mules, wherewith to commence a march into the interior of Mexico? Until these reach him—and reach him in numbers, too, that persons who have not thought upon the subject, very little suspect to be necessary—until they reach him in sufficient numbers and with sufficient subsistence for their own support as well as that of the army, not a peg can Gen. Taylor move from The Rio Grande. It is better, indeed, that his army should remain at Matamoros than that, if they could without difficulty, be transported to Camargo—they had to remain there for want of the means of penetrating towards Mexico.

A letter which we find in the New Orleans Picayune, of the 6th, dated Point Isabel, July 3, from a correspondent who left Matamoros the evening before says—“The road we came over last night—-I mean the wagon road between Point Isabel and Matamoros—is still impassable for loaded wagons, and it is a wonder to me how a light wagon can be dragged over it. From the river to the Palo Alto, some nine miles, there is not, altogether, half a mile of good road. The mud is generally a foot deep—and in some places two or three feet deep, and there is at least four miles of water, in many places hardly fordable for horses. The gentlemen who accompanied me down captured a garfish on “six mile prairie,” between the battle fields the other day nearly three feet long. I passed over the same place four or five times when it was perfectly dry, with no appearance of having ever been overflowed. At the Resaca de la Palma where, as you will observe on the map a road passes between the ponds and that is deep enough anywhere for a respectable sized steamboat to pass through it. The Palo Alto battle field is two-thirds covered with water.

“The mosquitoes showed themselves in numbers for the first time at head-quarters last evening.—The volunteer camp was perfectly shrouded by smoke, raised by the men to keep off the intruders. A rumor obtains in camp that a portion of the Louisiana volunteers are soon to be disbanded, and, though they have been assured that such will not probably be the case, they are quite uneasy about it—a few, because they want to go home, and fear the rumor is not well founded, but most of them because they desire to stay and ‘see the thing out.’ ‘When can we move? Can we ever get a fight out of them?’ are the questions constantly put to persons coming from Gen. Taylor's quarter.”

We should have been spared the task of penning the above, had the following article reached us before the foregoing was put in type. It is not for the gratification of verifying what has been said, but for the value of the facts and the cogency of the reasoning that we extract the following from the National Intelligencer, of the 14th.

Sir: Being here among that (to many) unfortunate class called volunteers, and having not much else to do but protect myself from the effects of a hot sun and almost daily rains fro the last two weeks, I have concluded to make a few notes for the information of those who keep an eye on the acts and management of the persons charged with the prosecution of the war with Mexico. My position enables me to see and hear much of what is going on; but I do not, like some others, pretend to know every thing; therefore you must not discredit what I state because I do not tell all you may wish to know or all that occurs.

I was here some time before the difficulties commenced in April. On the 20th of that month a young Spaniard and a Mexican were arrested on the point of Brasos Santiago Island upon some suspicion of being spies. When examined nothing was elicited calculated to confirm the suspicion. They stated there were then between six and seven thousand men in Matamoros, commanded by Gen. Ampudia, who was anxious to fight; but that Gen. Arista was on his way to take command, and was daily expected. This statement seemed to excite but little attention here, and it was not for two days transmitted to Gen. Taylor. On the 23d of April a Mexican came voluntarily to this place, and stated that a large Mexican force would cross the Rio Grande on that evening or the next day, for the purpose of making an attack on this place. I was present when a young officer was interrogating him through an interpreter, and it seemed to me the purpose was more to intimidate the man than to elicit information. The statements of the Mexican caused a good deal of talk during the day, but seemed to cause no additional vigilance or extra preparation. On the 19th of April, Capt. Price, who commands a company of Texas Rangers, arrived here. He had for a long time been stationed at Goliad doing nothing. His object was to get Gen. Taylor to order his company to join the army. He went to see the general on the 20th, and left him on the afternoon of the 21st, being told that his company was not wanting then, but whenever there was a probability of the Mexicans fighting they would be informed and ordered to join. On the 24th, the day the Mexicans crossed the river, about ten or eleven leagues from here, the government steamer Monmouth and the chartered steamer Cincinnati towed to sea some four or five vessels, on board of which, passengers and seamen, perhaps eighty or one hundred persons left the place, nearly all of whom would willingly have remained if it had been supposed there was any probability of an attack. That same afternoon the steamer Cincinnati left here for St. Joseph’s Island for the purpose of bringing the women and children left there to this place, so secure did every thing appear. I mention these circumstances, and refer you to the correspondence between Generals Taylor and Worth, to prove that the former and many of his officers believed that the Mexicans would not fight—an opinion that was nearly proving fatal to a portion, if not the whole army. The feeling manifested by the murder of Col. Cross, the attack upon Lieut. Porter and his party, and other circumstances, induced me to think it was their intention to fight soon, and I so expressed myself to several officers high in command. Indeed, the circumstance of two armies being within a few hundred yards of each other in hostile array was certain to produce collision in a short time. The events that took place on the 24th April and the days subsequent, until the 8th and 9th of May, I shall pass over.—Some things, it appears to me, might have been ordered differently and probably better, but I am not soldier enough to form a correct opinion; but the results are sufficiently brilliant to induce a belief that all was right, and will atone for previous want of diligence and over-confidence in the pacific intentions of the enemy.

The president, in his message of the 11th of May, says—“American blood has been shed on American soil,” alluding to the affair that took place on the 24th April between the dragoons, under the command of Captains Thornton and Hardee, in which some were killed and the others taken prisoners by the Mexicans. There is much to be said upon the question whether it is rightfully American soil where this affair took place; but certain it is that as soon as Capt. Thornton was given up by the Mexicans, on the 10th or 11th of May, he was put under arrest by Gen. Taylor for disobeying his orders while on that expedition, and bringing on that fight contrary to his wishes. He is now here under arrest—a circumstance I have not seen mentioned in a public manner. I may at some future time send you a statement of some fact bearing on the assertions of the president and the circumstances relied on to prove that the bank of the Rio Grande was American soil. It may be so considered now.
As soon as the alarm of war was rung through the country, volunteers hastened here from various quarters, until there is now on this frontier some eight or ten thousand, and many more on the way. Many of these men have left comfortable homes, and have come expecting to see active service. Instead of that, they are scattered over the country, in different encampments, exposed to the heat of the sun in latitude 26, and the soaking rains of the summer solstice, inactive, and many indulging in dissipation to kill time and chase away ennui. I will explain why this is so. The great object seems to have been to hasten men on here, without any particular object. If it be for purposes of defence, Gen. Taylor has proved he did not want many to assist him certainly no more than he called for. If the object be invasion, the men come poorly provided. They come with in their hands, and there are, provisions enough, easily obtained, but there is not a sufficiency of transportation for an army of five thousand men. If some attention had been paid to the necessary means of transporting supplies for an army, it would have been much better than sending masses of men to suffer in this climate. An army cannot move without provisions, and if we penetrate far into the country it will require a great number of wagons.

There are about three hundred wagons and teams here, but not drivers enough for them; when I say here, understand with the army. We are told the government has three hundred wagons in or about Philadelphia; when they will be here no one can tell; mules have to be purchased, and no chance of getting them, except from the Mexicans; they are perfectly wild, and must be tamed and taught to work; they will take a long time after the wagons arrive. The Mexican officers are having the mules driven off as fast as they can into the interior, and forbid any sales to us; still a good many are brought to Matamoros and are purchased. A month ago an officer was sent to New Orleans to purchase several steamboats suitable to navigate the Rio Grande. None of them are here yet, and, from what we have been informed when they do arrive, it is not probable they will answer the purpose. In the mean time the mouth of the river has been closed by a bar, the steamers Sea and Cincinnati, chartered at high rates, were caught inside, and are of little or no use; drawing too much water. The Col. Harney steamer, belonging to the government, was during the last week, in open daylight, run on the bar, off this harbor, and has gone to pieces—a great piece of negligence. The utter neglect to supply the army with sufficient transportation for ammunition and supplies now paralyzes every thing and prevents the army moving on. If we had had one month ago three hundred additional wagons and two or three small steamers in the Rio Grande, we should now be far on our way to Monterey, in a high healthy country, the men contented and well, and no time given the enemy to recruit their forces or recover from the consequences of their defeat. Instead of this, I do not believe the army will leave the banks of the Rio Grande before the middle of August or the commencement of September. Until then the men must be paid and supported—at what cost you will see when you get hold of the accounts.

The staff department of the army, particularly the quartermaster’s branch, is most inefficient and extravagant. The only persons qualified for the station of a quartermaster are real business men—men of system and order, well acquainted with accounts—These officers require no military skill or education, but thorough mercantile habits and capacity. The consequence of the quartermasters not being such men, will be developed when the accounts are exhibited and the expenses come to be added up. Their unacquaintance with business, the state of the markets, &c., subjects them to the grossest impositions in making contracts and purchases; and there are those who say favoritism goes a long way, but of that I know nothing.

When the expenses of this war are paid and the accounts exhibited, the Florida expenditures will appear small. The most enormous rates are paid for many things, particularly for the use of ships and other vessels engaged in transporting troops and stores; from twenty-five to fifty per cent. More than a commercial man would pay for similar vessels for his own use. Let me give you a few instances—The steamship Alabama is chartered at the rate of $16,500 per month. She was here about the end of May with volunteers, and returned to New Orleans on the 1st inst. She reached the bar off this port several days ago, and was soon after blown off with out landing the men on her, and has not yet got back. The steamers Augusta and Cincinnati have long been in service under high charters. The former has been fast aground since the 29th May, until two days ago. The latter is cooped up in the Rio Grande and is but little service. An old French barque called the Blayaise, was condemned at Galvestone the last of April, or early in May, as being unsea worthy, and sold in the latter month at auction. The hull, lower masts, and some of the ground tackle &c., was purchased for about $1,100 or $1,200: An expense of $300 perhaps was incurred in partially rigging her; when a Lieut. Kingsbury chartered her to bring two companies of Texan volunteers to this place, giving $950 for the trip. Soon after her arrival she was dismantled, and the rigging sold or otherwise disposed of, and the hull alone hired by the quartermaster at $30 per day—$10,950 per annum; a good interest on $1,500! Other cases as remarkable could be mentioned. A new quartermaster general is on his way here, it is said, and thing may be better managed perhaps. At some proper time it might be well to have an exhibit of the amount paid to each steamer and sailing vessel engaged in transporting troops and supplies to this place for the army, their tonnage, value, &c., and then obtaining from practical business men what such vessels could have been employed for by individuals for their own use. The most enormous rates were also paid last year for transportation to Corpus Christi and St. Joseph’s Island. Sometimes as much was paid for a vessel from New Orleans as she could have made on a voyage to Liverpool, and the rates have not abated. At an early period it will be well to look into these expenditures, and know who has made them or sanctioned them.

No one can tell when the army will make a forward movement. My belief is it will be a considerable time, and solely for the want of transportation. In the mean time the volunteers are much exposed. For two weeks or more it has rained almost every day, and the appearances are strongly in favor of a continuance of it. When it does not rain the sun is hot enough. The tents furnished are of an indifferent kind, and there are a number of companies particularly among the Texans, that have none at all. Yet the men so far continue tolerably healthy. How long it will last no one can tell.

Whether the Mexicans will risk another battle of a general kind is a question that cannot be decided now. If they could have been pursued soon after the battles in May, their force must have been dispersed, killed, or captured. As it is, they have ample time to raise reinforcements and recruit their spirits, and may make another stand in the hilly country. If they do, I have no doubt they will be defeated, and the war may be terminated soon; but if they do not conclude to make another general fight, the war will be of a partisan character, and no one can tell when it will terminate. We may overrun the country, but will not subdue it. As long as private property is respected, and the lives and rights of those not found in arms secured, the Mexicans do not car about our traveling through their country and paying the highest prices for what they have to sell. It is a species of warfare better for many of them than the state of peace they have heretofore enjoyed. The men are frequently employed here by the quartermaster, and are much better paid than they ever were before. Yet these people, as a mass, have the bitterest feelings against us. Their priests and demagogues have, for their own purposes, fostered their prejudices and animosities, and the idea of “extending the area of freedom” so as to include them, seems to me ridiculous and absurd.

The rumor is (and I think it worthy of credit) that the Mexicans are fortifying the town of Monterey. It is a place of considerable importance in a civil and military point of view, and it is possible the enemy may fight for it. If they do not, they will make no general fight, that is certain; and the war will then be of the guerrilla kind, and be waged in a most sanguinary spirit. Our people, particularly the Texans, feel very hostile and much exasperated against the Mexicans; and if ever the army is broken up into detachments and small parties they will not be spared by them. As long as we are embodied, under the control of high officers, a proper restraint will be exercised; but as soon as the small chiefs have sway then will bloodshed and rapine spread over the country. NNR 70.311 July 18, 1846 departure of the expedition against Santa Fe from Fort Leavenworth

Gen. Urrea, who, it is said, is advancing with a force of from three to five thousand men, upon Santa Fe, with a view of defending that section of the republic of Mexico from invasion, is said to be a man of approved courage and military capacity. Should he make his appearance there in time to avail himself of the best point to repel invasion, as he, doubtless, has done, he many give the force under the command of Colonel Kearney something to do, before possession of New Mexico is obtained. In his absence, however and with the acknowledged disposition of Armijo to show the Americans all possible favor, very little, if any opposition will be made to the entrance of Col. Kearney into that department of the republic. It will be, we suppose, the middle or latter end of August; before Colonel Kearney can cross the Rio del Norte and Gen. Urrea has, unquestionably, full time to prepare for his reception. The prospect of resistance, only give to the expedition a little more interest, and all eyes will be henceforth on the watch for news from that quarter. [St. Louis Repub. 3d] [VRD]

NNR 70.311 July 18, 1846 Louisiana habeas corpus case
HABEAS CORPUS—DESERTERS—Judge McCaleb, U.S. district court, N. Orleans, a few days since, in the case of Henry Grammont, arrested as a deserter from Major Gally’s battalion of volunteers, now stationed at Fort Jackson, after hearing able argument, in which the counsel for the government contended that Grammont was regularly and legally enlisted as a volunteer, under authority of Gen. Gaines—that he was legally enlisted under authority of the state of Louisiana, as expressed in resolutions of the legislature,—and that his voluntary act legally bound him to serve as a soldier in the army of the United States, thus decided.

The judge reviewed the case, and the laws applicable thereto, at some length, and concluded by deciding, that Gen. Gaines had no legal authority for calling out the battalion in question—that the president had not recognized his having so called them into service. That the battalion having been mustered into service by authority of the state of Louisiana, the court could have nothing to do with, unless such mustering was in pursuance of an order from the president or a law of congress;—that the voluntary enlistment of the individual could not be plead against his application, unless his enlistment had been made under due authority of law. His volunteering was for the purpose of aiding Gen. Taylor on the Rio Grande, and could not be construed to cover enlistments made to man forts within the limits of Louisiana, and for service far from the scene of operations, and on a territory where not the remotest apprehension of invasion was apprehended; a service, when we take into consideration that motives and object of the petitioned when he enlisted, comparatively ignoble in its nature. We cannot suppose that it was ever in the contemplation of those who consented to abandon the comforts of domestic life, to engage in the military service of the country, that they would be confined within the walls of a garrison, instead of being allowed to participate in the more exciting and honorable events of the war, for the prosecution of which they were called into service. Li is therefore ordered that the petitioner be discharged from custody.

NRR 70.311-312 July 18, 1846 Gen. Zachary Taylor’s interview with a gentleman’s son among the volunteers

INCIDENTS, &C.—Our friend, Capt. Church, of the Bulletin, on his late trip from New Orleans, brought with him a number of officers just from the army.—They were full of anecdote, of course, and the following little illustration of character is interesting as well as amusing:

Among the volunteers was a “gentleman’s son”—a full private, who, heartily sick of rainy weather, mud and no shelter, first went to his captain with his complaints, but meeting with no particular sympathy, resolved to have a talk with General Taylor himself. Arrived at the commander’s quarters, the general was pointed out to him, but he was rather incredulous—“That old fellow General Taylor?—Nonsense!” Satisfied, however, that such was even the case, he marched up, and rather patronizingly, opened his business.

“Yes, sir.”

“General, you’ll excuse me, but since I’ve been here I’ve been doing all I could for you—have, indeed; but the fact is, the accommodations are very bad—are, indeed; mud, sir! Actually mud!—bleeged to lie down in it, actually; and the fact is, General, I’m a gentleman’s son, and not used to it.”

The general no doubt deeply impressed with the fact of having a gentleman’s son in his army, expressed his regret that such grievances should ever exist under any circumstances, in a civilized army.

Well—but, General, What am I to do?”

“Well, really, I don’t know, unless you take my place.”

“Well, now, that’s civil—it’s indeed. Of course don’t mean to turn you out, but a few hour’s sleep—a cot or a bunk, or anything—would be so refreshing! Your place, where is it, General?"

"Oh. just drop down-anywhere about here-any place about camp will answer!"

The look which the "gentleman's son" gave the general was peculiar.

"Well, no wonder they call you 'Rough and Ready!' " said he; and amid the smiled of all but 'Rough and Ready' himself, "gentleman's son" returned to take his chance of the weather.

NNR 70.312 July 18, 1846 organizing of the regiments of Illinois volunteers

ILLINOIS VOLUNTEERS.-The 1st regiment of Illinois volunteers, now at Alton, under the command of Col. J. J. Hardin, has been fully organized, by the election of Wm. Weatherford, of Jacksonville, as lieutenant colonel, and Wm. B. Warren, of the same place, as major.

A letter from Alton, dated on Saturday evening last, informs us that all the companies comprising the three regiments of Illinois, except four, had arrived at the encampment and been mustered into service. The companies yet behind are to come from the southern counties: Gallatin, Pulaski, Pope, and Wayne. The company from Gallatin passed up on Saturday night last. [St. Louis Rep.] [VRD]

Officers-The board of officers, to whom was referred the question of rank between Col. Baker and Gen. Hardin, have decided in favor of Hardin.-The question of rank between Majors Morrison and Trial has been decided in favor of the former.

NNR 70.312 July 18, 1846 call on Iowa for an additional company of volunteers

IOWA VOLUNTEERS.-A requisition has been made by the president on the governor of Iowa, for one company of volunteers, in addition to the regiment called for from that territory. This company is to be stationed at Fort Atkinson, where they will probably remain for one year. Captain James M. Morgan is in command; 1st lieut., J. H. McKinney; 2d, D. S. Wilson. [VRD]

Commander of the Iowa volunteers.-The Burlington Hawk-Eye says: "We understand, a few days since, not knowing anything about the feeble state of Ex Governor Chambers' health, Governor Clarke visited Col. Chambers at his delightful country seat, for the sole purpose of offering him, without any solicitation on the part of any person, the command of the regiment of Iowa volunteers with the well deserved complimentary remark, that if Col. Chambers would accept it, he, Gov. Clarke, had no doubt about the regiment being filled up in forty eight hours after it is known that the ex-governor was to be its commander. When Gov. Clarke ad seen for himself that the illness and feebleness of his predecessor utterly prohibited the acceptance of the offer, he expressed much sincere regret." [VRD]

NNR 70.312-313 July 18, 1846 indignation over appointment of Sterling Price as commander of a company of Missouri volunteers

The Plamyra (Mo) Courier says: "It is now positively ascertained that an additional thousand volunteer for Santa Fe will be accepted from Missouri. There has, however, been no regular call upon the state for that number; but the privilege to raise a regiment of one thousand volunteers, has been delegated to certain men, who are to act as commanders. The individuals are, Sterling Price, of Chariton, as colonel; D.D. Mitchel, of St. Louis. Lieut. Colonel; Wm. Gilpin, of Jackson, and Thomas Price, of Cole, majors. No complaint is made of these men as officers; but many object to the mode of their attaining command. It is greatly repugnant to the ideas and feelings of our citizens to be denied the right of selecting their own officers, as they have been accustomed to do. In consequence of this feeling, little disposition is manifested to volunteer. While we cannot approve the manner in which these officer [UNREADABLE] Missouri refased a privilege that thousands in other states are eager to accept because a condition is attached that they are to receive as officers men whose exertions and influence doubtless obtained for them that privilege.

Gen. Willock having returned from Jefferson city with assurance that one or two companies would be received from this division, has, with his usual promptitude and energy, set about raising a company. His headquarters are at the Missouri house, where persons wishing to volunteer may enroll their names. The general expects to be off in eight or ten days, and has expressed a determination to go whether he gets a company or not. As his company is, however, rapidly filling up, those wishing to join had better report themselves immediately."

_Thomas L. Price_, of Jefferson city, who was designated to take the command of a battalion of artillery in the same way Col. S. Price was designated for the regiment, has abandoned the project, assigning other engagements as the reason for this course. [St. Louis Republican. [VRD]

NNR 70.313-314 July 18, 1846 correspondence of Gen. William Jenkins Worth and Gen. Zachary Taylor on desire of Worth to retire from his command

BREVET BRIGADIER GEN. WORTH.

Who can view the incidents of the existing war, without profound regret for the fate in which this, one of the most efficient and distinguished officers that belongs to our army, has been subjected?

The services rendered by General Worth in finally bringing to an issue the protracted war with the Seminoles in Florida, had fully prepared the public mind throughout the country for an exhibition of the same military talents upon a large field, in case of another war. This expectation for a time was fully realized. General Worth left Florida in September last with his regiment, and was amongst the first upon the ground of Corpus Christi, in command of the first brigade, consisting of twelve companies of artillery, the 8th regiment of infantry, and Duncan’s battery. On the march from thence to the Rio del Norte, when the Mexican forces threatened to dispute the passage of General Taylor’s army at the Colorado River, General Worth led the advance of the gallant light companies, in face of a dense chaparral, through water four feet deep, and 110 yards wide. Whist the Mexican artillery, un{illegible} with port fired lit, occupied the opposite bank. It was General Worth, who, with his own hands, first hoisted the American flag on the banks of the Rio Grande, in the face of the enemy’s forces posted at Matamoros, while the Americans loudly cheered the waving emblem of their nation.

It was curing the quiet which for some time succeeded the occupation of the post last mentioned, that General Worth received the mortifying intelligence, that he had been superceded in rank, by an arrangement announced from the war department.

Sharing fully in the opinion which General Taylor manifestly entertained at that period, that no serious hostile demonstrations would be attempted for some time by the Mexicans, General Worth deemed it due to himself as an officer, to demonstrate his sensibility to such an arrangement as had been ordered. He therefore addressed the following letter to Gen. Taylor.

Headquarters, 1st brigade, Army of Occupation, April 2d, 1846.

GENERAL: The bearer of your dispatches has left, and I cannot permit a moment to pass before pressing upon your kind consideration the hope that you will be pleased immediately to relieve me from a command which you had the confidence to confer and in which with all the ardour of my nature, and to the best of my abilities I have sought to serve you and the country. If there is any form or manner in which out of authority I can serve you, it is hardly necessary to say with what alacrity I shall be always at your command. At the earliest moment when you feel assured that no conflict is at hand or in prospective, I shall be much gratified by being allowed to retire and NOT BEFORE. I remain, General. Very truly yours, W.J. WORTH, Brigadier General.

Point Isabel. Brazos Santiago. 13th of April, 1846

GENERAL: Major Munroe has advised me of your communication of yesterday. I have been detained here by stress of weather and shall be probably for several days. I need not say that my services are entirely at your command at any time, place or moment. I remain, General, with highest respect, your obedient servant, W. J. WORTH, Brigadier General. To Brig. Gen. TAYLOR, commanding, &c.

To which Gen. Taylor responded on the 14th of April, as follows:

Headquarters, Army of Occupation, Camp near Matamoros, April 14th, 1846.

GENERAL: Your esteemed letter of yesterday’s date was duly received, and I sincerely thank you for the offer of your services. Had we been attacked as there was a decided probability that such would be the case from the other side, I would gladly avail myself of them, as I know your head, heart, and hand would have been with us even to the death, if necessary, in such a contingency. General Ampudia had just reached Matamoros with a small reinforcement of cavalry, assumed the command, and at once ordered all Americans in the city to leave for Victoria, one hundred and fifty miles in the interior, in twenty-four hours; and the next day notified me to leave for the east bank of the Nueces, also in twenty-four hours. In case of my not doing so war would be the result. I informed him that I had been ordered by my government to take and occupy a position on the left of the Rio Grande, which I had done and from which I could not recede, except by orders from the same quarter that brought me here. The movement in question, it was expected by my government, would have been a peaceful one, and that he was fully at liberty to make it otherwise at any moment he might see fit to do so; in which case he would be responsible for all the consequences resulting from the same; since which I have heard nothing further from him, and I imagine I will not, except in the way of protests, remonstrances, &c-at any rate until my communication can go to the city of Mexico, be acted on there, and the measures to be pursued growing out of it received at Matamoros, not any thing stronger than paper bulletins will be received by us. At the same time I must be, if possibly fully prepared, at all times to meet any even or occurrences which may arise. Under this state of things, I could not ask you to return. The weather here since you left has been wretched, and from present appearances will continue so for some time, which has made us all quite miserable.
I presume it was no better at Point Isabel; if so you must have had anything but a comfortable time of it there. We have heard nothing certain as regards the fate of Cross. Wishing that matters at Washington may be so arranged as to do away the necessity of your returning from the service, I remain with respect and esteem your obedient servant,

Z. TAYLOR.

To Gen. Worth, U. S. army, Point Isabel.

This correspondence closes by General Worth’s letter in answer to Gen. Taylor, date April 16th.

Point Isabel, 2 o’clock P.M.
April 16th, 1846

General: I am this moment in receipt of your kind and obliging favor of the 14th, and shall, in half an hour, embark with a heart lessened in some degree of its oppressive burden. I congratulate you on the turn of events. The enemy has now tired his gun, and will surrender the boundary as submissively as he professed the determination to resist.-Your duties will be those of pacification; the more agreeable, because more conformable to the policy of our government. Would to God I could go better assured of the fate of Cross. I strongly incline to the belief that Canales’ people, acting on the suggestions of Carabajal, may have laid a snare for him, in the hope that it might provoke you to commence hostilities. Recollect what I reported to you of the letter addressed to me after his parting with you at Point Isabel. It is possible I may go to Washington as you advise.

Wishing you all success and honor, I remain, General, very truly yours.

W.J. WORTH

To General Taylor,

General Worth repaired to Washington. The day after his arrival information was received that hostilities had commenced on the Rio Grande.-His letter and that of General Jones show that he was as prompt now as he had ever been, in a service of thirty-three years to repair to his country’s standard—which sentiment was understood and appreciated by the president of the United States.

Gen. W. writes as follows to the adjutant general:

Washington city, May 9th. 1846.
6 o’clock, P. M.

SIR: Reliable information which I have this moment received from the head quarters of the army in front of Matamoros, makes it not only a duty, but accords with my inclination to request permission to withdraw my resignation, and that I be ordered or permitted forthwith to return to, and take command of the troops from which I was separated on the 7th of April, by order NO. 42, Army of Occupation. I am, sire, with high respect, &c., &c

W. J. WORTH, Brigadier General.

Adjutant General’s Office

Washington, May 9th, 1846.

General: I have submitted to the secretary of war your letter of this afternoon’s date, in which for reasons stated, you request that your resignation recently tendered, may be recalled, and you may be ordered or permitted forthwith to return to, and take command of the troops from which you were separated on the 7th of April, by order No. 42, Army of Occupation.

The motives which prompt this course on your part are fully appreciated; and I am directed to say that your request is complied with. You will therefore repair without delay to General Taylor’s head quarters, and report to him accordingly. I am, very respectfully, your ob’t serv’t,

B. JONES, Adjutant General.

To Brevet Brigadier Gen. W. J. WORTH,
U.S. Army, Washington, D. C.

Gen. Worth throughout evinced no disposition to avoid duty, but anxious, to have a question settled that was almost creating a mutiny in the camp—he repaired to Washington determined not to be the cause of dissension in the face of the enemy, believing too, as lie had good cause, “that nothing stronger would occur than paper bulletins,” as expressed by General Taylor. But when the first rumor of a collision reached. Washington city, Gen. Worth sacrificing everything, disregarding that so depressing to a soldier’s spirit, withdrew his resignation, repaired instantly to the camp on the Rio Grande, where he now is, in line, ready to lead our armies to Mexico, which he is abundantly able to do, combining the rare qualities of diplomatist (appreciating and understanding the peculiar features of our government,) with that of a soldier—well tried in many an open field, and bearing upon his body marks of the enemy which will live with the history of those glorious achievements, ever commanding the admiration of the America people as well as the consideration and respect of the world. [NRR 70.320] July 18, 1846 intrigues to restore Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna to power in Mexico

INTRIGUES. There have been various speculations as to certain movements said to be on foot for the restoration of Santa Anna to power in Mexico. It has been intimated also that our government had something to do with the project in question, and that upon Santa Anna’s return to the administration in Mexico a peace would be negotiated between that republic and the United States on the basis of the cession of the Californias to this country. The Union refers to this subject, and says:

"we deem it our duty to state in the most positive terms. That our government has no sort of connexion with any scheme of Santa Anna for the revolution of Mexico, or for any sort of purpose. Some three months ago some adventurer was in Washington who wished to obtain their countenance and aid in some scheme or other connected with Santa Anna. They declined all sort of connexion, cooperation, or participation in any effort for the purpose. The government of this country declines all such intrigues or bargains. They have made war openly in the face of the world. They mean to prosecute it with all their vigor. They mean to force Mexico to do us justice at the point of the sword. This, then, is their design—this is their plan; and it is worthy of a bold, high-minded, and energetic people. [VRD]

[NRR 70.323] July 25, 1846 war for a “piece” of Mexico

DIPLOMATIC JOURNAL.

Diplomatic terms. The Tribune says—“We notice that all the officials, in speaking of the Mexican war, contend that it is to be carried on to ‘conquer peace with Mexico. Why not "own the corn, and say, to conquer a piece of Mexico."

The venerable Pickle Pickleby says—"Read your bible Jabez, study the laws of Moses, and don’t repeal any of ’em; mind the ten commandments tu, and the ’lventh likewise, and don’t sell the birthright of the Yankee nation for a mess of potash; and the day may kum when you will be a minister of a penitentiary or a secretary of negation."—St. Louis Reveille.
The president has recognized Henrich Wilhelm Kuhtmann, as Consul of Hanover, for the port of Charleston, in the state of South Carolina. [VRD]

NAVAL JOURNAL

The Intelligencer of the 23d, after mentioning the attendance of each of the officers named, adds—"It has been reported, and generally believed, that the object for which this Board has been convened is to deliberate on the best mode of attacking and capturing, by a naval force, the Mexican fortress of San Juan de Ulloa. We understand, however, that that subject has not, but other matters have been brought before this board, during the two days that it has sat. Nor, from what we hear, do we think that it will be."

This takes us all aback. Even conjecture is at fault.

The "Union" of the 22d, says, all the officers summoned by the secretary of the navy to attend the board on the occasion, were in attendance on the 21st, except Captain Lavallette, who is supposed to be on his way from Memphis to attend the board. The twenty officers named above, in full uniform, waited upon the president, at his mansion, on Tuesday. The Union also says—"The rumor which connects them with the castle of San Juan d’Ulloa, or any thing else connected with Mexican hostilities, is pure fiction."

Gulf squadron. There were off Vera Cruz when the British steamer Clyde left there on the 6th of July, the frigates Cumberland 50 guns, Raritan 50, Potomac 50; corvette John Adams 20 guns, brig Somers 10 guns; steamers Mississippi 8 guns. Princeton 7 guns. Capt. Simmons of the Clyde reports seeing six other U. S. vessels of war off the harbor as lie came out.

The British squadron there consisted of the steamer Vesuvius, a ship of 50 guns, another steamer and a brig. The Vesuvius, it is said, was going to Tampico to take on board specie which the U. S. brig St. Mary’s, block adding there, had refused to permit the British mail steamers to receive. The captain of the steamer is represented as avowing his intention to demand an explanation of the captain of the St. Mary’s.

The port of Alvarado is blockaded. The Mexicans have all kinds of stories in relation to the attack of the St. Mary’s upon Tampico. They have also a rumor that Commodore Conner was to attack the castle off Vera Cruz, &c., on the 10th July.

The British sloop-of-war Rose arrived at Brazo Santingo on the 9th inst. Tampico, and the U. S. schr. Flirt arrived there on the 11th from the same port. [VRD]

THE WAR WITH MEXICO

There are sufficient evidences that the administration are exerting their utmost energies for carrying on the war against Mexico in every direction, with a view to insure its termination as speedily as it can be effected. The expedition against Santa Fe, under Col. Kearney, has started from Fort Leavenworth, and are, by this date, far upon their route. That against Northern California under Gen. Wool, is also concentrating as the several detachments wend their way to the west. The light and flat bottom boats to enable Gen. Taylor to ascend the Rio del Norte, are at length reaching him, and the wagons and teams to enable him to move from the river towards the interior of Mexico, will no doubt soon be on.

In the meantime, the Mexican ports on the gulf are strictly blockaded by the American squadron. Tampico has been attacked. Nothing enters Vera Cruz with out being overhauled by our vessels, which keep just out of gun shot from the castle of St. Juan d'Ulloa.-That government determined that an attack should be made upon the castle, we have no doubt. It was found to be too formidable for our present squadron in the gulf to attempt it. We judge from the active preparations which are said to be now making at the several navy yards for fitting out all the heavy line of battle ships, that the navy officers which have been summoned to Washington and are now in session there, are occupied in discussing what forces are required, and what disposition shall be made of the forces that can e commanded for the purpose of reducing the castle.

The squadron in the Pacific have no doubt, by this time, taken possession of some of the principal Mexican ports on that ocean.

The expedition fitting out at New York under Col. Stevenson, designed to reach the coast of California by the way of Cape Horn, will be on their voyage in the course of a few days, with a force which the Mexican ports will be unprepared to resist in that direction.

Meantime, Yucatan, her most valuable southern province, has declared independence, and is exempted from American assault.

Reports from Cuba, state that Santa Anna and Almonte were to embark from thence in the English mail steamer of the 10th inst. For Vera Cruz, with the intention of attempting another revolution in Mexico. Whether Com. Conner will permit those Mexicans to enter Mexico, is the question. It is confidently asserted that Santa Anna goes home with avowed design of defending Mexico from the invasion of the United States forces, and expects the revolution to turn upon his admitted energy and capacity for meeting emergencies – Almonte we all know, is the inveterate opponent of the United States' measures against Mexico. Already the western provinces of Mexico have pronounced against Paredes and in favor of Santa Anna.

Whether Paredes has ventured to leave the capital, with a view of taking command of the army opposed to Gen. Taylor, is doubtful. He could hardly do so, with any hope of retaining the supremacy. The moment he leads his army and adherents out of the vicinity of the city of Mexico, some one will step in and supercede him there.

From the provinces further north, we have indications of an attempt to separate from Mexico altogether, and erect a republic of their own, - that is, taking a lesson from the recent history of Texas, partisans are colleaguing with a view of treading in her footsteps. It is quite possible that Col. Kearney and Gen. Wool will, on arrival at their destinations, find the country under the flag of the "republic of California." There are Americans(including Mormons) enough on the road to settle all dispute. Upon the whole, Mexico is certainly at this moment rather in a predicament. [VRD]
The English steamer Clyde, arrived at Havana on the 6th inst. From Tampico, Vera Cruz, with dates from Tampico to 2d July, Vera Cruz to 22d, and Mexico city to the 19th June. Dates direct from Vera Cruz via Havana, are to the 30th June, and from Mexico to the 28th, at which time congress was still in session, and deliberating on a declaration of war.

One brigade of the Army of reserve had marched to the aid of the army of the north. The remaining body of reserve would remain in the capital till the arrival of Gen. Bravo, so that the forces previously announced as having collected at Monterey, have been very much overrated. From the Castle of Perote, a large number of mounted guns and ammunition, had been sent to the defence of the city of Mexico.

Paredes had ordered the formation of a battalion of militia to be ordered, and two squadrons of cavalry in the city of Mexico – and every effort is making to increase the ranks of the army.

We have bud from various directions, {unreadable} that Santa Anna and Almonte were to leave Havana for Vera Cruz, - first it was said they were to leave on the 6th, then on the 10th, and now we have it postponed to the 12th. The revolution in favor of Santa Anna has extended to all the cities from Acapulco to Mazatlan, embracing the departments on the Pacific, which are now in arms against Paredes, with the exception of Oajaca and La Puebla, two southern departments which remain neutral.

Santa Anna has written a letter of condolence to Gen. Vega and his fellow prisoners, which is copied in the Vera Cruz papers. It breathes no friendly sentiment towards the United States.

Vera Cruz itself has been almost evacuated, the merchants retiring to Jalapa and Orizaba, with their property.

Two Mexican steamers were at Havana on the 5th inst., with no one on board but ship keepers. [VRD]

THE RIO GRANDE.

There has been a succession of gales at Brazos, and in the gulf, - many vessels wrecked.

The steamer Potomac, was wrecked about six miles from the pass of St. Louis. She was on board Captain Lamesdon’s junior company, - all saved, - steamer a total loss; cargo damaged.

The schr. Lavina, wrecked, - her crew saved by the Flirt.

July 3d. The revenue cutters Woodbury, Forward, and Van Buren, with a large fleet of merchantmen were outside the bar at Brazos, waiting to be taken in.

Walker, the distinguished Texan ranger, is said to have declined the captaincy of the U.S. mounted riflemen, to which he had been appointed.

July 26th. An affray between two Texan mounted men in camp, resulted in the death of one of them named Walker.

Lieut. Kingsbury and Dr. Russell, of the army, arrived at New Orleans on the 3d inst, in the Galveston. [VRD] TRANSPORTATION.

The "Union" of the 17th, has an article written for the purpose of proving that there has been no fault in the department in relation to furnishing the army on the frontier with requisite material for transportation. Certain it is, as the article says, "Some complaints have been made." The editor of the Union "undertakes to say that there is no foundation" for these complaints, having called at the quartermaster's office that day to enquire, and become fully satisfied, by personal examination.

The editor of the Union says – "We shall not enumerate all the various sources of supply," but "among the letters which he has received is one from Col. Thomas F. Hunt, from New Orleans, July 4. – He "reports that he purchased steamers Undine, for $13,000; Troy, $6,000; J.E. Roberts, $9,000, the 13th June; the Brownville, for $9,000, the 15th June; steam schooner James Cage, for $18,000, on the 19th; Hatchee Eagle, the 1st July, for $5,000. All have been dispatched to the Rio Grande except the last – she detained for repairs deemed necessary. Undine and James Cage have been coppered and otherwise repaired. The Cage is a good seaboat, and suited for lightering vessels at sea, &c. The Undine sent temporarily to La Baca. Has chartered steamers Big Hatchee, the Warren, the Exchange, and the W.A. Mercer, which have also departed for Brazos Santiago. [VRD]

70.325 letter from Henry Whiting on the delivery of supplies to the Army in Texas

Extract of a letter from Capt. John Sanders, the officer appointed by General Taylor to purchase or charter boats, dated July 2, 1846, at Pittsburg:

"Advises he had purchased five light draught steamers for the Rio Grande, as follows: Whiteville, the Corvette, Rough and Ready, Colonel Cross, and the Major Brown – total cost $60,000. These are all splendid boats of their class."

GENERAL: I left New Orleans in the Alabama the evening of the 19th; she had supplies for Robin's Ferry. These were landed at Galveston, and transportation at once provided for them up the Trinity. Fortunately the waters are high, and it is probable they will get up. The price of freight was high, but the best bargain the means of the place admitted was made by Lieut. Kingsbury, with my approbation. No time was to be lost. A few days later, and the river would have been impracticable."

We anchored off Brazos the evening of the 24th; wind was strong the next morning; and the sea high, still the Monmouth came out to us. But she could receive only the mail, which was transferred with much difficulty and some peril. Towards night our anchor gave way, and we stood off. The next morning early we were back again, but the sea was higher than ever. The day before about twenty sail were at anchor outside, (a large number within where Harney was sunk.) They had all stood off, excepting two square-rigged, having volunteers on board, which had left New Orleans two days before us. The wind continuing violent until the morning of the 27th, we came in here to recruit our water, volunteers, (about 300) with more than fifty passengers, having reduced our supply too low. Some of the companies had also got out of provisions. We hope to start again to-morrow evening with better luck. The Alabama is a first rate boat. None other could have been unusually stormy it is said.

Very Respectfully, I am general, your obedient servant, HENRY WHITING.

General THOS. S. JESUP, Quartermaster General, U.S. Army, Washington city, D.C.

The above are the exhibits of the Union, in proof that no fault is attributable to the department, at Washington, if the army under General Taylor is unable to move for want of material for transportation.

General Taylor defeated the Mexican army on the 9th of May. Upwards of two months have elapsed, and his army is not yet provided with the means of moving to dislodge them from the first position they took up after their defeat. The officer dispatched by General Talor reports to him on 2d July, that he has just then purchased at Pittsburg five light draught steamboats, &c. [VRD]
ROUTE FROM MATAMOROS TO THE INTERIOR OF MEXICO

A letter from F. M. Dimond, U. S. Consul at Vera Cruz, dated Washington, 13th July, 1846, furnishes an extract from a communication of G. T. Pell, of New York, giving memorandae from his note book, kept during a journey from Zacatecas, one of the principal mining districts of Mexico, to Matamoros, by way of Saltillo and Monterey, with a wagon heavily laden with specie, seven mules in harness, and abundant relays. They traveled from eight to fourteen leagues per day. A Spanish league is 2 ½ miles. He represents the road as presenting no serious difficulties for wagons or heavy artillery. - His distances are.

“"The distance through the Canada, or mountain defile, from Monterey to the nearest outskirts of the plain above, Is fourteen leagues. On the farther side of the plain, upon the declivity of a hill, stands the city of Satillo. Within the pass the mountains at times approach rather near, at others recede perhaps a mile and a half from the road, which winds over bold hills. Towards Monterey the mountains approach more closely, and a stream issues from the gorge which irrigates the beautiful gardens of the weather inhabitants, running off below the town, where it is drawn to fertilize the little paicifes of the Indians flowing round and about their mud or bamboo huts, watering the banana, the orange, the pomegranate, the aguacate, cherimoya, and other fruits and vegetables of the tropics, which these poor people carry for sale on donkeys to Saltillo, which, being situated on the lofty plains of the table land, only produces the fruits of the north-the apple, pear, quince, and apricot-with their corresponding vegetables. I trust these poor people will not be molested; for neither to them, nor to lurge classes many grades above them, are to be attributed the maladministration of a government in which, being really a military despotism, they have no more share than the seris of Russia.

I am certainly not a little surprised at so great a stress being laid upon the difficulties for troops on a march through Mexico in the rainy season. An erroneous idea has crept into the public mind that during this period rain falls almost constantly, rendering the roads deep and impassable. The rainy commences in June, with showers at long intervals, and does not fairly set in until the middle of sometimes the later part of July, varying from one year to another in the quantity which falls as much as happens with us from summer to summer. I have even known a year in which there was not sufficient rain to produce the slightest sprig of grass, causing the loss of hundreds of thousands of animals on the great haciendas in rearing them. When the rains are most copious, they do not generally begin until 12 or 1 o’clock; dark clouds rising rapidly over the heavens, giving sudden and plentiful showers, in most instances passing away early, and leaving a bright sunset and a fine morning.

On two occasions I performed a journey of near 400 leagues over the great mountain ranges of the Cordillera, through which flow many considerable streams, to Culiacan, near the Pacific, during unusually wet seasons, without having in a single instance been caught in the rain. It was accomplished by rising before day light, and arriving at the stopping place for the night before the rain began to fall. Water, at other times, very scarce in certain localities, was found every where, good pasture abounded, and the air was cool; the great heat always abating when the periodical rains set in. There was exemption, too, from dust; nor did I find, except in rare instances, that the roads were heavy.

I can easily understand how gentlemen acquainted mostly with the neighborhood of the city of Mexico, and the great road from thence to Guanajuato, through what is called the bajio, should fall into this mistake. No inconsiderable swamps or lakes. But I have seen nothing like this elsewhere. From Camargo to Monterey, although there are intervals of level ground, yet for most yet for the most part the road runs over easy hills, and I cannot believe an army would meet with any obstacle of importance—the only difficulty being the passage of the river. San Juan, which is but a small stream, and can oppose nothing insurmountable if the troop carry any provision for such an emergency. If the rains do not prove very heavy, it will be found fordable, as I passed it without detention with a loaded wagon.” [VRD]

NNR 70.325-326 July 25, 1846 want of discipline among the volunteer

VOLUNTEERS.

WANT OF DISCIPLINE. - The public journals from the vicinity or routes taken by the volunteers, bring to us, we are sorry to say, innumerable proofs of the lack of discipline and the prevalence not only of insubordination, but also of disgraceful rowdyism, amongst the volunteers. That graceless and lawless spirits, being the most difficult to control, join the ranks and carry with them their lawless propensities, is a matter of course. It is almost impossible to prevent the occurrence of such incidents, where such men “most do congregate,” as are referred to in numerous paragraphs like the following:

Camp Washington.-We are glad to lean there is a prospect of one or two regiments of the volunteers getting off this week. The sooner they are removed the better. A state of things has existed at the camp for the last few days which is highly disgraceful to all concerned. On Sunday a spirit of insubordination (aided by the spirit of alcohol) existed which no friend of law and order desired to be repeated. The troops had been paid during the morning, two months’ wages in advance, and there appeared to be no lack of means bout the camp whereby they could spend their money. [Cin. Atlas.

We are sorry to note a riotous and rowdy disposition manifested by the citizen soldiery volunteered into service. The corps at Louisville have had several rows of disgraceful character, in which knives, pistols, and other southern chivalries were put in requisition. Mr. Marshall, late a M. C. came very near loosing his life in attempting to prevent one of these outrages upon the citizens. [Ex. Paper.

The Louisville Journal of June 29 says—“There was another disgraceful row between some of the volunteers and citizens about dusk last evening, on Green street. We learn that a man named Davis was so seriously beaten by the volunteers that his life is despaired of. The police were promptly on the spot, and the citizens gathered in large numbers, highly incensed at the volunteers. Pierce Butler esq., and Colonel Mc Kee addressed the crowd, after which they dispersed. One of the volunteers, the principal actor in the scene, was put in jail.” [VRD] Pennsylvania volunteers. - Adj. Gen. Petrikin, of the state of Pennsylvania, in a communication to the Pennsylvania says that "the whole number of companies tendering exactly, according to the regulations of the president of the United States, as transmitted by the secretary of war to Gov. Shunk, is 82, giving an aggregate of 6,437 officers and men, or 1,717 more than required to fill up the regiments. To this add the two Fayette county battalions, (1,000,) and the aggregate is increased to 2,717, about 500 more than the gallant Taylor achieved his brilliant victories with. The number of informal officers would swell the aggregate to, I think, some 10 or 12,000. The offers received and filled, have all been made in good faith and calm deliberation. The officers and men, composing the companies, have had full time to reflect, and did not act from feverish impulse, or under the influence of a fit, or fits, or patriotic delirium. The have been governed by cool, calm, deliberate, and exalted patriotism, and, if called into actual service, who doubts but they will exalt the glory and honor of the country in their most devoted love?"

Philadelphia city and county furnish 27 companies, numbering all told officers and men, 2,284, or within 96 of three regiments, but wanting 3 companies to complete 3 regiments, ~10 companies forming a regiment. This day, July 11th, closes the receipt of tenders of services. I know of three more companies, whose muster rolls have been placed in the hands of the proper officers, but have not yet reached the adjutant generals office, at this place.

Later. - The adjutant general of the Pennsylvania militia states, officially, "that, instead of six regiments, ninety full companies, a number of sufficient to constitute nine regiments regularly organized in accordance with the regulations adopted by the president, have tendered their services as volunteers for Mexico." This fact has been communicated to the president, further orders from whom are awaited by Gov. Shunk. [RCG]

Ohio Volunteers. - The 3d regiment of volunteers from Ohio reached N. Orleans on the 10th inst. [RCG]

The Baltimore Volunteers. -Deaths.- Robert Beacham, a private in Capt. Piper's company; died on the passage to Brassos; Richard Belt, a private of Capt. Kenley's company, was drowned of the passage; - Cole, a private of Capt. Stewats company, was sun struck on the passage, and as the ship came to anchor. They were all buried with military honors.[RCG]

Brigadier Gen. Thomas Marshall., recently appointed to command the Kentucky volunteers, is not Thomas F. Marshall, late a member of congress. A Kentucky paper says:

"Gen. Marshall. -- Thomas Marshall, of Lewis co., Ky., lately appointed brigadier general of a company raised in Mason county. He did not succeed in being elected captain, and was chosen lieutenant, that being in the opinion of his fellow volunteers, as high as he ought to be. This company, we understand, was not received, and a regiment was formed of that and other companies in like situation, and he was chosen to command a battalion. Col. Clarkson and himself were dispatched to Washington to induce the president to accept the regiment. The president received them kindly, and with fair words at the White house, but the troops were not received into the service. Clarkson returned home, leaving Marshall behind. He secured a brigadier's commission for himself. We understand that Colonel Clarkson has since been appointed paymaster general, but whether through the instrumentality of Marshall of not we know not.

Brigadier Gen. Hamer. -- The Cincinnati Gazette says: --"The appointment of Thomas L. Hamer, of Ohio, to be brigadier general of the volunteers, slumps the editor of the Ohio State Journal -- he has scarcely credulity enough to believe the report. He says: "It will cause a hearty laugh all over the state. Why Hamer himself laughed at the mere idea of being elected to the command of one of the Ohio regiments, in view of the fact that he is entirely destitute of military experience, even in the peace service! If they wanted speeches made, he said he was the man; but as to commanding a regiment that was out of the question! If such an appointment has really been made, Ohio will give up that Mr. Polk is the master military genius of the age." We do not know how it may be with the Ohio brigadier general, but we venture to say that he can scarcely be less ignorant of military matters than General [!!] Shields, of Illinois. He may be able to discuss a "hasty plate of soup," as witty editors phrase it, but as for any other portion of Gen Scott's system of tactics, he is as completely at fault as the most ignorant militia captains of the Sucker state. The thing is absolutely ridiculous, and we shall be deceived in Judge --stop, General--Shields, if he does not send back his declension of the commission as fast as the mail can carry it."

The Ohio State Journal enumerates the names of eight of ten persons appointed as assistant quartermaster and assistant commissaries in that state, and says "they are all bitter partizans, whose only merit is that they are partizans." It adds that "the war department sent a request to Gov. Bartly and Gen. Woll, to recommend suitable persons for these posts, and we learn that not a single individual recommended by either of them has been appointed from this state." Of course it was not expected that the would be, the members of congress, as in the case of Illinois, parceled out the spoils to suit themselves.[RCG]

NNR 70.326 July 25, 1846 complaints about the rejection by Gov. Thomas Ford of Illinois of some volunteers

Gov. Ford, of Illinois, and the Clark county volunteers. -- At a meeting of the citizens of Clark county, Ill., held at the court house in Marshall, on the 6th day of July, 1846, Lames Whitlock was chosen president, and R.M. Newport and Stephen Archer vice presidents; T.R. Young and R.L. Dulaney secretaries. The object of the meeting was explained by the president, a committee appointed to report a preamble and resolutions, expressive of the sense for this meeting, in regard to the conduct of Thomas Ford, governor of this state, in his wanton rejection of the company of volunteers who had enrolled themselves under Captain Wm. B. Archer, in pursuance of the general orders for volunteers of said Thomas Ford, as commander in chief of the militia of Illinois, under date, Springfield, May 25th, 1846. During the absence of the committee, speeches were made by U. Manly, W.P. Bennet, R.B. McCowen, esqrs.; and Rev. R.M. Newport. The committee reported the following preamble and resolutions, which were adopted by acclamation.

Whereas, Thomas Ford, governor of the state of Illinois, (in pursuance of a requisition from the secretary of war of the United States, for the calling out three regiments of infantry in this state,) as commander in chief of the militia of this state, issued his 'general orders,' bearing date May 25th, 1846, commanding all majors and brigadier generals, &c.; and in case there was no military organization, then all the sheriffs to call the militia together "en masse," and enroll volunteers for the service and having stated in said orders that if more than thirty companies with their proper complement of officers should be companies as first offered their services.
And the sheriff of Clark country, on the 5th day of June, 1846, having (in obedience to said orders) called the militia of said county together at Marshall, at which time and a full company of eighty privates and the proper complement of officers, enrolled themselves; and the said sheriff was dispatched as a special messenger to the governor, with the return of the said sheriff, to his excellency, informing him that a company was organized, with the names of the officers, which return was by the said sheriff on the 9th day of June 1846, delivered into the state department about noon; and W.B. Fondy, the then acting governor at Springfield, returned by said sheriff, an answer in writing to Wm. B. Archer, the captain of said company, accepting the company and saying "that upon the return of the governor, from St.
Louis, he would be directed as to the time and place of rendezvous." Said company being the 27th on the list of the companies published in the Missouri Republican a letter of order "for the information of the Illinois volunteers," dated June 11th, 1846, setting forth a list of the companies received, in which list among others, he specifies one company from Clarke county, closing his said letter or order with the following sentence:--"The companies above named may expect to receive marching orders in
The volunteers in this county, relying on the integrity of the said Thomas Ford, as expressed in his "general orders" in the reception of the company by acting Governor Fondy and in said Ford’s letter or order published in the Missouri Republican, proceeded to equip themselves and friends in an expense of nearly one thousand dollars, and being fully ready for service—and relying upon the above assurances, so strong that no one but the most indurated offender could avoid --at noon, on the 21st day of June, took up the line of march for Alton, and arriving at the place of rendezvous on the morning of the 26th, marching a distance of one hundred and fifty miles in four and a half days, and upon reporting themselves to the inspecting officer, they were politely met with the "special plea" of "You have received no marching orders." Ford was then waited on by Captain Archer, and informed of the arrival of his company, to which Gov. Ford replied (among other things) "that he had sent on the 17th of June, orders to Capt. Archer no to march." which orders have not to this time reached our post office; and we are fully of the belief that the governor committed a slight mistake in this statement. The governor, then, instead of adhering to his truly made orders, too two days' time to hunt an excuse to reject the company; and after failing to find, either in his own or in the brain of any of his driveling privates, even a plausible reason, he could only answer "he had done wrong," but utterly refused to correct that wrong and rejected the company.[RCG]

NNR 70.326-327 July 25, 1846 relief to families of volunteers

Relief of the families of the volunteers. -- When the St. Louis Legion was about to leave for the south, a meeting of citizens was held at the court house, at which resolutions were adopted, and committees appointed, to raise the means necessary to provide subsistence for the families of such volunteers as were compelled to leave them unprovided for. Each company was requested to furnish a list of those requiring aid, and it was done. Since the fever for volunteering for that service has passed away, the committee, or at least a portion of them, appear to have lost all interest in the subject, and, with but few exceptions, have taken no measures to provide the destitute with the means of living. On Monday night last, a meeting of the committee was to be held at the court house, but we learn that only three or four were present.

The public are certainly not aware of the destitute condition of the wives and families of several volunteers, or they would not be guilty of this inattention. We have satisfactory information that there are several women, some with a number of children, who are really in necessitous circumstances. They are industrious and hard working, but their own labor is not sufficient to pay house rent, and provide other necessaries for their families. They do not ask or expect much, but the little that was promised when their husbands left, should be made up for them immediately. We have heard of several families who, with all the labor and saving of the mothers, have yet been a tax on the liberality of a few individuals. This state of things ought not to exist. A few hundred dollars which might be raised in a single day, in this community, judiciously applied in paying rent, or providing other absolute necessaries would make these families happy, and place them beyond want, until their protectors return. The service which they are rendering to their county, should secure from their fellow citizens this much, at least; and if the committee appointed at the former meeting are unwilling to act, another meeting should be called, and a new committee appointed. That the wants of some of the families have become distressingly pressing we know and some action should be immediately taken. [St. Louis Rep. July 8.]

NNR 70.327 July 25, 1846 Mormons enlist in the expedition against California

From the Mormon camp.-- The Hancock (Illinois) Eagle of the 10th instant, notices the arrival there of Mr. S. Chamberlain, who left the most distant camp of the Mormons at Council Bluffs on the 26th ult. and on his route passed the whole line of Mormon emigrants. He says that the advance company of the Mormons, with whom were the Twelve, had a train of one thousand wagons, and were encamped on the east back of the Missouri river, in the neighborhood of the Council Bluffs. They were employed in the construction of boats, for the purpose of crossing the river.

The second company had encamped temporarily at station No. 2--which had been christened Mount Pisgah. They mustered about three thousand strong, and were recruiting their cattle preparatory to a fresh start. A third company had halted for a similar purpose at Garden Grove, on the head waters of Grand river, where they have put in about 2,000 acres of corn for the benefit of the people in general. Between Garden Grove and the Mississippi river, Mr. Chamberlain counted over one thousand wagons en route to join the main bodies in advance.

The whole number of teams attached to the Mormon expedition is about three thousand seven hundred, and it is estimated that each team will average at least three person, and perhaps four. The whole number of souls now on the road may be set down in round numbers at twelve thousand. From two to three thousand have disappeared from Nauvoo in various directions. Many have left for Council Bluffs by the way of the Mississippi and Missouri rivers--other have dispersed to party unknown; and about eight hundred of less still remain in Illinois. This comprises the entire Mormon population that once flourished in Hancock county. In their palmy days they probably numbered between fifteen and sixteen thousand souls, most of whom are now scattered upon the prairies, bound for the Pacific slope of the American continent.

Mr. Chamberlain reports that previously to his leaving, four United States military officers had arrived at Mount Pisgah camp, for the purpose of enlisting five hundred Mormons for the Santa Fe campaign. They were referred to headquarters at Council Bluffs, for which place they immediately set out. It was supposed that the force would be enrolled without delay. If so, it will furnish Col. Kearney with a regiment of well disciplined soldiers who are already prepared to march.

Mr. Chamberlain represents the health of the traveling Mormons as good, considering the exposures to which they have been subjected. They are carrying on a small trade in provisions with the settlers in the country, with whom they mingle on the most friendly terms. [RCG]

NNR 70.327 July 25, 1846 objects of the expedition to California

Expedition to the Pacific. -- The objects of the expedition which is fitted out from New York, may be guessed at from the letter of the secretary of war to Col. Stevenson.
A young man who went out in the stow ship, Lexington, the pioneer of the squadron, write to the editor of the Baltimore Republican: "The company consists of one hundred and twelve as one, healthy young men as ever filled the ranks of our army, who are in the best spirits imaginable. The shit is loaded entirely with arms and ammunition for the company alone. We have 20 guns of the largest caliber for a fortification. We are first to land at Monterey, in California, and our profess after I will at every opportunity keep you advised of. The ship will necessarily touch at all the naval rendezvous on our way, the news of each of which I will send you. We go fully prepared to lick the enemy of our country--build forts or cities, and under the firm and unwavering Tompkins, we fell confident of the success in everything that will be given us to do." NNR 70.327 July 25, 1846 progress of the expedition against Santa Fe

Captain Weightman was still sick, but getting better; Lieut. Simpson and ten or twelve volunteers remained to escort Major Clark and Capt. Weightman when they should be ready to follow the army. A large quantity of provision were still piled up at Leavenworth. [RCG]

NNR 70.327 July 25, 1846 Gen. John Ellis Wool and movement on San Antonio

An officer had been dispatched to Washington to muster them into the service.--From this point it is supposed the central column of the army, under Gen. Wool, will take up the line of march for San Antonio. The mounted men of the Kentucky volunteers, and probably the volunteers from Illinois, will take this direction--but of the course of the latter, we have no positive information. [RCG]

NNR 70.336 July 25, 1846 Britain proffers mediation between the United States and Mexico

The proffered mediation of Great Britain

Together with the project of a treaty for the settlement of the Oregon question, which arrived from England in June, our readers will recollect it was at first announced, was also an offer of the British government to mediate for a restoration of peace between the United States and Mexico. The official organ at Washington, however, in a day of two so far contradicted the account, as to induce the belief that no such overture had been made. Somewhat to our astonishment we find in the speech delivered by Mr. Peel, in parliament on resigning the premiership, the fact stated by him, that such and offer had been directed by the British government to be made to the American government. The Washington Union however repeats the assertion, that no such proposition has yet been submitted to our government. [RCG]

NNR 70.336 July 25, 1846 movement of troops toward Texas

Movements of troops-- Companies B. and E. of the 2nd infantry, leave this morning, on the Hohn Owen for Toledo, en route for Pt. Isabel, Texas. Officers, accompany the command: Lieut. Col. Riley, commanding Lt. Camby, Adj.; surgeons Tripler and Murray; Company E.--Lietus. Davidson and Granger; Company B-- Capt. Anderson and Lt. Schureman. Detachments of twelve men each, from Company C, are to be posted at Sault St. Marie and Copper Harbor. [RCG]

NNR 70.366 July 25, 1846 THE ARMY OF OCCUPATION.

We have nothing new from the army since our last - The apparatus for transportation either by water or land had not reached Gen. Taylor when the last intelligence have left him. The flotilla was arriving however at the mouth of the Rio Grande. The army was impatient at so long a delay. The twelve month volunteers were expected, - those from Baltimore had arrived. The three and the six months volunteers were dissatisfied at the prospect of being discharged without having a fight. The troops were enjoying a fair share of health, and musquetoes had just made their appearance.

LATER. - Since placing the above in type, Brassos Santiago dates to the 11th and Galveston to the 13th have reached us, by the arrival at New Orleans on the 16th of the steamer New York, bringing as passengers, Col. McIntosh and son, Lieuts. Bibb, Power, and Lowe, and twenty discharged soldiers. Col. McIntosh has nearly recovered of the wounds received in the late battle.

Company H, 4th U.S. artillery, under Maj. Harvey, arrived at Santiago on the 6th, in 24 days from Hampton roads.

The American Flag, late The Republic of Rio Grande, and The Reveille, rival newspapers already issued by American printers at Matamoros, are received as late as the 8th. The latter has dropped its Spanish and is now American on both sides. They contain vivid accounts of the jollification on the national anniversary, particularly by the Louisiana volunteers, amongst whom are no less than thirty practical printers. Major Ogden pronounced the address. General Taylor reviewed the Louisiana brigade. Capt. Head's company gave a splendid dinner. Gens. Desha, Lamar, and Burleson, Col. Kinney and others were guests. General Taylor dropped in on "the boys" - drank wine with them and passed on to others.

One unpleasant casualty occurred. The steamer Aid, passing over the rope stretched across the river for the use of the ferry boats, so expanded it, that the post to which it was secured broke, and killed Corporal J.J. Mervin, of Graham's company, East Rapides, Louisiana volunteers, and severely wounded Lieut. Scully.

Ten boats had at length reached Matamoros, adapted to the navigation.

The 7th regiment of infantry left Matamoros on the 6th for Camargo; three of the companies embarked on board the steamer Big Hatchie, the rest took up their line of march by way of Reynosa.

Of the volunteers, the Andrew Jackson regiment, Col. Marks, and the Washington regiment, Col. Watson, were the first to be sent forward, toward Camargo, but the papers of the 8th inst., do not represent that they had actually moved.

The American Flag says that General Taylor announced to the two regiments above named, on the 4th, that in a few days he would have boats to transport them to Camargo, whence "he would put them directly in motion for Monterey, and that if he failed to accomodate them with a fight with the Mexicans before the summer had passed away, it would not be his fault." One long, loud, and enthusiastic burst of applause testified the joy of the volunteers.

Gen. Henderson, of Texas, was recovering from a severe attack of illness from which he had suffered. - Col. Lewis P. Cook had also been very ill, and it was at one time reported that he was dead. He was convalescent at last accounts. The general health of the army is represented as good, a few cases of dysentery and camp fever alone occurring.

A MONSTER GUN, surpassing Capt. Stockton's famous "Peace Maker" in weight, by some 5000 lbs. was cast recently at Algiers Foundry, South Boston. - The quantity of metal fused, was 46,000 lbs; eight Chaldrons of coal consumed in the process; when finished, its weight will be 25,000 lbs. Length, 10 feet; diameter at the base ring, 39 inches; length of chamber, 13 inches; diameter of chamber, 9 inches; length of bore, 9 feet 1 inch; diameter of bore, 12 inches. - Weight of round shot which it will carry, 230 lbs; weight of shell, 180 lbs. Range of shot or shell, 3 1/2 miles, - being 1/4 of a mile greater than the recorded performance of the largest and latest invented mortar in England, and 1/2 a mile beyond the reach of any gun in the castle of San Juan de Ulloa, at Vera Cruz. The cost of this immense instrument for harbor defence will not exceed $1700, or one-sixth the cost of the wrought iron gun procured in England by Capt. Stockton. It is said to be designed for Fort George, Boston Harbor. [GLP] Ammunition -- We understand from a source that may be relied upon, that since the commencement of the present hostilities with Mexico, there has been prepared and shipped from the arsenal, at this place, one hundred and seventy tons of fixed ammunition. Between one and two hundred persons, chiefly boys, are daily employed in the laboratory at the arsenal in the preparation of cartridge, &c. Yesterday about forty tons were shipped; a part to Col. Kearney, and the other portion to the south. The Arsenal at this place with all its conveniences and appliances, for the repairing of arms, manufacturing carriages for cannon, baggage wagons, &c., &c., under the supervision of the indefatigable commander, Capt. Bell, we believe to be one of the most useful and valuable possessions belonging to the U. States, connected with the service. When all that has been furnished from this quarter during the present difficulties is known, the public will be able to estimate its worth, and we hope the U. States government will be prepared to give it that essential facility so much needed, a good landing from the river. -- St. Louis Rep.

NRR 70.336 July 25, 1846 French papers urge necessity of French interference in the war

The Époque, the recognized organ of M. Guizot, minister for foreign affairs, has also had a very long and carefully written article on the pending dispute between the great republics of North America.--This article points out the necessity of France and England interfering in the matter, in order to bring about a reconciliation, and to protect Mexico. It alleges that France has interests sufficiently vast in Mexico to warrant such interference. The correspondent of the Liverpool Times, in reference to this article, says: "Considering the connection between this journal and M. Guizot, I am inclined to attach some importance to this lucebration. as showing that if France has not interfered in the business, she assuredly will do so. Indeed, for my party, I entertain not the slightest doubt that the French government will be prepared, if necessary, to give effectual protection to Mexico against her great neighbors; for I remember that in the course of the present session, M. Guizot declared from the tribune on two occasions that it was of vast importance to France that the United States should not seize Mexico, nor the English race absorb the Spanish; and as he is not a man of talk without weighing the force and calculating the consequences of his expressions, I take it for granted that his declarations indicated the policy the French government had determined on pursuing. I have made statements to this effect before, but they can scarcely be too often repeated, as I fear that too many of your readers run away with the notion that because Mr. Polk declared in his message that he would not admit any interference of European governments in the affairs of the American continent, European governments would timidly refrain from interference." 70.337 Aug 1, 1846 Gen. Mariano Paredes y Arillaga requests permission, which is granted, to place himself in command of the Army in the North, arrangements with regard to other Mexican commanders

Paredes Elected President. Shortly after the meeting of the Mexican congress, that body proceeded to organize the executive power, by a decree that it should be deposited provisionally in a magistrate elected by a plurality of the votes of congress, and that a vice president should be elected at the same time to act in the absence of the president. This decree was passed on the 10th of June, and on the 12th the election was held. Gen. Paredes was elected president, receiving 58 out of 83 votes. Ben. Bravo received 13 votes, and Gen. Herrera 7 votes. Gen. Bravo was then elected vice president, receiving 48 out of 82 votes. The highest opposing candidate was D. Luis G. Cuevas, who received 17 votes.

Gen. Paredes took the oaths of office on the 13th as provisional president, and at the same time pronounced another discourse, in the most notable passage of which he expresses his confidence that congress will grant all the supplies and make every effort necessary to defend the national cause. He reviews at length the wrongs which Mexico has endured at the hands of the United States, and concludes with desiring permission to assume of Senor Bustamente, who was ill, Dr. D. Louis Gonzaga Gordoa presided over congress. He replied to the president in substance, that every question of domestic policy shrunk into insignificance compared with the invasion of the country on the Rio Bravo; that the Mexican who should think of aught else than the injustice and treachery with which their solld was trampled, and the necessity of avenging their outraged honor, had no right to claim a share in their patriotic devotion.

On the 18th permission was granted to Paredes to place himself at the head of troops, and proceed to join the army of the North. Gonzalez Arevalo was to leave the capital on the 19th in command of the advance of the forces of Paredes. Gen. Mejia was in the actual command of the army of the North, Arista having been ordered to Mexico, and Ampudia to remain at San Luis Potosi. [A paper of the 27th ult. says that Gen. Arevalo, instead of proceeding to the frontier, had marched for Guadalajara to put down the insurrection.]

Gen. Bravo left Vera Cruz for the city of Mexico on the 24th, to discharge the functions of president in the absence of Paredes.

70.337-338 Aug 1, 1846 consideration by the Mexican Congress of a declaration of war against the United States

Declaration of War Proposed. The committee of congress upon foreign relations and upon war made a joint report upon the 16th upon that part of the message of Paredes relating to the United States. The reports recommends the passage of a bill declaring Mexico to be in a state of war with the United States. We do not find that the bill had actually been passed. Bocanegra and Valencia were among the members of this committee. After a short report upon the circumstances of the case, the committee proposed the following:

Project DE LA Loi. The extraordinary national congress of the Mexican republic considering:

That the republic of the United States of America, with notorious violation of all right, has instigated and protected openly and perseveringly the insurrection of the colonists of Texas against the nation which had admitted them upon its territory and generously shielded them with the protection of its laws:

That is has incorporated the same territory of Texas into in union by an act of its congress, notwithstanding it has always belonged by undisputed right to the Mexican nation, has been recognized as such by the United States themselves, as appears by the boundary treaties of 1832 and 1835:

That is has not maintained the solemn assurances and reservations in regard to the
That is has also invaded the department of Tamaulipas, introducing an army upon the left bank of the Rio Bravo, giving occasion and origin to the battles of the 8th and 9th of May of the present year:

That in time of profound peace, and during established relations of amity, between the two countries, it has invaded by land and sea that territories of the Cali:

That it has blockaded the ports of Matamoros, Vera Cruz, and Tampico of Tamaulipas, opening its fire upon the defenses of the latter:

That it has authorized a levy of troops against Mexico:

That it has declared war against the republic under the pretext that the said states had been invaded, when in fact they made the invasion:

And lastly, considering that the nationality of the Mexicans is seriously compromised by the power and the spirit of usurpation, flagrantly manifested by the neighboring nation of the United States.

70.341-342 Aug 1, 1846 letter from "The Corporal" with the Army of Occupation at Matamoros

"THE CORPORAL," whose exceedingly lively and well written articles, communicated to the New Orleans Bee, keep the public well posted up as to the affairs on the Rio Grande, writes from

I was in conversation with Mr. De Grey, who has returned here from Chihuahua, near two hours this morning. He says that he left San Antonio with others about two months ago with good on a trading expedition to Chihuahua, and proceeded on the route unmolested until he had reached Santa Clova, where they were stopped by the guard stationed on the river and their goods taken from them, in the name of the revenue laws of Mexico. Mr. De G. then left his party and traveled down the east bank of the Rio Grande, for a few days, when he crossed over and went to Saltillo, where he was advised of the bloody battle of the 9th, by its citizens, who stated to him that they would never go against the Americans again, and that it was a generally expressed thing at every place they had heard of. He says he was stopped by Arista, who was at his rancho, near Monterey, for two days, and although the general had quit the Mexican army forever, he still though it his duty to detain and would likely have kept him had he not managed to escape and get into Monterey. This place he found dull and "heavy" and not one Mexican soldier in it--the people damning Paredes and the government, saying the soldiers had eat them out of every thing and then left them for the Americans to prey upon, whom they were looking for with much anxiety. They told him at this place that there was much eagerness displayed by the inhabitants of Caohuila and the upper part of Tamaulipas before the news of the fight reached them, but all operations in military affairs ceased after it, and patriotism was sunk. The remnant of the army--not 500--have gone to Lenares, and were in a pitiful condition, and lessening the number daily by desertion. They had recruited a little whilst there, and fortified several points, but the citizens said it was labor thrown away. He heard that 600 men volunteered at Monclova, and were "eager for the fray;" but the startling news from the Rio Grande gave them a lick back; they mutinied, and 500 of them left sans ceremony. They had been made to believe that our pockets were lined with gold. (How they would have been so sucked had they got into the pockets of some folks I wot of.) He saw General Cannales near Reynosa, who told him that he commanded but 125 men at the time. Carabajal, his cher ami, gave De Grey, a passport to protect him from the band.

I am happy to inform you that the present swell in the river has had the good effect of clearing a channel at the mouth, by washing away the sand, and leaving it open for vessels of 5 or 6 feet water. The vessels at the mouth have gone out and several steamers have come in laden with military stores.

Several rows have occurred in this place during the last few days, which have compelled General Taylor to resume strict measures again. Several Mexicans have been killed and others wounded. Those of our men who engage in these broils are bad men—who come to town and remain here about during the day, in connection with some rangers of similar character, but I am proud to say, for the honor of the service, they are few in number.

There are, and have been for ten days, a set of mountebanks here performing on the tight rope and cutting "fantastic tricks before high heaven. About half an hour before the commencement of their performances they mount each a mustang, and proceeded by a base drum and charionets, parade through the principle streets-- dressed in their performing costumes, and followed by all the juveniles of the town.
They are natives, and style themselves, "Compania del Norte. I have not had the courage to visit them.

70.342 Aug 1, 1846 visit of British naval officers to Gen. Zachary Taylor

"Curiosity runs high"to know the object of a visit of two British naval officers to General Taylor, who arrived here in a vessel of war from Tampico. Communication being cut off, they sent their dispatches by mail to their consul at Matamoros, to be laid by him before the consul general. Nous verrons.

Appearances indicate a move of the army into the interior as soon as the waters subside.

Report says Gen. Paredes has sent a proclamation to the people of Matamoros, calling upon them to treat our regulars with every kindness and consideration, because of the unparalleled kindness and attention to the wounded, as well as prisoners and citizens. He takes occasion to score the Texans, &c. If this be true, it argues more favorable than otherwise.

70.343 August 1, 1846, Court of Inquiry, charges against General Gaines, Library for the Army of Occupation, Volunteers

The Court of Inquiry ordered to assemble at Fortress Monroe, (Old Point), for the investigation of the charges against General Gaines, met on the 21st, and organized for the transaction of business. - The Court sat with closed doors of course. All the members had not arrived. Gen. Gaines was, upon his arrival at Fortress Monroe, received by Col. Walbach, commandant, and saluted with 13 guns, together with the honors due to his high rank.

A LIBRARY FOR THE ARMY OF OCCUPATION. - Presuming, probably, that the army would have leisure for study, the following publishers in New York have contributed a very excellent library for the army on the Rio Grande: - Harper & Brothers; Burgess, Stringer & Co.; Wiley & Putnam; Saxton & Miles; Mark H. Newman; W. Taylor & Co.;
J. & G.A. Langley; Baker & Seribner; M.W. Dodd; Darius Mead; J.S. Redfield; Fowler & Wells; C.S. Francis & Co.; Wood & Son, and Stanford & Swords. The idea was suggested by the Rev. Mr. Marshall, of Vicksburgh, Miss., at present in New York on a visit.

The government is buying mules in Tennessee, at $100 apiece.

Lieut. DEAS, who, it was reported at the time, had been attracted by some Mexican damsel, on the banks of the Rio Grande, opposite Fort Brown, but who in reality had swam the river in search of the lamented Col. Cross, and was captured by the enemy, has been restored to his company.

DESERTERS. - The two Sergeants who deserted from Capt. Deas's company of Alabama volunteers on the Rio Grande, were arrested in Mobile, and were about to be sent back to be tried by a military court, when a writ of habeas corpus was taken out for their detention, and the examination of their case before a civil court. After hearing the case, the judge decided that they should be returned to the camp for trial by court martial. From this decision an appeal was taken to the court of appeals, where the matter now lies
DEATH OF C. J. McNULTY. - Capt. Hicks, of the New Era, arrived yesterday from New Orleans, reports the death of C. J. McNulty, on his way to the seat of war. He died just below Memphis. He was a private in the Knox county volunteers, and formerly well known as the clerk of the house of representatives.

GEORGIA VOLUNTEERS. - Two men were drowned - Farrar and McNier - in the Alabama river, while on their way to Mobile. They jumped overboard from the steamer in a fright.

The Mobile papers gives the particulars of an affair, on the wharf in that city, connected with a corps of volunteers from Georgia. Some of the men undertook to torment some negroes fishing at the wharf. Two were knocked into the river and one of them drowned. Excitement followed, and the troops were for hurrying off the boat on which they were embarked - but the mayor ordered their detention, and three men were arrested and taken before the mayor. Two were, after examination, discharged, and the third sent to prison to answer for his crime.

SOUTH CAROLINA VOLUNTEERS. - The secretary of war has informed the governor of S. Carolina that there is no necessity at present for calling the regiment of that state into service.

EXPEDITION AGAINST CHIHUAHUA. - The company of U. States dragoons that have for some time been at Austin, Texas, left there on the 16th June, for San Antonio.

Capt. R. M. Snell, of the Texan volunteers, has arrived at Galveston for the purpose of raising three or four companies of foot, for what service is not stated.

THE SANTA FE EXPEDITION. - Col. Price's regiment. A letter from Lexington, Mo., dated the 2d, says - "Col. Price has been informed by Col. Kearney, that his regiment will be received, provided he raises eight hundred infantry - more cavalry not being wanted in the expedition. Col. Price, it is said, objects to this arrangement, and a doubt exists whether he will be able to succeed in raising the number of men. There can be no doubt that Col. Kearney has more mounted men with him than is necessary for the expedition, and we are surprised at the opposition which Col. Price makes, to the new service with which Col. Kearney desires to invest him. He ought not to hesitate about obeying Col. Kearney's requisition, more especially as it may conduce to the safety of the expedition, and to the promptness with which his men may be brought into the field."

New York Volunteers. We learn that the full complement of seven regiments of volunteers required from this state, for service in the war against Mexico, has already been obtained, and all the line officers commissioned. It is expected that the field officers will also receive their commissions in the course of twelve or fourteen days, when the whole force will be complete, awaiting orders from the war department. An excess, nearly sufficient for another regiment, we understand, has been reported to the adjutant general’s office.

70.343 Aug 1, 1846 account of traders, emigrants, and soldiers setting out for Santa Fe, Oregon, and California

Trade to Sante Fe, California, and Oregon.

Dr. J. Gregg, the author of "Commerce of the Prairies,"in a letter to the editors of the Boonslick (Missouri) Times, gives the following important statements.

The traders having left this place in detached parties, as each proprietor finished his preliminary arrangements and got his goods and chattles, freight and cattle ready for starting, it is difficult to form a correct estimate of their numbers or quantity, unless one had taken the pains of stationing himself upon the borders at the opening of the navigation, in the spring, and counted them when passing. I have, however, by minute and frequent inquiries ascertained that there are "en masse" upon the Santa Fe trail, 216 wagons.

Still behind to start during the summer, principally belonging to Mexicans, say, Small carriages, buggies, &c., 150 " 50" 416

--having on board, as near as I can estimate it, an amount of merchandise, costing a fraction over one million of dollars, which in more than treble that of any previous season.

These vehicles, of various sorts, are accompanied by people as various--compromising traders and wagoners, loungers, on and connoisseur travelers, loafers and loungers, amounting to about one thousand men.

The Oregon and California emigration, (much the larger part of which is for the latter country,) amounts to , men, women, and children, about two thousand persons, and in all probability, I think, at least 400 wagons of all descriptions.

Then, there is our army, the number of which is quite uncertain, although, including dragoons and volunteers, infantry, and cavalry, it will, from present indications, amount to about three thousand men accompanied by two hundred and fifty wagons.

Thus, we have about six thousand souls, with one thousand wagons, moving westward, across the great prairies, during the present summer, from this part of our frontier, How many may put off from other portions of our western border, I know no more than you; but report says that a large number of troops will leave Arkansas next month for our southwestern frontier and Mexico.

Your Friend,

Josiah Gregg.

70.344 Aug 1, 1846 mustering of the New York regiment destined for California, complaints of favoritism to Col. John D. Stevenson

The expedition to the Pacific. -- The regiment under the command of Col. Stevenson, destined for California, was mustered and inspected at the New York arsenal yard on the 21st ult. It is said they intend to encamp on Bedloe's Island, and pass the time previous to their departure in active drill.
The Mechanics' Journal says. -- "Very just complaints are made of the favoritism of the administration in allowing John D. Stevenson to raise a regiment for immediate service, while volunteers are enrolled in New York and waiting to be ordered into survive, waiting without pay, and even without any provision for their maintenance. A son of Mr. Marcy is to be paymaster of this regiment, for the administration has long since assumed the right of appointing the officers of the militia, though in direct defiance of the constitution, which reserves that right to the states respectively. Sir Robert Peel, with the immense patronage in his power, made it a rule never to appoint a relative to office. With all the admiration which this administration exhibits for British examples, this is a precedent which there appears no disposition to follow. [RCG]

The despatches are said to be from our Pacific squadron. Of their purport nothing has transpired. [GLP]

70.352 August 1, 1846, ARMY OF OCCUPATION

Our latest dates from the Rio Grande left the army still waiting for means of transportation and for supplies to enable them to progress. Gen. Taylor is now encamped with four regiments, (Colonels Walton's, Davie's, Dankin's and Mark's,) with the Alabamians, under Capt. Desha, at Buena Vista, on the borders of a lake, seventeen miles northwest of Matamoros. The health of the volunteers here, with Gen. Taylor, had much improved, owing to the fine air they enjoyed and splendid encamping grounds they occupied.

The roads were perfectly impassable for wheeled vehicles, owing to the swampy soil, occasioned by the immense falls of rain which had recently taken place. - The steamer Mercer arrived at the mouth of the Rio Grande, all safe, on the 17th inst. There were no signs of Mexican soldiery in the vicinity of Camargo.

Capt. Walker had returned from his expedition to Monterey, and delivered a report which is said to be an exceedingly interesting one of the state of the country through which he passed, halting places, &c. &c. - There is no probability of an opposition being made to the advance of the American troops between Camargo and Monterey, and from what could be collected, the Mexican force concentrated at the latter point, is extremely insignificant. Nothing regarding the reported approach of Paredes, with the army of reserve, of an authentic nature has been ascertained at headquarters, although ??? are out in some numbers for that purpose. Everything, however, seems to announce that the possession of Monterey will be fiercely disputed, as it is by nature and art, one of the most powerful strongholds in Mexico. The inhabitants and soldiers are daily employed in improving its defences.

Our informant states that it was reported by the Rangers that they had penetrated to the precipitous cliffs that overhang Monterey, when a trooper, a very adventurous soldier, named Cummins, reached a point overhanging the Bishop's Palace, which commanded a view of the whole city. The utmost activity seemed to prevail among the Mexicans, who were busily employed in repairing the old fortifications and erecting new ones. - The number of troops was not ascertained, but from the movements observable, it was evident they were preparing every means of defence.

The crops it is feared, are almost irreparably injured. The cotton harvest is annihilated; as for the corn much will be saved, although greatly deteriorated.

The Mexican peasantry are employed very diligently in cutting wood and piling it on the banks of the river, for the steamboats. They receive $2.50 a cord. It is muskeet wood, and burns very well. Gen. Taylor put it to them, whether they would cut it and get paid, or oblige him to have it cut by his own men, when they would lose the price of labor. Wood, however, he added, must be had.

Business is very brisk at Matamoros. Fine weather had again assumed a permanent aspect; the waters were every where falling, and the whole of the military were joyfully preparing for the opening campaign.

70.352 Aug 1, 1846 mounted riflemen and Mormon infantry for California

"Army of the West"

We find the above designation fully assumed in an official order from Col. Kearney, 1st U S. dragoons, dated "Headquarters, Army of the West, Fort Leavenworth, June 19th, 1846," directed to Capt. Allen, of said regiment, which together with Capt. Allen's "circular to the Mormons," dated "Camp of the Mormons, Mount Pisgah, June 26th," are published in the St. Louis Republican, of the 24th, as taken from the Nauvoo Eagle, of the 17th June. The overture to the Mormons in the orders and circular are very comprehensive. Gen. Kearny distinctly point to California as his place of destination, and that he stipulates for the discharge of the Mormons from service in that country. He asks for five companies of infantry. The Mormons are eager to embrace the overture. The Republican adds: "We learn from the same source that Gen. Kearny in consideration of their having placed five hundred men at the disposal of the government, has emigrating Mormons, and that they shall have the use of "any of the Indian lands they may think proper to select," until they are ready to cross the mountains. The Mormons have, in accordance with this arrangement, selected Grand Island, on the Platt river, for their temporary residence. It is a large tract and has a salt spring upon it. There they will winter, and collect the entire Mormon population of the west, preparatory to their march to California next spring. They propose to push forward from this point as rapidly as possible, and, after reaching in, to send back from five hundred to one thousand wagons, for the purpose of helping along those who may yet be in Illinois, Iowa, or Missouri. This is to be done with all possible expedition. Grand Island is stated to be between one hundred and two hundred miles west of Council Bluffs. At the last dates the requisition of Gen. Kearny was rapidly filling up; and on the 17th, the United States officers gave the Mormons a splendid fete or ball, which is said to have been a fine affair."

A letter from an officer date --Camp at Cotton Wood, July 10th, published in the National Intelligencer, of the 30th, states that the detachment crossed Kansas on the 2d, and were 180 miles from Fort Leavenworth, without meeting with any accident. They had no intelligence as yet from the detachment sent under Captain Moore to overtake the Santa Fe expedition.

The companies of Mormon infantry and col. Price's regiment of mounted Missourians, are expected to join general Kearny at Bent's Ford, at which place he halts for them to come up. Including these he will have about 3 200 men with which to invade Mexico and Santa Fe.

70.368 Aug 8, 1846 wagons purchase and contracted for in Atlantic states

The U.S. Quartermaster at Baltimore, a few days since, advertised that he would purchase as number of wagons for the U.S. army. The notice came to a ready market. The way his quarters were beset forthwith, and the crowd of wagons that were ready for Uncle Sam's cash, was a caution. We have heard of persons obtaining $150 for second hand wagons, that cost when now $90; and again we have heard of persons who had their eyes open for a speculation, realizing $600 in a single day by purchasing up wagons, and selling them to the government -- all scandal, perhaps. Yesterday's American contained a laconic notice from the Quartermaster, that he had "wagons enough, and would purchase no more." [RCG]

70.368 Aug 8, 1846 expenses of the war

Expenses of the War. The St. Louis Republican of a recent date has the following:

"It is only by ascertaining the actual cost of particular items that the expenses of the war with Mexico can be estimated. The government agents, a few days since, purchased five hundred barrels mess pork for the "use of the army of the West." This pork is to be transported to Santa Fe. It cost $10 per barrel. Three or four years ago supplies were needed for an expedition on the same route, and contracts were made with Bent & St. Vrain, for transportation. They were paid 8 cents per lb., from Independence to Bent's Fort. The government, of course, paid the transportation to Independence. It is alleged that the contract to which we have alluded was a losing concern, and that no one will undertake it for less than ten cents per pound. A barrel of pork will average 320 pounds. The cost of its transportation from Fort Leavenworth, to which point all public stores are shipped to Bent's Fort, will then be thirty-two dollars. But this is not all. It has there to be wagoned to Santa Fe, and it is a very moderate calculation to say that the additional cost, with the transportation from St. Louis to Fort Leavenworth, will increase the cost to $40 per barrel. Add the original cost and it makes the actual expense of the barrel of pork, on its delivery at Santa Fe, fifty dollars. In other words, the government pays $25,00 for the 500 barrels of pork.

"The cost of all other freight must be charged in the same way -- by the pound-- and the expense cannot be much less than we have estimated." [RCG]

70.368 August 8, 1846, move toward Monterey anticipated

"It is now understood that we will move towards Monteray, a beatiful town at the head of the San Juan (river), about two hundred miles distant. I think it is probable that in two weeks more the mounted force, viz. the Texas mounted riflemen and the United States dragoons will be on their march thither. If we can get the needful transportation, we will overrun and occupy, before the end of summer, all that part of Mexico lying on this side of the Auahuae mountains. This I imagine will be the end of our operations in this direction. If the war continues, the main blow must be stricken through Vera Cruz. The means of reaching that point by water are always abundant, and we are taken at once into the heart of the enemy, where every blow will count. To approach the city of Mexico by Monterey will require immense transportation of provisions and forage, over an uninhabited desert of a thousand miles, with roads through mountains and defiles.

We hear but little of the enemy. The rumor is, and has been for some weeks, that they are fortifying the pass this side of Monterey. It is said to be a strong place. Yet we will pass it, if we try." [GLP]

70.368 August 8, 1846, CAMP, ON THE BATTLE-FIELD

MAY 10TH, 1846.

SIR, - In compliance with your request, I have the honor to report that, in the deployment of the 4th Infantry, I found myself in command of companies B, D, and K, on the left of the road as we entered, and having been ordered to cross to the right abd advance, did so. After crossing the pond, I had with me Lieuts. Hays and Woods and about twenty men of different regiments, mostly however, of the 4th. Upon deploying my men on the crest of the hill, I discovered one of the enemy's pieces about fifty yards in my front which was defended by about 150 Infantry. I charged and took the piece and attempted to spike it, but not being able to do so, took it back to a place of safety. - The enemy had a breast-work in my rear, and opened a heavy fire on me, with about ten men, I dislodged him and drove him across the road. Too much credit cannot be given to Lieuts. Hays and Wooda, of the 4th. They were among the very first to reach the piece, and to them belongs the credit of its capture. - Whilst I was engaged in driving the enemy from his breastwork, these officers, with their men, repulsed a party that charged them in order to recapture the piece. I cannot refrain from calling your attention to Sergeant Major Maloney and Corporal Farrall, who behaved with remarkable coolness and gallantry. - Everybody did his duty nobly, as becomes American soldiers.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant.

ROBERT C. BUCHANAN, Capt. 4th Infantry

70.368 August 8, 1846, Death of Lieut. Blake, deaths at Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma

LIEUT. BLAKE. A letter from Gen. Worth, dated New Orleans, May 18, 1846, says. - You will probably by mail, hear of the loss of that gallant ornament and devoted member of your corps, my warmly cherished friend, Blake. The manner adds poignancy to our sorrows. Had he fallen in the conflict, in which by all accounts, he had especially distinguished himself, regrets would have been turned into envy. After the battle, on casting aside his weapons, one of his pistols accidently discharged, and gave him a mortal wound. Knowing and valuing him as I did, you will readily conceive how I deplore his loss, both as a gallant and true hearted friend, and accomplished comrade. He has left no better soldier behind."

"Our troops have behaved with great intrepidity. - Every man has done his duty. My own gallant regiment speaks for itself in the list of the killed and wounded - verified by the colors of the crack Mexican regiment, that of Tobasco. Would to God I could have been with them; but a sad fate ordered otherwise. There is time yet; it is but the beginning of the end. I sail to-morrow, and, with God's blessing will be in line by the 21st.

THE MORTALLY WOUNDED. The Surgeon General of the Army on the Rio Grande has sent to the editor of the Washington Union a list of the private soldiers who were mortally wounded in the battles of Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma, and who expired on the days of the battles, or have since died of their wounds. It is as follows:

The names of the men who were killed outright, or who did not come under the observation of the surgeons, have not been reported to the Surgeon General's Office.

70.371 Aug 15, 1846 volunteers return to New Orleans

The brig Empresario, the steamer New York, and the schooner Native, all reached New Orleans on the 1st from Galveston and the seat of war -- bringing a number of volunteers that had been discharged under orders from government. Among the passengers by the New York and Col. Morgan, Capt. Holton, and Lieut. Alvord, of the U. States army; Col. Narks, Adj. Hunter, Lieut. Harris, of the Andrew Jackson
A number of fine artillery companies arrived at the Brazos before the departure of the Empresario. Gen. Smith, with the 3d and 4th regiments U.S. Infantry, had proceeded to Camargo. Brig. Gen. Hamer was to be left in command at Matamoros, with a regiment of volunteers and a supply of artillery to garrison the ports. Gov. Henderson, at the last accounts, was lying dangerously ill at Matamoros, little hope was entertained of his recovery.

The propeller Massachusetts arrived at the Brazos on the 26th ult. The brig Crusoe struck on Brazos bar in going over, and upon making the landing she unfortunately sank. The clerk of the New York reports that he saw on the 29th the bark Lazan, hence for Brazos Santiago, ashore ten miles to the east of the Brazos. The troops on board were all saved. Her cargo consisted of government stores which were all saved; the vessel was a total loss.

Nothing was known of the movements of the Mexican forces. Letters from the city of Mexico stated that Paredes was to leave the capital to join the army on the 29th ult.

INCIDENTS OF THE BATTLE FIELD.

The Maryland Line. A letter from Point Isabel on the 2d inst., says: "There were four gentlemen from Baltimore in the battle of Palo Alto: the gallant and ill-fated Ringgold, who fell at the close of a long fight, in which he did incalculable damage to the enemy; Capt. Magruder, who, when the Mexican army charged upon the square of the artillery battalion, then unsupported by any other battalion, seized a musket which had fallen from the hands of a man killed near him, and fighting with the soldiers in the ranks, assisted in repelling the charge; Lieut. Randolph Ridgely, who, commanding two pieces, dashed to the assistance of the fifth infantry in the square, when charged by the Mexican Red Lancers, and in the most gallant manner assisted that regiment in repulsing it; and lastly, Mr. Lloyd Tilganan, a gentleman amateur, who graduated at West Point and resigned; but who, upon this occasion, reconnoitered the enemy's whole line before the battle, and, as a volunteer aid to Gen. Taylor, exposed his person every where, and was always in the hottest part of the field."

THE VETERAN OF NAPOLEON.

As Churchill's battalion of artillery were advancing to take their position in the second line of battalion on the 8th, a private in the 4th regiment was come up to, who lay upon the battle field with both his legs shot off. He was one of the first that fell after the cannonade commenced, and was a veteran in Napoleon's wars. After having escaped in the terrible conflicts of Austerlitz and Wagnam, and in the retreat from Moscow, and the battle of Waterloo, he lived to fall on the Palo Alto, by a cannon shot from a Mexican battery. As his fellow soldiers passed him and noticed at every pulsation of his heart, that the blood flowed from his wounds, they stopped an instant to sympathise with him, the noble hearted fellow, as his eyes were glazing in death, waved them on, and with his last breath, said, "Go comrades, I have only got what a soldier enlists for."

A private, on the 9th, who had followed Lieut. Dobbins through the thickest of the fight, raised his musket at a Mexican, and would have blown him through if the poor fellow had not most petiously cried out amigo, amigo, at the same time dropping his weapon; the private did the same and advanced towards the Mexican to take him prisoner, the Mexican then perfidiously raised his piece and instantly killed the generous American. This so enraged Lieut. Dobbins, that he drew his bowie knife and at a bound reached the coward and literally split his head in twain.

70.373 Aug 15, 1846 notice of the departure of Maj. E. Kirby for the war

Major E. Kirby. Among the distinguished officers of the army that embarked on board the steamship Alabama, on Saturday evening bound for the seat of war, we noticed Major E. Kirby, of the regular army. Major Kirby, has rendered his country much service in his time, having served in the last war, and in the Black Hawk and Florida campaigns. He belongs to the Cincinnatus school of soldiers; for when his country needs not his services in the field, he may be found tilling the soil on his farm near Brownsville, Jefferson county, N.Y., formerly the residence of his distinguished father-in-law, the late Major Ge. Jacob Brown. It was the good fortune of the writer of this to meet Major K. last September, at the exhibition of the New York State Agriculture Society, at Utica, and well could he descant upon the beauties of a Burham, a Decon, and a Hereford. Major K. has gone out as paymaster general, and took with him $100,000 for the pay of soldiers--and it may be safely ventured that he is shipper of Mexican dollars to Mexico. N. Orleans Tropic.

NRR 70.373 Aug 15, 1846 Account of the Heroine of Fort Brown

THE HEROINE OF FORT BROWN. The N. Orleans Picayune has a letter from Matamoros which furnishes some interesting particulars respecting the heroine of Fort Brown, who is generally known in the army of the south as "The Great Western."- The writer says: -

"She was first brought to the notice of the public in a few remarks by Lieut. Bragg, at the collation given by the army to the Louisiana delegation at Gen. Arista's headquarters in Matamoros. He mentioned her gallant conduct and noble bearing during the whole of the bombardment. A few of the incidents of the life of this extraordinary woman, which I have been able to pick up in camp, will be read with some interest; they prove that the sex has not been unrepresented in the soul-stirring and bloody scenes on the Rio Grande.

The Great Western belong to a class known and recognized in the organization of the
When the army took up its line of march for the Rio Grande, the women, with a few rare exceptions, were left behind to come by sea. A very few procured ponies and followed their husbands on their tedious and arduous march. Not so with "The Great Western." Her husband was sent by water, whether on duty or for disability. She could not learn; but she, true to her character, declaring that "the boys" (young officers of her mess) "must have somebody to take care of them," purchased a mule and a cart, packed her luggage, cooking utensils, and supplies, mounted behind her donkey, with whip in hand, and displayed upon the whole route qualities and attainments which the best teamster in the train might have envied. During the whole journey she kept up the "mess," a relief from the burdens of which is the greatest boon to an officer on the march. The brigade to which she was attached arrived upon the banks of the Sal Colorado as Gen. Taylor was preparing to cross with the dragoons and the 1st brigade of infantry. The Mexicans upon the opposite bank were making great demonstrations by blowing bugles, &c., &c. After calmly surveying the scene from her cart, she remarked, with great coolness and determination, that "if the general would give her a good strong pair of tongs, who would wade that river, and whip every scoundrel that dare show himself!" It may be imagined that the men were not backward in crossing after that.

When Gen. Taylor marched to Point Isabel with his army, on the 1st May, the 7th infantry, and of course, The Great Western, remained to garrison Fort Brown. How that noble regiment and the two companies of artillery left in this work sustained themselves, is already known, but nothing will more gratify them than to have justice done their gallant heroine, of whom they speak in the warmest terms. She, with all the other women left behind, some eight or ten, moved into the fort, where her mess was soon put in operation, the position of her tent and fire being near the centre of the fort. The enemy's fire opened on the 3d, just as she was commencing her arrangements for the "boys" breakfast. Every security that could possibly be provided was offered to the women, to whom the gallant soldier always gives his first attention. The magazines were the only "bomb proofs" in the fort, and as the government had sent no ammunition to fill them, the next most inflammable material - the women found perfect security in them. These women, however, be it said to the honor of the sex, were not idle. Most nobly did they ply the needle in preparing sand bags out of the officers' and soldiers' tents, wherewith to strengthen the work, and protect the artillerymen when serving their guns. The Great Western, true to herself again, declined participating in this protection of sewing, and continued her labors at the fire, in the open air. From the firing of the first gun all hands were at their posts, Lowd's and Bragg's artillery speaking in tones of thunder the indignation they felt at being thus saluted on a bright May morning.

When the hour arrived for breakfast, but few expected the luxury which awaited them. The mess was as well attended to as if nothing but a morning drill with blank cartridges had come off, and in addition a large supply of delicious hot coffee was awaiting the thirsty, who had but to call and partake, without distinction of rank. To some of the artillerymen, who were unable to leave their guns, the beverage was carried by this 'ministering angel,' and, as may readily be believed, no belle of Orleans, as much as she might be admired and beloved, ever met a more gracious reception. The fire of the artillery was kept up almost incessantly until dinner hour - a soldier's dinner hour is 1 o'clock - when the good and generous woman again provided for those who were almost utterly exhausted and worn out, a delicious dish of bean soup - this bean soup is declared by the Mexicans to be the foundation of that invincible spirit which they have seen so strikingly displayed by the Yankee soldiers. This she distributed again, without money and without price. Thus did she continue to discharge her duties during the seven days that the enemy kept up an incessant cannonade and bombardment. She was ever to be found at her post; her meals were always ready at the hour, "and always of the best the market afforded."

When the despatches were made up for General Taylor on the evening of the 4th, a number of officers and others had written to their friends at Point Isabel, and among them "The Great Western" had found time to communicate with her husband; and I have frequently heard it said by those who saw her letter, for it was loudly called for and made public, that her description, if not the most accurate, was certainly the most graphic which was given of the events of the 3d and 4th May. She expressed her full confidence in the ability of the garrison to sustain itself, and only regretted the absence of her husband. To supply his place, however, I am told that she applied, early in the action, for a musket and ammunition, which she received and put in a secure place, expressing her determination to have full satisfaction whenever the enemy should dare approach within range of her piece. This they never did, and our heroine must rest contented with the reflection that she nobly performed her own duty and will long be remembered by the besieged garrison of Fort Brown.

She is probably as celebrated for her personal appearance as she is for her deeds. With an erect and majestic carriage, she glories in a height - six feet - which fully entitles her to a place in the grenadier, any soldier of which might well envy her athletic but graceful form. But her reputation, the dearest of all things to a woman, is what she prides herself on. The tongue of slander has never yet dared to attack her well earned and well sustained character. With virtue as a basis, and such heroic conduct to build with, she never need fear the necessity of exercising her extraordinary physical ability in defence of that reputation. But if attacked, the gallant defenders of Fort Brown will, I doubt not, be found pressing forward in her defence, and woe be to the dastard who receives a discharge of artillery from such gunners."

70.385 Aug 22, 1846 rumor of Mexican request that Great Britain and France mediate the end of the war with the United States

The Offer To Negotiate For Peace

President Polk's overtures to Mexico, to send or to receive a minister plenipotentiary with powers to settle the existing controversy and terminate the war, will not only meet the cordial approbation of the people of this country, but will also elicit the plaudits of all the Christian powers. This proposition of the president, it will be observed, was not at all dependant upon the success of his application to congress for the two millions of dollars which he asked that body for, with a view to aid him in the negotiation. The letter from the secretary of state, Mr. Buchanan, to the Mexican minister of foreign relations, proposing negotiation, was dated the 27th of July, 1846, and was winging its way towards "the Halls of the Montasumas," a full week before the president, in confidential message to the senate, apprised that body of his having any such design. The confidential message was sent to the senate on the 4th of August--informing that body of the step he had taken, and asking money to aid him in negotiation a peace. --That the Mexican government will be constrained to accept this overture of our governments under which they are laboring, will now be added beyond doubt--the earnest advice of the British legation, and the offer of that governments to mediate for a peace between the United States and Mexico. England might have been disposed to promote a dispute between Mexico and the United States, very naturally, so long as she had a quarrel of her own with the latter, which there was a probability would terminate in war, but having now settled all disputes of her own, she has such obvious interests to sub serve by a restoration of peace in Mexico--her commerce and her capitalists have so much to loose by Mexico being blockaded, invaded, overrun, and dismembered, that there can be no doubt of the sincerity of their interposition.

70.385 Aug 22, 1846 comments on the offer to negotiate for peace

To the influence of the British diplomatic agents at Mexico, it is probable will soon be added that of a new French minister, with whom a frigate was about to proceed to the gulf with, when the last steamer left Europe. No potentate of Europe is more anxious to maintain a general peace amongst the Christian powers, that Louis Philippe. The continuance of a war between the United States and Mexico, would soon embrace other powers in the conflict.
70.386 Aug 22, 1846 promotion and appointments for distinguished services in the campaign

Subsequently to the nomination of the above, which was on Saturday, a list of names for brevet appointments was received from Gen. Taylor, containing the following in addition to the above. These additional names were submitted to the Senate yesterday morning; but as that body did not go into Executive session before its final adjournment at 12 o’clock, the list lays over for the future action:

Capt. J.B. Scott, 4th artillery.
Captain Lewis N. Morris, 3d infantry.
Lieutenant Colonel J. Garland, 4th infantry.

Colonel Twiggs, who is on General Taylor’s list, having recently (since the battles of the 8th and 9th of May) been appointed a brigadier general in the army, his name for brevet of that grade was not included in the list submitted to the Senate. About twenty more officers were presented as deserving brevets, if it should not be deemed proper to extend the number beyond the first class, but this was not done. As the list now is, it is believed to be large beyond any former precedent.

70.386 Aug. 22, 1846 General Gains, Court of Inquiry, Col. Thornton acquitted

General Gains-- The Military Court of Inquiry, at old Point, concluded their task, and on the 11th inst., sealed and despatched their verdict to the war department. The conducing part of the gallant old general’s defence occupies four columns of the Norfolk Beacon.

Col. Thornton. It is stated that the Court Martial has honorably acquitted the brave officer.

70-386 Aug. 22, 1846 Capt. Thornton's defense

The trial of Capt. Thornton, 2d dragoons, on the charges preferred against him by the commanding general, for the loss of his squadron of dragoons, captured on the 25th April last, terminated on Wednesday. It is a long established custom, we believe, in both the army and navy, to bring to trial the commander of an expedition, whenever unfortunate; and this however, unfortunate to individuals, appears but just to the accused and the country--truth is vindicated, and the community learns whether her intersects are committed to safe hands. Capt. Thornton was assisted, in the management of his case, by Capt. Barbour, 3d infantry, and Lieut. Bragg, 3d artillery; and at 10 o'clock, on Wednesday, his written defence was made to the court by Mr. Bragg.

Several members of the court, veterans who had stormed the breach, could not restrain a tear of sympathy--and many a moist eye was to be seen in the large audience which attended to hear the vindication of this gallant and universally popular officer.

We regret that we are not able to lay before our readers the whole of the admirable defense of the gallant captain. He commenced by stating that a long established principle of his profession, and a stern sense of duty on the part of his accusers, had brought him before the court in his present position. Success, he was aware, was, with military men, often the best of merit: yet he hoped to be able to show, even if he were not successful in his expedition, his failure was not owing to the omission of necessary precaution.

On the night of the 24th of April, with a command of three commissioned officers and fifty rank and file, he was ordered to reconnoitre a country some 27 miles in extent, and to bring information, whether the enemy had crossed the Rio Bravo, his numbers, and his position; and he had also further vested orders from the commanding general, to ascertain, if possible, whether he had crossed his artillery, and to report by the next day at 12 o'clock. He referred to the testimony of Capt. Hardee and Lieut. Cane, for the manner in which he executed these instruction. He regretted that he could not lay before the court the testimony of Lieut. Mason, but regarded his loss as nothing, compared with that of the friends and relations of the gallant young officer, who fell as he had lived, in the discharge of his duty.

From the recapitulation of the testimony of Capt. Hardee and Lieut. Cane, in the defense, it appears that every precaution was used to guard against surprise—that an advance guard was thrown out, that flanks were impassible for the most part, form the nature of the country it being a perfect defile, admitting at times a single horseman with difficulty, that when Captain Thornton halted his squadron to rest his men and horses, which was extremely necessary, a sentinel was placed at both ends of the road, so that no one could approach without his knowledge. About daylight next morning the command proceeded toward the river, and to the constant inquiries made of every one that was met, "whether the enemy had crossed," the reply was "he had," but all spoke from rumor--this Capt. Thornton believed to be unreliable authority upon which he could not base a report, and he referred as an evidence of this, to the numerous false rumors with which the American camp had abounded for a month previous. Captain T. alluded to the suspicious confidelity; and subsequent events, he thought, proved to lead him into a position from which retreat was impossible. Subsequent information upon which he could rely, satisfied him that his return to camp had been cut off, that the enemy was in his rear with a force of 500 cavalry and a party of Indians. Upon the receipt of this information, he redoubled his precautions--he increased his advance guard and placed it under the command of Lieut. Mason, with minute instructions to keep ahead and be vigilant, but not to fire upon the enemy unless forced to do so. Form this time, Captain Thornton proceeded without a guide, Chapito having deserted him. Captain Thornton here argued, and we think conclusively proved that an attempt to return would have been more disastrous than his move forward; he also contended that a "rear guard," with such a small force, would have been untactical, and, in his opinion, unnecessary; and further, that it was not prescribed. The rear was assigned to Captain Hardee, and he never left it without being ordered back by Capt. Thornton. He went on further to state, that if the command had obeyed his instructions, they would not have entered the field in which they were afterwards captured; but, he remarked, "no precaution from myself, or any one else, could have altered the result, our fate was sealed long before entering the field."

Captain Thornton, here summoned up the facts of the case, as shown by the testimony, from which it appeared that he had too responsible and somewhat variant duties to perform, that of commander of the squadron, and reconnoitering officer. For a guide, a Mexican of doubtful fidelity; a country of twenty seven miles in extent, with which he was totally unacquainted, and fifteen hours, and eight of them in the night, to perform this duty in. In the opinion of his officers, his rear could have been gained by day without his being able to know it. Spies were upon his actions from the time of his leaving the army, until his capture. Ordered to keep an attitude of peace, until the first blow should be struck. The following portion of this manly and soldier like defense, struck us so forcibly, that we believe that we can repeat it verbatim. "It was my misfortune," said Captain Thornton, "to secure that first blow, upon my devoted head, but it had to be secured, and why not by me?" Captain Thornton, here contended, that the information he obtained was important; that by means of his capture Gen. Taylor was able to understand his real position, that he was no longer on debated ground, and as an evidence of this, referred to the immediate call for reinforcements, the industry in the completion of Fort Brown and the march to Point Isabel for provisions. But for the loss of his squadron probably, the thanks of a grateful people would not now be showered upon the heroes of the battles of the Rio Grande, but instead, the tears of widows and orphans might have been met with the usual indifference, by the national legislature. Capt. Thornton, reminded, that to prevent this he would be willing again to hide in his bosom, the only bleeding heart amid the rejoicings of a victorious army.---Capt. Thornton, here remarked if he neglected any of the usual precautions, it was form want of knowledge, and begged the court to acquit him of (?) and to find a verdict, if necessary, against him in incapacity. He then referred to his services in Florida, and thought the manner in which he discharged his duties there, well known to some of the court would enable him to defy such an imputation. Capt. Thornton concluded by saying, that his honor and military reputation, were in the hands of the ocuts that the country had found her's safe in their hands, and with confidence he submitted his to them.

70.386 Aug 22, 1846 account of the Kentucky mounted regiment

Volunteer Army. -- The Kentucky mounted men left Memphis about the 21st July. The Tennessee regiment left there on the 26th July, both en route for Mexico. The former are designated as,---

"The Hunters of Kentucky-- The Calvary regiment of Col. Humphrey Marshall, mustering 100 strong, are represented as a body of martial men. They are generally athletic young men, riding splendid horses, and their picturesque dress imparts to them a romantic appearance. The hat particularly is very fanciful. It is a drab beaver with a broad brim, ornamented with several gold stars, and looped up with gold lace in the three cornered fashion of the Revolution. They all wear their beards unshorn with boots over the legs of their trousers, reaching above the knee, armed with huge spurs on the head and faced with red morocco.

70.386 Aug 22, 1846 distrust of the members of the California expedition of the government's promises

The California Volunteers. The U. States Gazette says--It appears that the volunteers of California, who are at present encamped on Governor Island, are not quite as willing to go further than they have gone--at least upon the faith of the promise which the government has made to them. It was the general impression that after the term of their enlistment expired, they were to receive grants of land in California, as a reward for their services. Of course, this intention implied that California was to be made an integral part of the union.

70.387 Aug 22, 1846 baggage wagons being made for the Army

Baggage Wagons. We understand that 6 or 700 baggage wagons, and about as many sets of harness, for the U.S. army, are making in this city and the neighboring towns, and an unusual activity, for the season [. . .] prevails therefore in those branches of trade.

70-400 Aug 22, 1846 Army of Occupation

We have nothing form General Taylor's corps, to report this week. The discharge of Louisiana and Alabama volunteers, and their return home, occupies the southern papers for the time being, --and much dissatisfaction is expressed on all hands.

The difficulties with which this whole system of volunteer forces is surrounded, can hardly be appreciated by those that have not had an opportunity of observing how it works, and how it will not work. The embarrassment which government would have to encounter in the instances of these very men, was distinctly foreshadowed in remarks which we submitted at the time they were being embodied. The secretary of war is now heavily censured, and the treasury of the Union severely taxed, --the gallant troops that waited for nothing but to ascertain that the army of the nation was surrounded with difficulties, and threatened with destruction, to induce them to seize their arms and report to the scene of danger, after spending just sufficient time to completely organize, discipline, and fit them for action--no a day too much for that--are now discharged, without having seen an enemy.

The secretary of war had difficulties to encounter, take what course he would. To discharge those forces must have been unpleasant to him. But the organization of the army was imperative. The twelve months volunteers were crowding toward Gen. Taylor' lines, already incommoded with more troops than he had the means of transporting or of provisioning, in an enemy's country, beyond the margin of navigation. Other officers, proud of their distinction, lead these new levies. It will take as long, at least, to organize, discipline, and fit these forces for efficient service in the field, as was expeded upon the volunteers now discharged.

Gen. Taylor at the last dates, was urging on the supplies towards Camargo as expeditiously as he had it in his power. the roads had been impassable, and by the river, he had as yet and inadequate supply of light draught steamers to get his troops and munitions to that place.

The following are the latest we have from the Rio Grande.

"Camargo, (Mexico) July 23--We are furnishing transportation for the army, and securing supplies of forage on the route to Monterey. We have contracted for 1,000 to 2,000 mules,"(another letter fixes it positively at (1,500) "with the packing equipment's complete; and these, with the 500 wagons expected here, will be ample for the marching columns. A large portion of the 19,000 men of this corps d'armes will be left at the different depots and entrepots, from Brazos Santiago to China, about 60 miles from this place on the route to Monterey.

"The troops are now fast arriving here in our steamboats; and the General will, in all probability, move forward from here about the middle of the next month,--(August). Now comes the commencement of those operations which will require all the capacity, skill, and energy of our General to accomplish. The great difficulties of an army invading Mexico begin here. So far, everything has favored Gen. Taylor, and he has acquired not only a most enviable reputation, but his good fortune has become a proverb. I hope, of course, for his further success; but in order to secure it, the most careful combinations of every kind, preparatory to the march, are absolutely necessary. Too much haste may prove as great and evil as a faulty tardiness. It takes time for the requisite arrangements for the transportation required for so many men, suddenly collected here. Meantime, the General is impatient of the least delay, and the officers of our department are incessantly occupied in preparations.

70-400 Aug. 22, 1846 Yellow Fever.

The British steamer Vesuvius, reached Bermuda on the 11th inst., having twenty-seven cases of yellow fever on board, besides losing ten of her crew with the disease, on her passage from Vera Cruz. The captain reports that the fever had broken out on board the American squadron and the British frigate Endymion, off Vera Cruz.

70.400 Aug 22, 1846 regiment of volunteers for Santa Fe organized, artillery expected

Expedition against Santa Fe. The last accounts we have from Fort Leavenworth are up to the 9th inst. Seven companies had arrived at the fort, and three more were expected, to complete the regiment. The seven companies had voted for field officers, and Sterling Price, ex-member of Congress had been elected Colonel of the regiment, by the unanimous vote of the companies present. The companies to arrive could not, of course, although privileged to vote, change the result. The St. Louis Republican states that the election of Col. P. was forced upon the regiment by an unmistakable imitation that it would be disbanded if he was not chose. A private in one of the companies named Allen was elected Lieut. Colonel over D.D. Mitchell, Esq., of St Louis, the person designated by President Polk for the office, by a majority of 90 votes. Four of the companies were to leave the fort, on their line of march, on the 10th inst.; the others were to follow as soon after as they could be furnished with transportation for provisions, &c.

Four companies, composing a separate battalion of artillery, were also daily expected at the fort.

Lieut. Col. Allen, of the U.S. Army, in command of the five hundred Mormon volunteers, was still at the fort. There was much bad feeling between this corps and the other volunteers. Lieut. Colonel A. and his command were to take up the line of march on the 12th inst.

Still later accounts from Fort Leavenworth are up to the 11th inst. About one thousand more Mormons had arrived at the fort, in hopes of being mustered into the United States service. Two of the additional companies of volunteers had arrived at the fort, and Colonel Price’s regiment marched out on the 10th inst.

70.401 Aug 29, 1846 decree relative to the powers of the extraordinary Congress in Mexico

Mexico, July 7th. The following decree, sanctioned by the army, is published:

"The present extraordinary congress of the national powers conferred upon the chambers of the national congress by articles 76, 77, and 78 of the organic bases."

70.401 Aug 29, 1846 Indian threat to Chihuahua, approach of the vanguard of the American Army

Chihuahua, July 7. Our enemies on the East are the four tribes of Camanches, with their allies, the Cahiguas and others; on the North, the Apachas, subdivided into nine tribes, more numerous in population than the Camanches. On the same side also, are the Anglo-Americans, rocked in the cradle of the Indian whom he abhors, and nurtured with the blood and sweat of the negro whom he despises.

70.401 Aug 29, 1846 movements of Mexican troops for San Luis Potosi

70.401 Aug 29, 1846 Mexican arrangements to use the interior resources of Mexico to sustain the war with the United States

Thus the nation will see that the government has not made use of the extraordinary powers conferred upon it by congress for providing means to carry on the war. Our unjust invaders, who in the delirium of their ambition, have proclaimed that out want of resources would make us slaves without a conflict, will find that the Mexican nation has great resources in the interior, and that they will be sufficient in any event—for the administrative order and moral power of the government increase them. The government of the United States, with little reflection, will perceive that the war which it wages against us, is not to be terminated by a conquest of our country, but by honorable propositions of peace.

70.401 Aug 29, 1846 departure of Mexican troops from the capital

July 22. Left the capital for the interior, the 2d brigade, of 1,200 men, of all arms, with seven pieces of artillery, 500 horse, 400 mules, with ammunition and warlike stores. The 1st brigade had left on the 18th, in the direction of Matamoros, under command of Gen. Garcia Conde.

70.401 Aug 29, 1846 Assassinations by the insurgents of Guadalajara, dismay over the deplorable state of Mexico

The insurgents of Guadalajara by a surprise assassinated the troops of General Arevalo; but the papers state nothing positive as to the fate of the General himself.
The commander of the steamer says he was killed. Letters from Mexico also state that he lost his life.

Mexico July 28. An express has just arrived, announcing that the United States troops to the number of 8,000 men have left Camargo on their way to Monterey. Last night the secretaries of departments withdrew, and to-day at 1 o'clock P.M. Gen. Bravo took possession of the presidency.

70.401 Aug 29, 1846 Mexican Army assembles at San Luis Potosi

According to the statements of the Mexican Diario Official, the army assembled at San Luis Potosi, numbered 10,000 men, and when this force and that under Gen. Azpeitia consisting of two regiments of infantry, a squadron of lancers, and a section of engineers with three 12 pounders, numbering in all 2,000 men, which was to leave the capital on the 24th, would join Mejia, the army in the field would number from 12,000 to 15,000 men. But 1,500 men were left to garrison the capital. Mejia who succeeded Arista in the command of the army on the frontier, reports on the 9th that he was about to march for Monterey with his column.

70.401 Aug 29, 1846 steamer Princeton dispatched express for Pensacola

It is a remarkable coincidence, that just as the steamer Princeton was demonstrated to be of all the vessels of the squadron the most efficient in blockading the port of Vera Cruz, and was performing prodiges in that service, all at once she was detached by Commodore Conner, and arrives at Pensacola with important despatches for our government. The British steamer Dee must have left for Vera Cruz very speedily after the Princeton. The messenger dispatched by President Polk with instructions to Commodore Conner respecting the propositions to the Mexican government to send a minister to negotiate for peace, if he has good luck, will reach Vera Cruz about the same time that Santa Anna calculated to arrive there. The messenger dispatched by President Polk with instructions to Commodore Conner respecting the propositions to the Mexican government to send a minister to negotiate for peace, if he has good luck, will reach Vera Cruz about the same time that Santa Anna calculated to arrive there. We say if he has good luck, for the N. Orleans Picayune furnishes rather an unfavorable account of his progress. That paper says--

"We stated in the Picayune a few days since that a bearer of dispatches for Com. Conner had arrived at Pensacola, and that the Wolcott, revenue cutter, Capt. Fatio, had received orders to proceed to the Gulf with him. She went to sea on Monday last but the captain fearing the approach of a storm, put back and Mr. Habersham, U. S. navy, the bearer of the dispatches, proceeded at once to this city, where he arrived yesterday. He will proceed to the Brazos to-day, and from thence proceed in one of the revenue cutters at that point to Vera Cruz."

John Slidell's mission to Cuba

There was a report widely circulated some time since, that Mr. Slidell, a connection of the late minister to Mexico, had been dispatched to the Island of Cuba by our government, and it was inferred that his object was to ascertain the views of the illustrious Mexican exiles there, in relation to affairs between Mexico and the United States. The Washington Union promptly and emphatically contradicted the insinuation at the time.

But to return to the news from Mexico, furnished by this arrival of the Dee, at Havana. The following are the prominent items:

Mexican decree authorizes privateers

Letters of Marque. A decree has been issued by the Supreme Government, in respect to cruises which may be made by privateers against the commerce of the U. States.

description of Camargo

Camargo. --As the army of occupation has commenced its advance upon the interior of Mexico, by pursuing the Rio Grande up as high as Camargo, both by land and water, and as this will be the place where a permanent depot will be established, and from which the advancing army will leave the Rio Grande when it takes up its general march upon Monterey, it will naturally hold a conspicuous place in the estimation of the American people. The Matamoros "Flag"furnishes the following:

Camargo is situated immediately upon the banks of the San Juan river, three miles from its junction with the Rio Grande. It is a small rudely constructed village, with some few stone building, many built of mud bricks dried in the sun, some constructed by driving stakes into the ground, and then plastering them with much, and others formed of cane and plastered in like manner. The number of inhabitants will not exceed two thousand; but as the Mexican government has never thought her population worthy of enumeration, no possible statement can be made of the population of any of their towns. The late extraordinary rise of the Rio Grande has caused the San Juan to back up and literally inundate Camargo, to the great damage of houses and property; also to the sacrifice of several lives.

Camargo may be considered the head of navigation, as above here the bed of the river is so filled up with rocks that its navigation higher up has never been attempted. The road upon leaving Camargo and crossing the San Juan, becomes higher and less obstructed by swamp grounds. And it then becomes an important inquiry what other obstacles may present themselves in the distance between this place and Monterey, which is 210 miles. The road passes through a level country, thickly set with a small underwood, the largest timber being ebony and the mesquite, neither of which grow to the height of more than 12 or 15 feet, and 12 or 14 inches in diameter. So dense is this undergrowth, armies of 10,000 men each might march for half a day within a mile of each other without the vicinity of one to the other being unknown.

70.402 Aug 29, 1846 description of Monterey and Caiderete

Monterey. -- The literal meaning of Monterey is the king's woods; but to those who have been raised in a heavily timbered country, it would seem more appropriate to call it a grove of brush. It is a common saying with Texans who have traveled through the forest that "it's so d--d which you can't shove a bowie knife through it." And what may appear somewhat singular, every bush and shrub is armed with thorns curved in the shape of fish-hooks, and the hold they take upon the clothes and skin of travelers is not easily shaken off, as the jackets of the soldiery will testify to before they reach Monterey.

The whole distance is well watered from August until March, plenty of wood, reasonable pasture, many herds of cattle, numerous flocks of sheep and goats, now and then a small village-- which all have the appearance of decay. Scattered along the road are miserable huts, singularly picturesque from their original construction, not quite equal to rail-pen stables built in the backwoods of Arkansas and Texas for scrub ponies. Yet nature, in her mighty formations, has formed some positions on this road, which, if taken advantage of by a skilful and daring enemy, would prove a second Thermopylae to those might have the temerity to tread these formidable passes. The American army will no doubt look ahead before entering these dangerous and shady pavilions. The mazes of the labyrinth are beautifully pictured out by meandering paths and conflicting cross-roads, leading to some farmer's hut, some watering place, or the wily lure of some Mexican bandit.

Caiderete.--When within fifteen leagues of Monterey the village of Caiderete presents itself, enjoying the most lovely situation, standing upon a perfectly level plain, surrounded with green groves, presenting everlasting summer; the fields blesses with natural fertility. The beholder involuntarily exclaims, Why should a Mexican toil or labor?

70.402 Aug 29, 1846 difficulty over supplying Gen. Steven Watts Kearny's expedition to Santa Fe, reports of alarm in New Mexico

Provisions must of necessity also be vary hard to get, and unless some other means of securing them be found out than such as was anticipated previous to their departure, they will be in a very bad way this winter. It was pretty certainly known before they left, that there would not be even a show of fight on the part of the Mexicans, unless a very small force was sent along at first, for the assertion of the governor was made, and word sent to General Kearney by our informants to that effect; and he further says that if a respectable force comes upon him, he shall immediately abandon the country, and remove south of the Rio del Norte.

70.402 Aug 29, 1846 engineer corps at West Point being readied for Mexico

Volunteers.
West Point. An extra exertion is making at West Point to get the Engineer Corps ready to start for Mexico. Out of 67 men and 20 are from Philadelphia, and chiefly mechanics, fine fellows, "and to the marrow bone." The officers have been assigned, Capt. Swift and Lieuts. Smith and McClellan. As fast as the recruits are perfect in the infantry drill, they are put into another squad and drilled as engineers, in which they are fast learning the rudiments.

The rubber "ponton" train has been tried, and succeeds well. Two of the boats sustained 67 men, two horses, and two pieces ordnance, and the corps think they can bridge the river at West Point in an hour and a half strong enough to take a whole army over. All at West Point betokens that strict discipline that has given us such a gallant set of officers that will give as an effective army, with such good material as we have in our volunteers.

70.402-403 Aug 29, 1846 letter from A. Moses of the Ohio regiment

The Ohio State Journal publishes the following letter from one of the Ohio volunteers in the army in Mexico:

Dear Brother:

Be not the least surprised if you should see me in Cincinnati in the course of six weeks. When I volunteered it was to fight, and not to be idle for a year. But I now find the regulars are to be able to defend any post of danger. Gen. Taylor says that one regular is worth five volunteers, and that he only wants volunteers for a standby. It would seem that we are kept merely to do the drudgery; and such is the case.

We had quite an affair a short time since. Colonel Mitchell as commandant of this post, ordered a volunteer from Baltimore to bring him something. The volunteer paid no attention to his order. Our colonel then commanded him a second time to perform the service. The volunteer turned upon his heel, and replied that "he would see him d--d first." I was close by doing duty, when Col. M. ordered me and five other cadets to arrest the Baltimorean. He immediately placed himself in a defensive position, and drew a knife, swearing at the same time that he would cut the first man that dared to come near him. Lieut. Col. Weller then approached and ordered us to "stand back"when all party got to fighting. So you see we have had one fight at least.

Our whole regiment and the Baltimore regiment were then all ordered out. But as we had but sic men on the ground, and as the colonel's tent was about two miles from our encampment, out colonel was disarmed and carried to the ground by a superior number of stout fellows, where they laid him down. Two of them were about to stab him, when I backed by our boys, jumped into the melee and released our commander from the ruffians. By this time the field was full of soldiers and the Baltimoreans left. I presume the case will undergo investigation.

Affectionately your brother,

A. Moss

This force, it is stated, constitutes an independent command, which will be under Gen. Butler. It is to strike into the province of Chihuahua, between Santa Fe and Gen. Taylor's position; and it will no doubt interrupt the retreat of the forces which will fall back from General Kearney at Santa Fe. It will take the Santa Fe route to Mexico, and there cooperate with General Taylor. Its route is through the most healthy and richest parts of Northern Mexico.

70.403 Aug 29, 1846 Col. Churchill departs New Orleans for Texas

Col. Churchill, Inspector General, has left New Orleans for Texas. This indefatigable and veteran officer has, within the last six months, traveled over twelve thousand miles, inspected last spring on and near the Gulf of Mexico and in Florida, mustered into service all the volunteers in Indiana and Illinois and now goes to join Gen. Wool as chief of his staff, on the march to Chihuahua, in Mexico. The good wishes and the prayers of his numerous friends and the country attend him.

70.403 Aug 29, 1846 complaint about the manner of buying and treating wagons for the Army

Wagons for the Army. New Orleans dates of August 7, says -- "A large ship from Philadelphia brought a cargo of these wagons, which were landed some time since, and after laying exposed to out tropical sun on the Levee for eight or ten days, splitting and cracking, with their wheels and springs, the same ship is chartered to reload them for the Rio Grande, at a greight double that from Philadelphia--at least doubt what it ought to be from thence, though I think it probable there, as well as here, the government pay at least double what individuals would. It is really enough to disgust any bosy to see the manner the whole affair is being conducted; and the way they are going on, the treasury, even after issuing the ten-millions of treasury notes, will be bankrupt before congress again meets."

70.406-408 Aug 29, 1846 proceedings and decision of the court of inquiry on Gen. Edmund Pendleton Gaine's efforts to raise volunteers

GENERAL GAINES.

1. The court of inquiry, whereof Brevet Brigadier General H. Brady is president, instituted by "General Orders," No 23, of June 30th, to investigate certain transactions therein set forth on the part of Brevet Major General E.P. Gaines, commanding the western division of the army, and which convened at Fort Monroe, Virginia, on the 20th day of July, 1846, has reported the following facts and opinion:

"FACTS"

"General Gaines learned at New Orleans, about the 1st May, 1846, that a Mexican army, of superior force to the army under General Taylor was advancing to invade Texas, and that actual war was impending. He was informed officially from General Taylor of his situation, and what auxiliary force of volunteers he had called from the states, viz: four regiments from Louisiana, and four regiments from Texas and he was requesting by General Taylor to aid the governor of Louisiana in equipping and forwarding the troops of that state."

"On the receipt of this information, Gen. Gaines wrote to the governors of Mississippi, Alabama, Tennessee, Kentucky, and Missouri, advising them to anticipate a call from the president of the U. States for volunteers, and to make preparations to raise the troops. It was not, however, in form, a requisition on them to send forward troops before they were called for by the president.

"On the 3d May, General Gaines sent an officer to Mobile to raise volunteers for Taylor’s army. On the 4th, one company was raised and embarked for New Orleans. The whole volunteer force to be raised at Mobile, Gen. Gaines limited by order of May 6, no to exceed two regiments of twenty companies.

"About the 4th May, the governor of Missouri, being at New Orleans, tendered to General-Gaines a regiment, which offer General Gaines accepted.

"On the 8th May, General Gaines authorized Col. Crane, commanding at Pensacola, whence General Gaines had withdrawn the garrison of regulars to send to Texas, to muster into the service one or more volunteer companies; also, informing Col. Crane that he had requested the governor of Alabama to send there two volunteer companies; making three or more companies called out, or authorized to be called out, for the protection of Pensacola.

"On the 9th May, he authorized A. M. Dunn to raise a company of 100 men to guard the arsenal at Baton Rouge.
"On the 12th May, he authorized A. Rust to raise a regiment of mounted gunmen from five to ten companies; each company to number from 60 to 100 men; thereby authorizing the levy of 300, or 500, or 600, or 1,000 men.

"May 12th. He authorized W. B. Lewis to raise a regiment of mounted gunmen- from five to ten companies of 70 to 100 men - amounting to 350, or 500, or 700, or 1,000 men.

"May 13th. He authorized Balie Peyton to raise a regiment of ten companies- each 60 to 100 - amounting to 600 or 1,000 men.

"May 14th. He authorized F. Buisson to raise a battalion of two companies - each 60 to 100 - amounting to 120 or 200 men, to garrison forts Jackson and St. Philip till further orders.

"May 16th. He authorized I. S. Gilbert to raise a regiment of mounted gunmen- five or ten companies; each company to be 60 to 100 men- amounting to 300,500,600, or 1,000 men.

"May 20. He authorized E. Fetherston, W. M. Fulton, W.S. Hays, J. R. Creecy, and E. L. Tracy, to raise each one regiment of ten companies, each 60 to 100 men. The whole amounting to 1,500, 2,500, 3,000, or 5,000.

"May 22d. He accepted the offer of the governor of Mississippi to furnish 2,000 volunteers- including the regiment to be raised by P.B. Starke.

"May 31st. He issued orders to complete the muster of two regiments of volunteers from Alabama- only three companies having been at this time raised on his previous requisitions.

"In the latter part of May, General Gaines raised and mustered into service Gally's battalion of light artillery- three companies- 286 strong. The precise date of this levy does not appear in any document before the court, and it is not remembered by the witness, examined to this point- Gen. Gaines assistant Adjutant General.

"The court find further, that in consequence of General Gains' communication to the governor of Kentucky, about the 1st or 4th of May, representing the situation of General Taylor's army, the governor raised and sent forward a regiment from Louisville; which on its arrival at New Orleans, about the latter part of the month, General Gaines accepted and mustered into the service of the United States.

"The foregoing statement shows all the troops raised or called for by General Gaines. It appears, however, that the only troops actually raised and brought into service by him on these calls, were the St. Louis Legion, of Missouri, the Louisville Legion, of Kentucky, Peyton's and Featherston's regiments of Louisiana volunteers, and Gally's battalion of light artillery, and three companies of Alabama volunteers, raised at Mobile.

"The court find further, that when General Gaines was relieved from command of the Western Division, and ordered to repair to Washington City, and in execution of said order, had arrived at Mobile on the 12th June, he was then and there informed by the governor of Alabama that much disorder prevailed among the regiments of volunteers assembled at that point by the president of the United States; for which reason the governor applied to General Gaines to receive into the service of the U. States, for the proper government of those volunteers, Brigadier Gen. Smith, whom the governor had commissioned to command them, and his staff. Whereupon Gen. Gaines did receive and muster into service:

Walter Smith, as Brigadier General.

Thomas Caey, Assistant Adjutant General.
William P. Brown, Brigade Quartermaster.
Henry K. Zettyplace, Paymaster.
Charles B. Sandford, Aid-de-camp.
Richard Lee Fream, Brigade Surgeon.

"The order of General Gaines published in this case, directed that it should remain in force till final instructions should be received from the proper authorities at Washington; and further directed Gen. Smith to organize the volunteers, and as soon as the said organization should be completed, to proceed with them without delay to the seat of war.

"The appointment by General Gaines of certain volunteers and others to staff offices, as shown in the official documents sent as evidence to the court, not being stated in the order appointing the court, as one of the matters into which it is directed to inquire, it is not considered in this statement of facts, nor in the opinion of the court. The facts and circumstances, however, are set forth in the evidence for the information of the department of war.

"In regard to issues of public stores by order of Gen. Gaines, the court find that he ordered the issue of ordinance and ordnance stores to arm and equip all the volunteers called out by him; also, when necessary, for those called out by Gen.
Taylor; also, that he ordered the quartermaster's supplies; also, he ordered the commissaries to furnish subsistence to all volunteers arriving at the general rendezvous for muster, and to issue to them previous to the muster.

"The court also find an issue by order of General Gaines of two pieces of field artillery, and twenty five rounds of ammunition to two private gentlemen and planters in the parish of West Baton Rouge, for the protection of the parish against the slave population, on condition of the return of the guns when called for.

"In regard to orders by General Gaines to staff officers to issue or pay public money, the court find only two such payments indicated in the documentary evidence. 1st.
He ordered that quartermaster to pay $2,500 to Major Gally's battalion for commutation in advance of clothing; and 21. He ordered the ordinance officer to pay accounts contracted by Maj. Hally for ammunition for his batteries, amounting to $1467(5)0. Both of which sums and accounts were paid accordingly. And further, the court find that he ordered the quartermaster's department to pay in advance to all volunteers' commutation of six month's clothing. That any payments were made under this order does not appear by any evidence sent to this court.

"And upon the foregoing findings of the facts in the case, the courts submitted the following

"It is contended by General Gaines that he acted in accordance with his instructions from the war department. The court find that these instructions were as follows:

"1st. August 28th, 1845. The secretary of war wrote to General Gaines: 'It cannot be necessary to apprise you that the authority to make a requisition upon the governors of the respective states for the militia thereof, to be employed in the service of the United States, is vested only in the president, and limited in its exercise to two or three specified cases. The emergency which would tolerate or excuse the assumption of this authority by a military officer in command at a distance from the seat of government, in anticipation of the president's action, must be one indicating great and imminent peril to the country--a peril so great and so imminent as to leave no reasonable doubt that the president, with a full knowledge of all the circumstances of the case, would have felt it his duty to resort to such aid.
The assumption of this authority by an officer so situation, should be under circumstances which would be sure to command his subsequent ratification of it.'"

"2d. On the 13th September, 1845, the secretary of war wrote to General Gaines:
'You misunderstand your position in regard to the commanding general in Texas.
His command is wholly independent of you; the orders and instructions for his conduct emanate only from the government here; and you are directed to abstain from all interference with him.'

"3d. And again, on the 30th September, 1845: 'The power which you have exercised could only be resorted to in cases of extreme public peril. An error of judgment, with such motives as the president has with pleasure conceded to have governed your conduct in this case, cannot be regarded as a crime, or an offence subjecting the officer to trial.'"

"The court find further instructions to General Gaines from the office of the adjutant general, of date May18, 1846, from which the following is extracted:

'The volunteer force called into the service from Louisiana and Alabama, &c., and which you have previously reported, meets the approval of the department.'"
"In the opinion of the court this approval ratifies the call and orders of General Gaines to raise two regiments at Mobile, and three of more companies at Pensacola.

"The court also deem it unnecessary to consider the case of the St. Louis Legion received into service by General Gaines; as he was informed from the adjutant general's office, May 22d, that 'the said regiment had been accepted, and would be regarded as a portion of the force called out by the president.'"

"In regard to the Louisville Legion, it appears from the statement of General Gaines, and testimony of Lieut Calhoun, to have been raised without a direct call from General Gaines; though accepted by him into service before he had received special authority from the war department. It was, however, subsequently accepted by the department--by instructions to General Gaines of May 28th--in which instructions, however, written on the supposition that he called on the governor for the troops, he is informed of the disapproval of the department, and then the call was without authority of law.

"In regard to the other calls made by General Gaines, before the 17th May to raise troops for Taylor's army, the court are of opinion, that, under the previous instructions of the war department, and in the situation of Taylor's army, and upon ascertaining the slow progress of the enrolment of the Louisiana volunteers, and upon ascertaining further that General Taylor could not receive more than a small portion of the force which he had called from Texas -- that under these circumstances General Gaines was justified in endeavoring to supply Gen. Taylor to the amount of auxiliary force could not be obtained from the states to which General Taylor had applied, then General Gaines was justified in applying to the other states. The court do not extend this approval to the requisitions for mounted gun-men. The four regiments of this description of force, amounting to 4,000 men, which he authorized to be raised before the 17th May, destined to march overland to the army, however useful Gen. Gaines may have considered them for the future operation of the way, not being required or intended for the immediate emergency, were not authorized by his instructions or by law.

"It is proper in this connection to bring to the favorable native of the war department the prompt recall, by Gen Gaines, of all his requisitions for mounted gun-men on receiving orders to that effect; and that the government incurred no expense on account of these calls.

"For the calls made by General Gaines for volunteers, after the 16th May when he knew of the victories of Taylor, the court cannot find any necessity at the time, any authority in his instructions, or any warrant of law. These calls authorized the levy of 7,000 men, besides Gally's battalion of artillery. It does not appear, however, that any, except the artillery, were raised before the calls were countermanded.

"Two of the requisitions made by Gen. Gaines for volunteers appear to the court to be of a special character, viz: to raise a garrison of volunteers for Forts Jackson and St. Phillip, and for the arsenal at Baton Rouge. As the government had withdrawn the garrison from the arsenal, and had not seen fit to garrison the forts, the court are of opinion, that General Gaines ought to have felt himself specially restrained from raising volunteer garrisons without authority.

"In regard to the authorities given by General Gaines to certain individuals to raise troops, it appears to have been his motive to avail himself, under what he felt as the pressure of the emergency, of the supposed influence of these individuals. In Louisiana, where troops were actually raised under such powers, it was with the sanction and concurrence of the governor of the state, who commissioned the officers and organized the troops according to the state laws. It does not appear in any case to have been the intention of General Gaines to act independently of the state authorities.

"In General Gaines' proceedings at Mobile, on 12th May, [June,] in mustering into service General Smith, and his staff, after he was relieved from his command, and instructed by the war department, to 'cease his independent action in these matters, and to confine himself to carrying out the orders and views of the president, so far as they might be communicated to him from that department--the court are of opinion that he transcended his authority, and violated his orders, particularly in appointing such a staff officer as an inspector general, after the recent and emphatic instruction to him by the secretary of war, that 'such appointments would not be recognized or confirmed, and that the president himself had no authority under existing laws to make such appointments.'

"yet the court are satisfied that Gen. Gaines had not the intention to act in defiance or in disregard of his instructions. He though that the disorganized state of the volunteers assembled at Mobile made it a matter of very urgent importance that a commander should be appointed over them. He acted, too, at the special application of the governor of the state; and the court, therefore, recommend his conduct to the favorable construction of the president.

"the issue of rations to volunteers before muster is not provided in the regulations of laws. But the court present to the consideration of the department, the necessity of the case, when the volunteers had arrived at the rendezvous, and were absolutely without means of subsistence.

"Such issues, as of the two pieces of field artillery and ammunition to planters of Baton Rouge parish are not provided for by the regulations of the army. But under the circumstances, being required for the security of the parish, and issued to responsible persons, on condition of their safe return whenever demanded, the court are of opinion that is ought to be approved.

"In the absence of certain official information on the subject, the court suppose it to be the practice of the government to make advances to the militia called into service, in commutation of clothing; and that the orders of General Gaines on this subject did not introduce a new practice. Of the correctness of the particular account of $2,500, which General Gaines ordered to be paid to Gally's battalion, the court have not the means of judging, and therefore leave it as an account to be settled, according to law and regulations in the auditing offices of the treasury.

"The court cannot approve General Gaines' order to Captain Whitley to pay Major Gally's bill of $1,467 50, for ammunition, as it does not appear that whatever ammunition was required might not have been furnished from Baton Rouge arsenal, or otherwise procured by the ordnance officer.

"The court have not considered, as connected with the issues of stores and payments of funds before mentioned, whether the persons or troops to whom, or on account of whom, the issues and payments were made, were legally in the service of the United States, inasmuch as the act of congress of the last session has since provided for the settlement of such accounts. Of the lawful authority of General Gaines to raise the troops, the have expressed their opinion in the several cases.

"Having now reported their finding and opinion, the court recommend to the favorable consideration of the president the good and patriotic motives, and the public seal, by which, as the court believe, Gen. Gaines was actuated in all these transactions, and therefore they recommend that no further proceedings be had in this case."

II. The proceedings of the court of inquiry in the foregoing case having been duly submitted, the following are the orders thereon--

War department, August 18, 1846

The proceedings of the court of inquiry in the foregoing case have been laid before the president, and carefully examined.

It is seen that the court have found that several of the acts of Brevet Major General Gaines "were not authorized by his instructions or by law; and that he has violated orders,"

That for the calls made by him "for volunteers after the 16th of May, when he knew of the victories of [General] Taylor, the court cannot find any necessity at the time--and authority in his instructions, or any warrant of law."

That in mustering into service at Mobile certain general and staff officers, after he was relieved from his command by instructions from the war department, "the court are of opinion that he transcended his authority, and violated his orders."

The president views with deep regret the exercise of this assumed authority on the part of the late commander of the western division; and while he is disposed to give every consideration to the circumstances which may tend to qualify or mitigate his conduct he can see nothing in them which would justify him for withholding the expression of his decided disapprobation of the irregular and unauthorized proceedings of that officer. But in consideration of the recommendation of the court and concurring with them in their opinion of the “good and patriotic motives and the public zeal by which he was actuated,” the president directs that further proceedings in the case of Brevet Major General Gaines be dispensed with.

The president cannot dismiss the case without inviting the serious attention of the army to the grave subject which has been presented for his consideration and decision. The officers belonging to the military service zeal, gallantry, and skill have long been established. The country duly appreciates their value, but unremitted care should be taken to abstain from any act which may tend to impair their high character. And what so likely to derogate from this as the assumption of important executive or ministerial authority by a military commander, or the disregard of his orders?

The exercise of authority not possessed nor delegated -- the non observance of instructions, or the expenditure of the public treasure, not warranted by law nor justified by imperious necessity, cannot be disregarded. A just responsibility of all in authority makes it a public duty of imperative obligation to observe and strictly enforce the law and the rules of the service.

By order of the President,
W.L. Marcy
Secretary of War.

III. The court of inquiry, of which Brevet Brigadier General H. Brady is president, is hereby dissolved.
By order,
R. Jones, Adjutant General.

70.416 Aug 29, 1846 Gen. Stephen Watts Kearny arrives at Santa Fe, friendly reception

The Santa Fe Expedition. -- An express from Gen. Kearney reached Fort Leavenworth on the 14th instant. The general with several companies United States dragoons, the 1st regiment Missouri volunteers under Col. Domphan, and Major Clarke's battalion of volunteer artillery left Bents' Fort for Santa Fe, on the 1st of August, all in fine health and spirits. They had information that so far from a resistance, the Mexicans were anxious for the arrival of the Americans. The ladies of Santa Fe were making extensive preparations for a fandango dance and other sports to welcome their reception, and some of them expressed a desire to accompany the expedition to California. Captain Moore, United States dragoons, had captured three spies, sent by the Mexicans to look out. They were taken to camp, and there told to examine every thing and make what enquiries they please, and were then dismissed. Gen. Kearney would remain at Santa Fe till Colonel Price's regiment arrived, and then proceed to California.

Col. Allen with 500 Mexican infantry was progressing rapidly and would probably reach Bents' Fort before Col. Price's mounted men. A great member of traders and a large quantity of goods were met on their way out.

70.416 Aug 29, 1846 unsuccessful attack on Alvarado

A demonstration, by order of Com. Conner, was made against Alvarado, on the 8th inst., in which the Mississippi participated. The difficulty of passing the bar and the appearances of an approaching storm, induced a signal to haul off, after some shots had been exchanged, without injury on our side.

70.416 Aug 29, 1846 chartering of ships for the California expedition, charges of malfeasance by Thomas Jefferson Sutherland against Col. John D. Stevenson in connection with outfitting the California expedition

The California Expedition. -- We learn that Col. Stanton has chartered the ships Susan Drew, T.H. Perkins, and Loo Choo, to convey the California expedition to their place of destination. These vessels are all of the best class of ships and of about 700 tons custom house measure--well ventilated and admirably calculated for transports.

We are please to learn, that while millions of dollars have been squandered in extravagant charter parties at the south, these vessels have all been taken up at what would be considered reasonable terms if engaged by individuals. The gross amount paid to the three ships is only $65,000. Those who are acquainted with Col. Stanton will not be surprised at this, while the public will of course be prepared to learn that certain friends of the administration were anxious to do the work for double the sum!

For ourselves we have never believed that this expedition would sail under the command of J.D. Stevenson; and warrant for such an opinion, may be found in the well known Glentworth affair. A man who has ever found it necessary to be an alias, should never be entrusted with a military command or made the associate and companion of gentlemen. How Governor Marcy can justify it to his conscience and the country for having recommended Stevenson for this highly important command, we can not conjecture.

We have now lying on our table a paper, signed Thos. Jefferson Sutherland making many grave charges against Stevenson which he pledges to prove before a court of enquiry if an opportunity be afforded him. Of course we know nothing of their truth; but whether true or false, the government will not be held excused by the people, if the expedition be permitted to sail under the command of Stevenson without an investigation into these charges.

We copy the following iron this paper, which has been handed us by Sutherland who is himself a captain of volunteers.

4th. That he has purposed a fraud upon the members of his regiment by procuring a large quantity of clothing, not American in its fashion nor suited to the climate of California, which he designs to compel his men to purchase from him at prices far above the real value; his son-in-law being the pretended contractor.

5th. That he reported company rolls to the governor of this state as complete according to the requisitions of the war department, when in fact the companies did not contain the men protessed to have been enrolled, and thus procured commissions for favorites to the exclusion of competent men and good officers who had reported perfect rolls of companies, whose ranks were filled with respectable men.

6th. That he has used his influence to exclude from the corps of officers of his regiment all men of capacity and experience, and those who would be most likely to be directed by a nice regard for the interest and honor of their country, and to constitute it a body of weak, or very young and unexperiences men, who must needs be his suppliant underlyings.

7th. That he has publicly declared that if he was sent out by the government in a convoy, he would run away from the naval commander; and that after he had landed in California he would no longer obey the President of the United States nor any other authority of the government.

8th That he has practiced duplicity on the President, the Governor, and other persons in office in this state, unbecoming an officer and a soldier.

These are grave charges which concur not me alone, but the whole country, and they are now declared with the fullest sense and understanding that I endorse their truth with the commission which I myself hold, and a time and imprisonment on an indictment for libel, if the charges should prove to be such- and with this I am content.

[RCG]
Gen. Taylor left Matamoros on the 5th August, in the steamer Whiteville, for Camargo, accompanied by about one half the Texan regiment of infantry and a few regulars.

"General Order, No. 94. No spirituous liquors will be permitted to enter the river or the city of Matamoros for the purposes of barter or traffic on the account of any person whatever, whether sutler in the army or private dealers. Any liquors found in violation of this order will be confiscated and sent to the quartermaster in N. Orleans to be sold--one half of the proceeds for the benefit of the informant, the other half to be applied to the support of the hospital department.

The commanding general issues this order under the sanction of the general government, and calls upon all officers to give their aid in executing its provisions. The quartermaster's department and Col. Clark will take the necessary measures to have it communicated to the persons interested, particularly to the dealers in Matamoros, and the masters of all public transports or other vessels in the river. Any steamboat captains or other hired persons that are found violating it, will be at once dismissed from the service."

We judge from the numerous articles in the Matamoros papers, that the above order has occasioned no little excitement. How far it is possible to evade its provisions, is the question. "Spirituous liquors?" says the sutler, and the government wines and malt liquors they insist are included in the prohibition.

By the close of September this column will reach Monterey, where the chances of a battle are sufficiently uncertain to make it a matter of daily doubt and speculation. The very air is rite with rumors. It is said that Wool is now in command; if so, and he continues there, it is a guarantee of hard knocks.

The health of the regular army is represented to be good. The volunteers are suffering considerably, mainly from indiscretions, to which want of strict discipline renders them liable.

LETTER FROM COL. YELL, OF THE ARKANSAS VOLUNTEERS.

MY DEAR SIR: I have only a moment to write to you. We reached this place on yesterday at 11 o'clock A.M. and by 10 P.M. we crossed the river, and will take up the line of march for San Antonio. I regret that we have been disappointed in receiving our public arms and camp equipage. There has been inexcusable negligence somewhere, and I shall make the report to the proper department; and if that negligence should be continued, and we reach San Antonio without finding our arms, I shall make a final and direct report of the case to the secretary of war, and in he does not correct such inattention he will deserve to be removed from his present position. I hope, however, all will yet be satisfactorily explained, and that we shall be furnished on our arrival at our point of destination.

I am pleased to say that our troops are remarkably healthy yet, and in good spirits. They will, when an opportunity offers, give a good account of themselves.--

In haste, yours, A. YELL

NRR 71.001 5 Sept 1846 indications of government aiding to restore Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna to power, contradiction of the "Union" notwithstanding, he is allowed to pass the blockade, enters Veracruz, assumes command and the revolution progresses, Mariano Paredes y Arillaga overthrown and imprisoned by Gen. Jose Mariano de Salas, who aids Santa to power

WAR WITH MEXICO.

All eyes are now directed towards Ver Cruz waiting the progress of the new revolution in Mexico. Even our cabinet, if may credit the Washington correspondent of the N. York Journal of Commerce, at a meeting held on the 27th ult. determined to take no step in reference to the demonstration of the Santa Anna party, until the result of the revolution shall be known. The fleets are to remain inactive and Gen. Taylor is to continue to menace invasions. The "Union" has repeatedly denied, that our government has any connection with any Mexican faction. Notice the fact of Santa Anna not being prevented to enter Vera Cruz in the dull British steamer Arab, which he effected on the 16th of Aug. although it was known to the whole squadron that he would about that time make the attempt--and although our crack steamer, Princeton made a show of attempting to intercept the Arab. Yet it may have been that wind, weather and fortune, all conspired in favor of the daring enterprise. Certain it is, that a letter from the American Ex-Consul, Campbell, introduced Gen. Santa Anna to the Commandant of the American squadron, Com. Conner.

The Savannah Republican says--"We have been frequently asked whether Com. Conner will be likely to allow Santa Anna to pass unmolested into Ver Cruz? We unhesitatingly answer yes--if he has received his despatches from the government at Washington. We have no positive information on the subject, but we rather guess so from few facts and circumstances which may be easily connected. In the first place, we think that the government and Santa Anna understand each other thoroughly. Mr. Slidell McKenzie, who may now be considered the man with the "white hat," has been to Cuba--has conferred with the fleet off Vera Cruz, and with General Taylor. Senor Tamariz, secretary of the treasury of Mexico during the last administration of Santa Anna, has been in the United States--probably at Washington. He came to Charleston, and there chartered a steamer for a large sum to carry him to Cuba, where he arrived only a day or two before the announcement that Vera Cruz had declared in favor of the exiled chief. Private letters received in New York from Havana as late as the 8th instant, state on high authority that Santa Anna is not so averse to peace with this country as has been generally supposed, and that he will rejoice at the appearance of any liberal offer was in contemplation by the administration, we may not only infer from the call for the passage of the two million bill but from the well ascertained fact that Mr. Polk has actually dispatched a messenger to Mexico.

Now, putting all these facts together, we are inclined to the belief that this whole movement is well understood, and that the ascendency of Santa Anna, and the banishment of Parades will be followed by an early adjustment of the difficulties between the two governments. If, therefore, the scheme has worked right, it is highly probably that there will not be the slightest difficulty interposed to the triumphal entrance into Vera Cruz by Santa Anna and his friends.

OVERTHROW AND IMPRISONMENT OF PAREDES. The N. Orleans papers of the 24th ult. furnish an account of the arrival of the British brig of war During, with Vera Cruz dates to the 16th.

General Santa Anna reached Vera Cruz on the 16th and immediately placed himself at the head of the movement in that department.
Mexico and Puebla had declared in favor of Santa Anna. General Bravo had scarcely assumed the presidency to act in the absence of Paredes, before Paredes was seized and placed in confinement in the Citadel of Mexico. Gen. Salas "assumed the responsibility" and took command. His two sons proceeded immediately to Vera Cruz to meet and welcome Santa Anna. They reached Vera Cruz on the 8th.

The Picayune say--"Before Santa Anna left Havanna he took letters from Gen. Campbell to Com. Conner, and avowed himself, in reply to some inquiries as to his intentions, as follows--"If the people of my country are for war, then I am with them; but I would prefer peace."

Gomez Farias aided the revolution at Mexico. Salas has issued a proclamation, directing Congress to meet on the 6th of December, under the constitution of 1824; the restoration of which he declares to be one of the chief objects of the revolution. That is, the federal Constitution--of which he was always a warm advocate.

Santa Anna will be an indifferent hand to govern under confederate authority, or we have mistaken his character.

ANNEXATION OF CALIFORNIA. Various rumors brought by the British steamer to N. Orleans, from Vera Cruz, assert that California--meaning we presume, Monterey--Mazatlan, or some other port on the Pacific has been taken possession of, or has declared in favor of annexation to the United States. The most plausible version of the report is from Mexican letters dated 8th August, stating that "some of the disaffected citizens of Monterey, in conjunction with a few inhabitants of American origin, who were aided by the crew of the U.S. sloop of war Falmouth, took possession of the city, hoisted the American colors, and proclaimed California's annexed to the United States." The crew of the Falmouth will be surprised to learn the caper they have been cutting beyond the Cordilleras whilst they supposed themselves quietly blockading Vera Cruz all the while.

ENTRANCE OF THE ARMY INTO MIER.

Mier, (Mexico,) July 31, 1846.

Captain Vinton's command entered this place this morning without the least show of opposition, the inhabitants thronging to the Plaza in crowds as the troops filed into it and stacked their arms in front of the house of the Alcade. It seemed to me as though there were men enough in the square to have beaten us off with nothing else save the loose rocks lying about; yet not a hand was raised.

Mier is by far the most pleasant, cleanly, and well regulated place we have yet seen in this part of Mexico. It is built on a hill overlooking a clear running stream of the same name, three miles from the Rio Grande, and is said to contain 6,000 inhabitants, although I do not know where they stow them all. You may well recollect that it was in this place that the Texans under Col. Fisher were compelled to surrender after they had killed twice their number of Mexicans.

I have stated that the number of the inhabitants is put down at 6,000; admitting that it is 4,000, it was still entered and taken possession of by 93 men only --85 regulars and 8 of McCollock's Rangers, acting as a mounted guard. You could not serve any town in the United States in that way, and this place is a perfect fortification from its position and the strength of the houses, which are of stone. Captain Vinton's command occupies a large school house in one corner of the Plaza, near the church--strong, and at the same time commodious and comfortable quarters.

It is company B, of the third artillery, or "Redlegged Infantry," as it is now called from the fact that the men are at this time serving as infantry, while they wear the red artillery stripe down their pantaloons. I give you a list of the officers, who are all

I return to Camargo in the morning with the Rangers. If I could have my own way I should remain here, for it is worth forty of Camargo. [RCG]

NNR 71.002 Sept 5, 1846 attempt on Alvarado

UNITED STATES SHIP CUMBERLAND,

Off Vera Cruz, July 30, 1846.

SIR: Shortly after closing my letter of the 28th instant, the Cumberland, Potomac, and two of the schooners sailed from Green Island for the purpose of attacking the enemy's vessels in the river of Alvarado. In passing through the channel leading to the roads of Antonio Lizard, I regret to inform you this ship, owing to a strong current, ran on the northwest part of a coral reef, called the Chopas, in three fathoms water. This was about half past 4 o'clock in the afternoon of the 28th.

After great exertions, and lightening her more than a foot by pumping off the water, removing the provisions and shot to the other vessels, and depositing most of the spar deck guns on a shoal part of the reef near the vessel, (whence they can be easily removed,) with the assistance of the Mississippi, she was finally extricated from her perilous position at about 8 o'clock, P.M., on the 29th, after grinding in the coral reef for upwards of 27 hours. With the exception of her false keel, of which small crushed fragments rose to the surface of the water alongside, the ship does not appear to have sustained any material injury, as she makes no more water than usual. It is reasonable to infer, however, that much of the copper on the bottom has been rubbed off.

It affords me great satisfaction to add that the officers and men of the Cumberland performed their incessant labor with untiring zeal and assiduity; and my acknowledgements are due to Captain Fitzhugh, his officers, and men, for the very efficient aid rendered by the Mississippi, whose services were of the greatest importance, and to Lieutenant Le Roy and the men of the Potomac, who shared our labors.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. CONNER

NNR 71.002 Sept, 5 1846 effect of Gen. Zachary Taylor's temperance orders at Matamoros

By the steamer McKim, from Brazos Santiago, which reached New Orleans on the 30th we have the following, extracted from N. Orleans papers:--

Col. Clark has succeeded in re-establishing order at Matamoras, by promptly executing the recent temperance orders of Gen. Taylor.

Capt. F.L. Ball, of the Kentucky volunteers, is supposed to have been murdered by the Mexicans on the road between Barita and Matamoras.

NNR 71.002: September 5, 1846 -expedition of the Rangers to the interior

Camargo, Mexico, Aug. 11, 1846.

One step towards Monterey is to be taken tomorrow. Captain Duncan's battery, accompanied by a small portion of M'Cullough's men, leave this place in the direction of the mountains, and by some road on the opposite side of the river. It may be looked upon only as a reconnaissance, although an artillery force is along. Of whatever befalls them on the road you shall be made acquainted all in good time. If the command does not take Mier in the route, it will go close to that place.

News has reached here this morning to the effect that the city of Guenero has pronounced in favor of the United States government. The people of that place have all along been friendly towards the Americans, or have so seemed; but whether from any love they might bear them, or from fear of the encroachments of the Camanches, is a matter I am not able to determine at this present writing. I believe, honestly, that the people of Guenero have some intelligence and are better disposed than those of any place on the river.

The crack steamer Brownsville, by which I send this, brought up two companies of the advance of the Baltimore troops last evening, the rest coming on by land. They are a hardly looking set of "b'hoys"by all appearance, but I have no doubt will do good service. Captain Blanchard's company of twelve-months Louisiana volunteers, recruited from the regiments recently disbanded, entered camp this forenoon.

The town of China, on the Rio St. Juan, about 65 or 70 miles from Camargo, was taken on the 5th instant by Capt. M'Cullough of the Texas Rangers, without opposition. Col. Seguin with one hundred Mexicans were in the town, but on the appearance of the Americans they retreated.

NNR 71.002 Sept 5, 1846 Gen. Taylor proceeds to Camargo, grand review

A letter from Camargo, dated August 9, says:

The steamer Hatchee Eagle arrived here last evening, Gen. Taylor and his staff coming up on her. The talk is of an immediate movement at some point on the route. Whether the army is to move by way of China, or is to cross the San Juan at this place and march on the other side of the river, has not yet been settled upon I believe. There are now near 3,000 men, all regulars encamped here, and hosts, of volunteers are en route and shortly expected--some of them this afternoon.

The general impression among the best informed, as regards the chances of the Mexicans giving another battle, is that Gen. Taylor will have an opportunity of gaining fresh laurels at Monterey or near that place. On the river the inhabitants appear friendly enough, but in the interior the case is different.

Monterey

Editors of the Picayune-- Gentlemen: I have just heard of the arrival of the remainder of the Texas infantry, under Col. Johnson -- also of portions of the 3d and 4th U.S. infantry, under Col. Garland, with Capt. Bragg's battery. I have already mentioned that Gen Worth's brigade was under marching orders for the interior, the order being to be in readiness to move within eight days from yesterday.

NNR 71.016 Sept 5, 1846 complaints from volunteers at Matamoras about high prices for provisions

PRICES CURRENT AT MATAMOROS. In a letter from one of the Ohio volunteers, published in the Cincinnati Gazette, we find the following quotation of prices which they have to pay for anything beyond their rations, in that direction, viz: sugar, per lb. inferior, 40 cents; coffee, do. do. 35 cts.; cheese, do. do. 30 cts.; cider per gallon stale, $2.50 whiskey per gallon, inferior, $4; shoes, stogas, per pair, $2 50; shirts each, hickory, $2.

Another Ohio paper says--"The volunteers in the army of invasion complain bitterly at the exorbitant exactions of the sutlers. One poor fellow, troubled in spirit says: "it is pretty tough, I can tell you--wages only seven dollars a month, whiskey from one to two dollars a gallon, and other necessaries of life in the same proportion."

CALIFORNIA. The Washington "Union" furnishes the substance of the information received by the government, from which, and from the Philadelphia Ledger, we obtain the following facts.

On the 15th of Jun, a junto met at Santa Barbara, headed by Governor Pico, for the purpose of declaring California independent.

The Mexican Commandant General, Castro, to resist this movement, proclaimed Castro, to resist this movement, proclaimed martial law throughout the country.

Those who decline to become American citizens are, on laying down their arms, permitted to depart in peace, with their property.

WAGONS.--We understand that 6 or 700 baggage wagons, and about as many set of harness for the U.S. army, are making in this city and the neighboring town, and an

NRR 71.017 Sept 12, 1846 dispatches to Mexico

DESPATCHES TO MEXICO. The New Orleans Picayune of the 29th ult. says: "As there were two or three revenue cutters at Brazos Santiago, when the Alabama left there, we presume that Mr. Habersham had no difficulty in procuring an immediate conveyance to Vera Cruz. Mr. Habersham, it will be recollected, was the bearer of Mr. Buchanan's letters to Commodore Conner and the Mexican secretary of war, but had been detained here for the want of a vessel going to Vera Cruz."

The Charleston Partiot of the 4th inst., has the following: "U.S.R. steamer Legare, off Rio Grande, Aug 22. I have just received on board a bearer of dispatches for Vera Cruz, and sail immediately. You may expect to hear of my arrival at New Orleans about the 10th or 12th of Sept. The steamer Mclean arrived here yesterday, and will go back for coal."

Mr. McLane, has been received with as great cordiality on his return to his native country as he appears to have been parted from with regret at the court to which he was a representative. English journals and English statesmen, all speak of the American minister with respect, and testify to the services he has contributed towards a restoration of harmony and of comparative good feeling between that country and the United States, and also refer to the deep solicitude he has evinced no less than to the business like capacity and statesman like views which have distinguished his intercourse with their government. The New York chamber of commerce and the common council of New York, on Mr. McLane's arrival on the 5th at that city from Boston, by deputation, met him with congratulations on the happy success of his mission, and with expressions of good will and good wishes.

NRR 71.020 Sept 12, 1846 difficulties attending the California expedition preparing at New York

The Albany Argus publishes the following letter, we presume, from one of the volunteers.

"The California regiment is still stationary here in New York, though every effort is making to expedite its departure. The government has engaged three noble ships, 700 to 800 tons, for transports, at a cost of $65,000. The preparations made for arming the regiments are very extensive. We are to be furnished with 800 percussion lock muskets, 800 do, with flint locks, and 800 rifles. In addition to this there will be equipments and cannon sent out for one company of artillery, and all the appointments for the corps of dragoons. This is done to provide against any possible contingency, and to make success any thing but problematical. If, therefore, on out arrival, we should not be enabled to co-operate with Gen. Kearney, immediately, Col. Stevenon will probably at once organize the dragoon corps. It is also expected that one company will be furnished with rifles, so that we shall form a complete army in ourselves, having one company of artillery, one of dragoons, seven of infantry, and one of light infantry or riflemen. I have had the pleasure of examining some of the muskets destined for our use, and I hesitate not to say that a more perfect article was never made. They are of the latest and best army pattern, perfect in their construction, and of most exquisite finish. The bayonet is secured from being wrenched off in action by a moveable ring, which renders it utterly impossible for the most expert swordsman to change the position or unfix the bayonet."

NRR 71.020 Sept 12, 1846 reasons why the "peace with Mexico"now anticipated may prove delusive
"The peace with Mexico," from the measures which have been promulged, and other measures supposed to be in process, our readers no doubt are by this time looking out for an announcement of, instead of a continuance of the caption, which, however, encircles with laurels, has not yet become an agreeable one to the peace-loving citizens of our happy republic. As yet, however, we cannot cry "peace," we have on one hand, the assurance that every member of the new cabinet of the (late?) acting President of Mexico, Bravo, is in favor of a peace with the U. States, and the assurance on the other hand, that Santa Anna "prefers peace," though, it is added, if the Mexicans insist on war, that he must needs obey their will, putting that and that together, and then adding a third assurance which we also find on just about the same reliable authority, (the public journal and their letter writers,) that the people of Mexico are exceedingly anxious for peace, giving credit to all these, and not doubting the official assurance which President Polk took occasion in his late communication to the Mexican minister of foreign affairs, so emphatically to repeat, the he was all along been most solicitous to restore, as he was before hostilities, to preserve peace, putting, we say, all these together, and adding the now admitted anxiety of both France and England for an amicable settlement of the difficulties between the United States and Mexico, such assurances as these, that all parties concerned, as well as of others not concerned, are anxious for a restoration of peace, and it would seem as if the deuce must be in it, if we cant obtain a peace under such favorable circumstances, more especially, as it is not at all concealed that our executive would be willing to stipulate to pay a few millions to obtain the terms he designs to propose.

Yet, with all these inducements, these apparent facilities towards a restoration of harmony, and not withstanding the general impression that an understanding exists between President Polk and Santa Anna, an impression which has been fortified almost into a certainty on many minds, by the fact of Commodore Conner going on board the Princeton himself, "on discovering the British steamer Arab approaching, on board of which Santa Anna was known to be, and his allowing the latter to slip into the port of Vera Cruz without boarding, all these favorable appearances notwithstanding, there are those that still apprehend that way may be continued. Some, through want of faith in Santa Anna; some from a certainty that Almonte, who accompanied Santa Anna, is an inveterate opponent of the dismemberment of Mexico; others from the fact that Santa Anna was accompanied by several distinguished military officers, one of them said to be the best cavalry officer in Mexico, (as, though Santa Anna redes); and others again who are not without suspicions that Paredes, Bravo, Santa Anna, and Almonte all understood each other, and are playing a Mexican game upon us; others doubt the disposition of the people of Mexico being friendly to a settlement on terms of dismemberment, and think that let Paredes, Bravo, Santa Anna, or whoever may be dictator, he will be compelled to defend, or attempt to defend the integrity of the Mexican territory.

71.020: September 12, 1846 General Taylor delayed

"THE ARMY OF OCCUPATION"

General Taylor with, it is believed, the whole of the "regulars" under his immediate command, were concentrated as high up the Rio Grande as Camargo, by the 10th of August, a few advance detachments being pushed a little in advance of that post, in the direction of Monterey. It was expected, at the latest dates from thence, that wagons, horses, and mules, as well as munitions and provisions, for which he had been impatiently waiting, might arrive there by the 20th or 30th of August, sufficient to authorize his quitting navigable water and commencing a march for the interior of Mexico.

In the mean time, whilst General Taylor was detained, after the victories of the 8th and 9th of May, for want of these indispensable "materials" for an offensive campaign, from pursuing the enemy, the terms of the volunteers who had hurried to his relief on the first requisition, expired, and they have been discharged without a man of them having been afforded a chance to meet a Mexican in arms. No fault of theirs, or of the general in command. It may have been the fortune of war.

"It is not in the power of mortals to command success. You have done more, my countrymen,

"You have deserved it."
Fresh volunteers, or twelve month's of men, to the number of ten or twelve thousand, have just reached the scene of action, and whilst they garrison the positions which General Taylor has left in his rear, or gradually march to sustain him, they are devoting most of their time, as they should do, to acquiring sufficient discipline to qualify them to meet a disciplined enemy. A few companies only, and those composed of troops from vicinities in which they have had opportunities to acquire considerable discipline, have as yet been associated with "the regulars." It must take some time to qualify troops gathered from the interior, and who have never seen service, to meet such troops as were met with on the 8th and 9th of May, without imminent risk of a very different result.

An abstract of the latest intelligence from this division of the army will be found in this number.

THE EXPEDITION UNDER GENERAL WOOL

OPERATIONS UPON THE PACIFIC

We are yet without authentic information from our squadron, other than was noticed in our last, received by the British brig of war Daring, at New Orleans. Government may possibly be in our possession of intelligence not yet promulgated. Of the occupation of at least two of the ports on the coast of California, by our squadron, there is no doubt. The British commandant on that station, it is said, was at a loss how to act in such a case, and dispatched an officer for advice or instructions from the British minister at Washington or the governor general of Canada.

As Commodore Sloat has had all the tedious, inactive service, and had, no doubt, made himself familiar with the whole concern on that station, we sincerely rejoice that the little share of éclat which was to be obtained in that remote latitude, has fallen to his lot, before officers sent for the purpose of superceding him in the command arrived.

The affair of the Baltimore battalion "and their Ohio commander"

The following letter is from the camp of the Baltimore volunteers on the Rio Grande:

Camp Belknap, August 2, 1846.

Our battalion is joined to one from Ohio, which forms a regiment, and this in connection with two other regiments from Ohio, comprises a brigade. There are also regiments from Alabama, Georgia, and Tennessee, quartered at this same camp, which is situated on a high bluff of land, from which we can see thousands of tents, and hear the drums beating the reveille.
Yesterday, Lafayette Hands, Andrew Metteer, and some of our boys went over to Barita, and returned in rather high spirits. As they were returning home, some one gave Andrew Metteer a catfish, which Col. Mitchell, of Ohio, who is Colonel of the whole brigade, claimed as his own, and ordered three of his men to take it from him. On the men seizing him, in compliance with the orders of their commander, Metteer drew a dagger and stabbed two of them. Colonel Mitchell then rushed on Metteer with a drawn sword and inflicted several severe gashes on his head, from the effects of which he fell as if dead. Layafette Hands then seized the Colonel, wrested his sword from him, and chased him with it for some distance around the camp, until another sword was handed him, when they had a regular sword fight, lasting some minutes, until the Colonel's sword broke, and he again ran, finally escaping to his own quarters. He then gave immediate orders for his men to turn out, armed with ball cartridge, when out Captain gave similar orders, and marched the Chesapeakes down to meet them. When we arrived, Captain Stuart, who in the absence ordered out the battalion, and we were all full of fight, and I verily believe that our 600 Baltimorians could have whipped the whole 2,500 Ohioans. Dan Wells had taken dead aim at the Colonel, and would have blown him sky high, had it not been for Charles Ehrman, who struck his musket. The Colonel then claimed the command of the whole brigade, and ordered us to out camp, which order we were compelled to obey. Colonel Watson was at Barita, where we immediately sent after him, and on his arrival he started for the camp of Colonel Mitchell, to demand an explanation of his conduct. On his arrival there, however, he was told that the Colonel had started for Matamoras to report to Gen. Taylor, but Colonel Watson is now after him, and I do not know how the spree will end.

NNR 71.022 Sept 12, 1846 letters detailing march from Matamoras to Camargo, difficulties encountered, progress impeded, incidents, movements, and position, advance under Gen. William Jenkins Worth proceeds to Cerralvo

Extract of a letter from young Stettinius, of the Baltimore volunteers to his parents, dated Camp Belknap, opposite Barita, July 29, 1846:

"My dear father and mother--It is with pleasure that I again write to inform you of the past, the present, and of the anticipations of the future. When I wrote my last letter, we were at the mouth of the Rio Grande. The ground was very low and marshy, and when it rained we were completely deluged. It was, however, far preferable to the Brasos. The water which we drink is from the Rio Grande. It is of a dark yellow color, caused by the muc with which it is mixed. After standing, however, for a few hours, it becomes pure and sweet.

On the 25th, we left the mouth for this place, a distance of nine miles, but our guide, the adjutant, not knowing any precise road, led us out of the way about 25 miles. During the whole march we had not a dry place for the "sole of our foot." We had to wade through tow canals, supposed to have been dug by the Mexicans during the Texan war. It was quite amusing to see the men in the water, struggling to get to the opposite shore, falling down, others falling over them. Many, one of whom was Lieut. Boyle, stuck fast in the mud, and were near being lost. We all, however, arrived safe at night, tired enough. We slept on the bank of the river, and awoke next morning, covered with sand crabs.

There are a great many birds of various kinds here which we hunt. Among them are the mocking bird and the red bird. There are also many rare plants, such as the wild cactus--some grow like a pineapple and bear a yellow flower, while others are flat like a cap, and bear red blossoms. Out colonel says we shall probably remain here until we start for home, as there appears to be no likelihood of our having a fight. There is a great deal of wild cattle about us which we shoot. They afford us a good supply of fresh meat, We have been here three days, and have already killed three beeves.

The place abounds in rattlesnakes, scorpions and lizards; also a reptile called Santa Fe, whose sting produces death in a short time; likewise large red ant which bite terribly; poisonous spiders, and last, but not least, the mosquitoes.

One might be led to think that in this desolate and far distant country we were wholly destitute of music, but at night we have plenty of it. The concert is opened by the mosquitoes, who is soon followed by the cricket. Then comes master wolf, with Soprano; the basso is admirably performed by Monsieur Jackass, whose tremendous voice nearly drowns the tenor of the frog. The concert cease by a piece called the reveille, which is composed of the fire and drum, at 4 o'clock in the morning. Father, you should volunteer for Texas!
[RCG]

NNR 71.022 Sept 12, 1846 hot weather, Army concentrated at Camargo, advances made towards Monterey, want of wagons

THE ARMY OF OCCUPATION.

Matamoros, Mexico, Aug 18, 1846

Messrs Editors-- The army is fast concentrating upon Camargo, or at least that wing of it under the immediate direction of Gen. Taylor. This, you know, is preparatory to a movement upon Monterey. The General expects to put his column in motion by the 1st of September, may be he will start earlier, but I do not think he will be enabled, if even so soon. Monterey is, by the shortest route from Camargo, a military march of twenty days, at least, provided the army be well supplied and no obstacles, other than natural, be interposed. With the present means, I do not think it can be accomplished, at this season, much short of a month.

I conceive the advance upon Monterey, even if I prove fully successful, to be a "feat of arms"barren of fruit: for what is to be gained by it? I have no doubt the Mexicans will make a stand at Monterey or this side of the city, and give out troops some hard work to do; but that the place will fall into out hands I've no doubt, as I have none of the ultimate success of the American forces.

In relation to the amount of force the Mexicans can bring into the field into the neighborhood of Monterey, there are various estimates; but no one knows-- for whilst the enemy, by a well organized system of espionage, knows all about us, we about them know but very little indeed, out knowledge scarcely extends beyond the precincts of out camp. Thus has it ever with the "Army of Occupation." Heretofore there was excuse in the smallness of out numbers, which disabled us from sending out scouts; but no there is now excuse on that score, and a want of knowledge of the enemy's numbers and position is an unpardonable neglect, or argues too great contempt of their valor--which was unexpectedly shown on the 8th and 9th of May last.

As I have said, I have no fear of the ultimate triumph of our arms. The greatest fear I apprehend is that whilst the main body of our army is marching upon Monterey, the enemy will make a diversion in this quarter, and attempt to regain Matamoros by a "coup de main,"or get possession of Point Isabel. Last night we had an alarm in town. Indeed, a body of some 400 Rancheros burst into the city, bent on mischief. There merely made a show however, and took themselves off; but it makes known to you how poorly we were off here, that we could not pursue and punish them. Had they remained a little while longer; an armed body of citizens, (American) would have been upon them, assembled upon the spur of the occasion. As it was, the wee regular force left here had to keep guard over the Q.U. commissary and pay departments, thus left heedlessly exposed to pillage. This late affair may stir up to the realities of our situation, the powers that be, and not leave us londer to the sport of fortune for safety. This morning Colonel Clark has taken upon himself to enlarge the force here, and has called over from the other side of the Rio Grande a battalion of Ohio volunteers, and will organize the American citizens. It is not strange that here is a captured city, with a depot for the army, left exposed to pillage, without an adequate force to prevent it; and besides no means taken to know who has a right to be here? I myself have seen "fellows"whom I am certain are emissaries from the Mexican army prowling about here; and it is a known fact that Mexican officers were killed and taken prisoners at Palo Alto and Resaca, recognized as the former "milk and chicken merchants"of Camp Taylor! Indeed, I consider out situation here a little critical, as we have not an adequate force to defend the city; and should it be seriously threatened, by a large force of the enemy, we will have to fire the place and cross the river to Fort Brown which is now all but the parapets, under water. The demonstration last night was a most daring one. The first show of another will be followed by the forcible expulsion of every "ochre-colored face"if not of a war of extermination upon the deceitful thieving Rancheros.

The Florida war is being acted over here again, both in relation to the conduct of the war and the creation of an enormous "sinking fund." The "hawks of the chapparal" like the Seminoles of the hammock, now infest every road and by path to cut off the unwary. Several have been thus killed by the volunteers who had left Matamoros for elsewhere and have never been heard of since--one a captain of the Kentucky Regiment. The "Guerrilla" system of old Spain is commenced in the new world. The only consolation we have is that at this kind of warfare the Texans are equally good with the Rancheros, and that we can put Capt. Walker against Roman Falcon.

The measles have got among the wester volunteers and plague the boys mightily. Those from the eastern parts of the country have fortunately passed through the disease whilst young and have no fears of it. Your Baltimore and District boys have gone up the river to Camargo--left hence two days ago. They are generally well, but a little too much disposed to fight "a la rowdie" by way of getting their hands in against the time of meeting the Mexicans. Some few were in the guard house at Matamoras, but considering these were often in the watch house when at home, it was looked over lightly, and no general reflection passed upon the credit of the whole for the riotous conduct of the few. I have no doubt in a fight with the enemy they will show themselves valiant and strong--bold and fearless.

NNR 71.022 12 September 1846: Confusion over disbanding of the six months' volunteers

Our information is that the department ordered General Taylor, positively, to dismiss all the six months' volunteers for whom he could not furnish immediate service. From this order, he retained the Texas mounted men, for he could give them immediate service, but as he could not put all the six months' volunteers from Louisiana, Alabama, and Missouri into immediate services as he had more men than he needed, he did not choose to make selections, and therefore issued the orders for disbanding the whole. Previous to the receipt of this peremptory order from the department he had attached the St. Louis Legion to Col. Twigg's command of regulars.

The General expects to put his column in motion by the 1st of September, may be he will start earlier, but I do not think he will be enabled to if even so soon- Monterey is, by the shortest route from Camargo, a military march of twenty days, at least, provided the army be well supplied and no obstacles other than the natural, be interposed.

[NRR 71.022 12 September 1846 measles among volunteers from the west]

The measles have got among the western volunteers and plague the boys mightily. Those from the eastern parts of the country have fortunately passed through the disease whilst young and have no fears of it.

[NRR 71.022 12 September 1846 rowdyism among the volunteers from Baltimore and the District]

Your Baltimore and District boys have gone up the river to Camargo- left hence two days ago. They are generally well, but a little too much disposed to fight "a la rowdie"by way of getting their hands in against the time of meeting the Mexicans.

[NRR 71.022-71.023 letter from Point Isabel about various activities and movements]

The last case of murder I heard of was that of Col. Haynes. I saw him killed a few evenings before as Richard III, when he died as all monarchs do- very badly. His death was a loss to the theatre at Matamoros, as they are left destitute of a tragic hero. He was not only celebrated as an actor, but was generally known by his having stopped the play, in the theatre at Corpus Christi, while he and Adjutant Gen. Johnson went out to take a drink. The command at Matamoros is under Col. Clark, who has a portion of regulars and the 3rd regiment Ohio volunteers under Colonel Curtis, who are stationed on the bank of the river, at Fort Paredes and Fort Brown. Since the movement of the army above to Camargo, the place seems very dull and the judicious order of General Taylor, prohibiting the sale of spirituous liquors after the 15th, has helped to make it so, and made the place somewhat decent.

A friend of ours accompanied Gen. Smith to Camargo by land. He says they left Matamoros to join Col. Wood 's command of mounted Texans, but Col. W. had gone another route. Gen. Smith nothing daunted, started off with only one friend as a volunteer and two servants. Rather harsh, you will say, after having heard the day before that Canules was between them and Reynosa. They went the first afternoon to Guadalupe; the next day to La Mesa, and the next into the Lagona St. Anna, about twelve miles from Reynosa. Here the water rose over the wagon body in less than half an hour. They were obliged to unhitch their mules and for three days they worked with seven Mexicans and six yoke of oxen, to get clear of the water occasioned by the overflow. At the expiration of the third day they got out and proceeded on their way. Fortune still pursued the General, as a party of Toukewa Indians supposed to be the same we saw at Matamors came over to the Mexican side and took off a family of eight persons from the very rancho at which our friend was going to pitch his tent; so you will see there is luck for him yet. They got sale at Camargo, where Gen. Smith (now Colonel) was ordered by General Taylor to take command of the 5th and 7th regimens of regular military. Since then Col. Smith has received under his command the company of Louisiana volunteers commanded by Captain Blanchard. That company have now got the regular uniform, and the officers say they cannot tell the difference between them and the regular soldier. It is certainly an ornament to Louisiana, to think there are some men that had sum sufficient to remain to defence of their country.

Gen Worth moved forward towards Seralvo on the 99th with the 8th infantry, under Captain R. B. Scriver, of your city, Capt. Duncan’s battery, and Bradford’s company; and two companies of Texas mounted men to convey back the mules, 700 in number. They were packed with provisions; General T. throwing forward his supplies to Seralvo, Captain Duncan had previously been up there, and reported a beautiful wooded country- the Mexicans were willing to grant him all the assistance in their power- that there was plenty of water and forage for horses- met with agreeable reception. One Mexican, whom they met in the road in the night, would not stop for them, and they shot him, when he threw his horse over a precipice and took to the chapparal. On their return they found the horse, which had evidently belonged to an American, and no doubt had been stolen.

NNR 71.023: September 12, 1846 Regiments toward Monterrey, sickness, inactivity for want of wagons

August 22, 1846.

General Taylor has started two regiments in the direction of Monterey, and several other regiments will be pushed forward in a few days. There is great complaint for the want of wagons. For goodness sake why are three or four hundred wagons permitted to remain on your levee. If the administration are serious in the prosecution of the war, why such palpable neglect? The idea of keeping 12 or 15,000 men in the hot sun, cutting chapparal, meets the disapprobation of every individual in the army. I, for one, know the arduous duties thrown upon Col. Hunt, yet there could be found plenty of assistants, and those wagons must come over in double quick time, or we shall believe, on this side, the war is a most inglorious humbug. I say, sent the wagons and give Gen. Taylor "a white man's chance."The Rio Grande has taken a second and greater rise than the first-the whole of the low lands under water.

A good deal of camp sickness-confined however, principally to the Illinois and Indiana troops. The sickness yields to medicine, and there are few deaths.

The Mexicans are very confident of giving us a severe thrashing at a pass in the mountains. They are certainly in possession of information which emboldens them, and the opinion gains ground here, that unless the administration backs out, that Parades will be found at the head of 30,000 troops in and about Monterrey. Rough and Ready does not believe a word of it, and if you recollect, General Worth and most of the officers gave it as their decided opinion that Arista and Ampudia would not attack us. I say to you that we will have the hardest battle fought since the battle of Waterloo-unless, in the absence of Paredes, Santa Anna should attempt to get into power, and compels his countermarch to the capital. The administration should prosecute the war vigorously, and bring it to a close. Any treaty made now would not last twelve months. The Mexicans are as treacherous as the Sioux. They do not consider themselves whipped.

I must conclude by requesting you to send forward the wagons, and relieve us from our 'masterly inactivity'. You will receive the thanks of 15,000 dis-spirited soldiers; and it will be the means of saving thousands of dollars to the treasury. Excuse this hasty scrawl, as it is written in a hurry for the steamer, Alabama.

A VOLUNTEER.

P. S. Say to adventurers, if they do not want to get into double trouble, they must not bring alcohol or slops to this market. The Generals swear by all that is holy, they will have each box, barrel and package examined, and if they find any smuggling they inflict a punishment cruel to youths with tender skins. They are in earnest, and I think the army will improve from this day forward. A. V.

Baltimore Volunteers. The Patriot of the 8th states that some twenty or thirty of the Baltimore volunteers have returned, having been discharged on account of sickness.

A letter written on board the steamboat Brownsville, while on her way from Matamoras to Camargo, says,-Two companies of our battalion, (Baltimore), are now on this boat, on their way to Camargo. The remaining four will follow immediately. The two which are now on board are under the command of Captain James E. Stewart. I would here take the opportunity of speaking a few words in reference to this officer. He is a gentleman as well as an officer, kind and yet decisive towards the subordinates, respecting and respected. He enjoys the greatest confidence of his fellow officers in matters of consideration, and it seems that his judgment is necessary before a final consummation. He is a son of the gallant Colonel Stewart, who so triumphantly defended Fort McHenry during the last war, and the bright laurels won by him will receive no tarnish in the hands of his brave son. Give him an opportunity, and if I am not greatly deceived, he will prove himself on of Maryland's brightest stars.

Letter from Camargo

A letter dated Camargo, 11th August, says- "We are not troubled with mosquitoes here except in the houses, where they can remain cool through the day. But the ants seem to have possession of the town. - Last night they made a serious attempt to carry me off in my sleep. Thousands of them attacked me.

Flare-up Among the Illinois Volunteers

FLARE-UP AMONG THE ILLINOIS VOLUNTEERS. We hear from New Orleans that is was exceedingly difficult to keep down the spirit of insubordination among the volunteers under Col. Hardin. This was manifested to some extent on board the Hannibal, but was still more apparent when they were about to be shipped to the point of destination. One steamer and three or four transport schooners had been appointed to receive them. Lots were drawn, and it fell to the Chicago company, under the command of Captain Mower, to go on board a very small transport vessel. To this the Captain and all his company demurred. They were called out, paraded, and he made a speech to them. They determined then to march to town and thence to proceed home. At this juncture Colonel Hardin appeared with four companies of men. The mutineers were ordered on board, put there, and the Captain placed under arrest. This prompt movement put an end to any further attempt at insubordination. [St. Louis Republican, Aug. 5].

Ohio Volunteers

OHIO VOLUNTEERS. About sixty of the Ohio volunteers have returned from the Rio Grande. They gave sad accounts of the condition of things there. Fare intolerable; sickness extensive; work hard; climate bad. -Gen. Taylor gave them permission to return on account of sickness. He is willing to part with more. Government has poured in upon him more troops than knows what to do with. The following is an extract of a letter from one of the Third Regiment of Ohio Volunteers, dated Camp Belknap, opposite Burita, July 29th, 1846, to his friend in Cincinnati:

"We left the mouth of the Rio Grande the next morning after I sent you my last pencil scraw. WE did not start till the sun was five hours high, and were compelled to march thirteen miles in the hottest part of a very hot day, through swamps and chapparal; sometimes wading in two feet of water and three of mud, and a pretty looking set we were. A steamboat took the heavy baggage; we beat her by two hours; we then had to carry all our baggage upon a bluff, about a mile and a half back of the river, and ther pitch our tents. The next day we pushed half a mile further up the river, and with axes and spades, commenced clearing a camping ground for the whole regiment. We had a tall time in clearing out the chapparal, full of snakes, frogs, lizards and turtles, (or gophers, as they call them here.) We had one good mess of soup, however.

"We are now encamped two miles from the river, from which we have to carry all our water in camp kettles. We are literally hewers of wood and carriers of water," and nothing else." The water is very muddy, and much worse than the Missouri; but we are glad to drink it, mud and all, considering the distance we have to carry it, the scorching weather, and the salt provisions. Our food is adominable; when you break a biscuit, you can see it move, (if the critters are not dead from eating bad flour.) The pork and bacon are of the same character. We would not mind this so much, if they would only serve us out enough; we do not get half rations, and were it not for the wild beef we shoot, we should starve.

"We expect to remain her for two months. Mosquitoes abound; the "boys" are getting home sick, and trying every way to get discharged. We have a great many sick; out of nine in our mess, five are sick, one of whom we think cannot recover; a case of yellow fever is reported in Barita. Some of the "boys" who used to sing,

"Rio Grande! I would I were upon your banks," now reverse the case, and wish they were three thousand miles away from it." [Cincinnati Gaz. [JTW]

NNR 71.024 12 September 1846 complaint of a Pennsylvania volunteer about the poor arrangements for supplies

The late appointments for volunteer general officers may all be very good men, and if experience is afforded, some if not all, may become able generals, but a disaster would now involve our country in a protracted contest.

This is my experience in campaigning, and I may be deceived in supposing that many things might be done better than they are. For instance, I think it a great outrage that the quarter master department and commissary department, are not so managed as to supply all the troops called into service with provisions and forage as needed, when the fact is, that since we have been encamped here, our men have been three times without a supply of provisions for days together, and for a week past our horses have had no forage furnished.

NNR 71.025-027 12 September 1846 account of the bombardment of Fort Brown

We have been favored by an officer of the army with the subjoined communication, narrating particular sets of gallantry and other interesting incidents which occurred during the bombardment of Fort Brown on the Rio Grande. The brilliant bravery and gallant achievements which distinguished the battles of the 8th and 9th of May command the warmest admiration; but assailed on all sides by a vigorous, incessant, and long-continued attack, as Fort Brown was there is no event in our military annals in which, it appears to us a higher degree of military skill and resource, courage and endurance, under the most trying circumstances, were displayed, than in the brave and successful defence of that post. In all of these conflicts- those in the field, under Gen. Taylor, as well as that of the fort- the high spirit and training of West Point, it should be remembered, were every where conspicuous; and if any thing were needed to sustain the friends of that noble institution against the demagogue- clamors which have assailed it they might point with pride to these actions which have shed so much luster on our arms.

The various letters which have been written on the subject of the bombardment of Fort Brown seem to have been gotten up on the spur of the moment, written during the high excitement which prevailed amongst us, without regard to justice to officers, non- commissioned officers, and soldiers and to the importance of such an event in our military history.

Having occupied a position to judge the combined action of the garrison, and of observing all the various incidents of the bombardment, I take pleasure in furnishing a correct account of it, as I am not only anxious to do justice to all concerned, but am anxious that events which must bear an important place in our military history should be fully and correctly detailed to the public. And if I succeed in rescuing from oblivion any of those events which reduced so much to the credit and honor of our regular army, I shall feel that I have at least contributed my share in toward reestablishing its worth in the estimation of those of our people who, from long-continued peace, had almost forgotten it.

On the 26th of April, the day after the attack and capture of Thorton's squadron of 24 dragoons, we were first possessed of certain information that the enemy had crossed the Rio Grande in considerable force, and it was evident that he had in view "one of two objects, either to advance on Point Isabel to cut all our supplies, or to attack Gen. Taylor in position; either of which rendered the completion of Fort Brown of immediate necessity in order that it might be held by a small force, whilst the remainder of the army was free to move against the enemy, leaving the United States flag still planted and protected on the left bank of the Rio Grande. From this to the 1st of May the forces were kept more constantly engaged on the work, laboring hard by day whilst at night they were kept constantly on the alert in expectation of an attack.

On the 1st of May the commanding general ordered the movement of his army, designation as the garrison of Fort Brown the seventh regiment of infantry. Captain Lowd's company of the second artillery and Lieut. Bragg's battery of light artillery, composed of two six pounders and two twelve pounder howitzers. The army moved at 3 o'clock PM on the 1st, and the garrison of Fort Brown marched in two companies and the seventh infantry being assigned to every bastion except the one occupied by Capt. Lowd's company, which manned the eighteen pounder battery of four guns, bearing on the town of Matamoros and the Mexican batteries. When the army marched it was confidently expected that the fort would not be attacked, but General Taylor would certainly have a fight, either in going or returning from Point Isabel. The fort was now far from being finished, or in a proper state of defence—on curtain entirely unfinished, the draw bridge and interior defences not yet commenced.—Our commander saw before him an immense deal of labor to be expended on the work before it could be regarded in proper state of defence, and that not a moment ought to be lost in its completion.

Immediately after reveille on the 2d of May the seventh infantry was turned out to work, and continued to labor hard during the whole day, and until long after dark on the unfinished curtain and gateway, whilst the artillery companies were not less usefully employed in placing their batteries in a condition for offensive and defensive operations. At tattoo at night our gallant commander was on the alert, and, fully impressed with the importance of his trust, ordered his command under arms, and saw every man at the post he was to occupy in case of an attack, directing that every man should be instructed to be ready to report to his place at the parapet at a moment's warning. During the day muskets were placed in the hands of every man capable of bearing arms, and our force numbered five hundred and sixty men and forty officers: thirty-two officers and three hundred and forty-one rank and file seventh infantry; three officers and forty-two rank and file of Captain Lowd's company; four officers and fifty one rank ad file of Lieut. Bragg's company, six dragoons, and one officer and ninety-two rank and file of a detachment of inefficient men from other regiments. Of this number, ninety-five were on the sick report, seventy seven being the number of inefficient men left from other regiments, and the remainder of the five hundred and sixty were citizens and sutlers, twenty-five in number. This was the strength of our force during the whole of the bombardment, and it has been truly said that "we were surrounded by as many thousands as we had hundreds."

Reveille on the memorable morning of the 3d found the gallant Brown at his post, and whilst giving an order to his staff giving an order to his staff officer to have the seventh infantry turned out to work on the defences, his attention was attracted to the first shot fired by the enemy. With a smile of joy he turned to his staff officer and said: "Sir, we have other to do today; order the batteries manned; go to the right and see that every man is at his post; I will go to the left." Lowd's battery needed no order, it was already manned and each piece directed by an officer, Captain Mansfield, our engineer, having volunteered to aim the fourth piece. At this time it was observed that the flag had been overlooked and not yet raised, when Lieut. Van Dorn volunteered to raise it; which was done under fire from the enemy, which was drawn upon him. The work commenced, and notwithstanding the fear entertained that the axles of the old 18 pounder would not stand it, it was done, and well done.

The enemy's fire was opened on us from the nearest fort, called by us the "Sandbag Battery", by the Mexicans "La Fortine Redonda". This was composed of one eight-pounder and two mortars, under the command of Capt. Passamente, a Frenchman, who as he asserts took up arm for his adopted country and for the protection of his family, but who bravely declined to follow the fortunes of Gen. Arista when he ingloriously fled from Matamoros. To the skill of Capt. Passamente as an artillerist we can all bear witness, as a constant and well-directed fire was kept up from his battery until his eight-pounder was dismounted by us. The enemy's fire was commenced and continued with nine pieces of artillery. At this time Sergeant Weizart of B Company 7th infantry, was killed by a round shot. The enemy's fire was now continued from the batteries between La Fortine Redonda and the lower fort from Las Fortine de la Fetcha, and the mortar battery in its vicinity. After silencing La Fortine Redonda, our batteries continued a deliberate fire on the other batteries and the town until ten o'clock, when the enemy ceased firing to repair their batteries, the embrasures of which were well torn to pieces. We were compelled to cease our fire, in consequence of the necessity of using our ammunition as sparingly as possible, the fort having been left with only one hundred and fifty rounds of ammunition for each eighteen pounder, and the six pounder just as badly provided. Lieut. Bragg was now ordered to place his guns in barbette in the several bastions for defence, one, under his own direction, placed in the bastion commanded by Capt. Hawkins, one, under Lieut. Thomas, in the bastion commanded by Major Seawell; one under the direction of Lieut. Reynolds, in the bastion of Capt. Miles; and the other, under the direction of Lieut. Johnson, in the bastion commanded by Capt. Lee. In this condition we were surrounded, and without the means of preventing our enemy from placing his batteries almost wherever he pleased, and using against us his immense supply of ammunition to every advantage. The conduct of the officers and men of Capt. Lowd's and Lieut. Bragg's companies during the cannonade with their batteries deserves high commendation, as they attracted the admiration of the whole command by the skillful management of their guns. From seven o'clock on the 1st the seventh infantry was kept constantly at work on the defences, though the enemy's shells fell and exploded in all directions around them, every man lying down, when a shell fell near, and immediately resumed the spade and mep after it had exploded. Officers were seen showing an example of their men, even in throwing dirt on the parapet.

NNR 71.034 19 September 1846 account of the Alvarado affair

The three armed schooners got close in- the steamers Mississippi and Princeton not near enough for their shot to take effect. I suppose, however, the commodore felt disposed to let them know on shore that he was there on a visit, and the two steamers and two schooners opened their fire on the fort with round shot and shell, their shot taking wonderful effect.- What was very strange, the fort did not return fire. The schooners might have been injured had they opened on them. When it became twilight three or four hundred ranged themselves under the cover of the chapperal bushes, and commenced firing on the schooners which were near on shore, the schooners returning the fire with the long gun, musketry, grape, canister, and shell until the firing ceased from the shore. Certainly many must have been killed, for at every flash from shore a stand of canister or grape was poured right into them. When the firing ceased from the shore, the schooners hauled off, by order, into deep water.- During the night the weather was squally, with heavy rains. The next morning it was portentous of a heavy gale from the northward, which here, in this gulf is generally a terrific hurricane. Signal was made from the commodore to stand to the northward and anchor at this anchorage. The day was one- enough to sicken the oldest tar; thick with heavy rains, and a dead beat to windward, against a strong current. Thus ended the visit of observation to Alvarado.

NNR 71.035 19 September 1846 the Cumberland Frigate on a reef

Shortly after closing my letter of the 28th instant, the Cumberland, Potomac and two of the schooners sailed from Green Island for the purpose of attacking the enemy's vessels in the river of Alvarado. In passing through the channel leading to the roads of Antonio Lizardo, I regret to inform you this ship, owing to a strong current, ran on the northwest part of a coral reef called the Chopas, in three fathoms water. This was about half past 4 o'clock in the afternoon.
The only event of importance which has transpired of late, is the loss of the U.S. brig Truxton on the bar of the Tuxpam river, about 130 miles northward of Vera Cruz. The intelligence was brought to the squadron on the 19th by the St Mary's that ship having picked up one of the Truxton's boats, with Lieutenant Berryman on board.

It appears that Captain Carpenter of the Truxton, wishing to get his vessel near shore to protect his boats while obtaining provisions, employed a Scotchman he had taken out of a Mexican prize to pilot him in, but who, whether by design or accident run him around on the 15th. On the 17th with the exception of Lieut. Hunter and a boats' crew she was abandoned by the officers and men, who went ashore to the number of about 60 in all, and surrendered themselves to the Mexican commandment.

THE ATTACK ON ALVARADO.

A correspondent of the New Orleans Picayune gives the following account of the affair:

"U. S. Steamer Mississippi,

Off Point Antonio Lizardo, Aug. 9, 1846.

"GENTLEMEN: The commodore has just made signal that letter bags will be sent to Pensacola, and as I may not have a chance again, I write now.

"Day before yesterday we all got under way and steered down to Alvarado for the purpose of attacking that place. We took our position, as did the Princeton also, and commenced firing; but the current running so strong that we were unable to spring the ship, we could only use our bow guns. The other ships, with the exception of the schooner, were not within gun shot. We found it useless to send the boat expedition, as we could not stem the current. Night came on and we stopped firing - The commodore said we would recommence next morning. When morning came, the signal was "come here again," and so here ends our first fire on the enemy. We shall not renew the attack until the arrival of the steamers Spitfire and Vixen. They drawing but little water, will be used to tow the boats across the bar. The schrs. Bonita, Pearl, and Reefer were lying in shore during the attack, and they received many discharges of musketry, which fortunately did no harm; but one of them left fly a shell and knocked a Mexican lancer, horse and all to the d--l. You will received more particular accounts by some of the newspapers and from the officers of whatever vessel takes this latter to Pensacola - for the commodore will not tell us what vessel is going to Pensacola, but I think it is the Princeton."

Gen. Zachary Taylor, having been detained from 10th May to 1st Sept. for want of material of transport, at length succeeds in purchasing 1,500 mules from Mexicans, loads with provisions and munitions, reviews his forces and advances towards Monterey

True, General Taylor has at length obtained supplies and means of transport which enable him to leave the Rio Grande and push after the enemy in the direction of Mexico, after having been detained for want of such provisions from the 10th of May until the first week of September. This sufficiently evinces that our Administration are not yet familiar with the difficulties incident to carrying on- or rather commencing a campaign in a foreign country.

NRR 71.038 19 September 1846 management of mules

The Mexican muleteers, assisted by the soldiers soon put things to right yesterday morning, and the train went on, the nose of each mule being tied fast to the tail of his predecessor. They cut a most ludicrous spectacle, a long train of mules, thus tied; it effectively puts a stop to their kicking and running away.

NRR 71.038 19 September 1846 march of Ohio volunteers from Matamoros to Camargo

The 1st and 2nd regiments of Ohio volunteers, six companies of the Louisville Legion, and the Baltimore battalion, arrived here today. They have been seven days on the march from Matamoros, and brought all the men but two to Catamargo. One of these died from an injury in the thigh, and the other died in convulsions soon after wading a lagoon. They suffered very much for want of water, and, to make it harder, and more dangerous for the men, their officers had the bad taste to march them by day instead of night. This proves that the Northern troops can stand the climate of Mexico nearly as well as those from the South.

NRR 71.038 19 September 1846 Col. William Selby Harney's expedition

Col. Harney left San Antonio on the 23rd of Jul with about 120 U.S. Dragoons, 500 mounted Texans from the Red River counties, and 18 Delewares in the United States service under Capt. Beaver. The Colonel was marching for Monclova, Mexico. This movement of Col. Harney astonishes General Taylor very much but we will soon know what he thinks of it. I guess Col. H will learn that his moving in advance of Gen. Wool (who is to take the same route) and that too, without any authority, saying nothing about his muster volunteers into the service on his own responsibility, will not meet with the approval of the commander of the army.

NRR 71.038 19 September 1846 Presidio occupied by "adventurers"

Letters from Monterey assert that a body of Americans, who came down by the way of New Mexico, were joined near the Presidio by a number of Texan adventureros, and the combined force entered the town without any opposition.

Mr. Kendall writes on the 22s ult., from Camargo, that the most authentic intelligence from Monterey represented that Mejia had 2,000 regulars and 3,000 raw recruits, all without money or shoes, and ill provided in every respect.

In the same letter Mr. K. announces that news had been received that Gen. Worth had reached a point one third of the way to Seralvo the morning of the 21st- all well.

An explosion occurred on board the steamboat Enterprise on the Rio Grande. This casualty occurred a little after daylight on the 21st ult., about forty-five miles above Reynosa. There were over 150 persons board and many in the immediate vicinity of and directly over the boilers who were scarcely injured.

For the satisfaction of those of our reader who have friends on board the Enterprise, we give the following list of killed and wounded, made out with great care, and which is no doubt correct.

Killed-- Enoch Tucker, A. Boswell, Tenn., Thomas Gaulney, N.Y.; second cook and a stranger name unkown.

Badly Wounded-- Lieut. Dearing of the Louisiana Legion; Wm. A. Cook, C.B. Cook, Tenn., Captain Woods, Wm. Grey, Jacob Bowridge, Thomas Eagle, Texas; J.C. Howard, sutler Baltimore; Joseph Grigsby, Mr. Hickey, sutler, Louisville Legion, Thomas Henepee, Samuel Martin, Patrick Kelly, Frank Tallant, deck hands; J. P. Clark, mate.

Slightly Wounded-- Wilton Cunningham, James Wilson, Tenn.; J. Wheeler, J. Humerick, Matthew Samson, Christian Coleman, Texas; Mr. Adams, sutler, Louisville Legion; Edmond Newell, clerk; Captain Kelsey, Conn.; Henry A. Emmons, mate.

We learn from a gentleman who lately arrived from the Falls of the Brazos that news reached that place a few days since that 2,000 of the mounted men from Kentucky and Tennessee had arrived at Robbins' Ferry on the Trinity. Several persons residing at the Falls immediately started to go to the Trinity to contract for furnishing beef and other supplies for the troops on their route to the Brazos. As no depot of military stores has been established between Robbins' Ferry and Bexar, it is probable that the troops will wait several days on the Trinity, until their horses can be recruited and teams procured to convey a supply of provisions to sustain them on the route."

Much curiosity as well as astonishment was exhibited amongst the officers at Camargo and at Matamoros, on learning that Col. Harney had advanced; crossed the Rio Grande and invaded Mexico without waiting for the arrival of General Wool.
General Kearney left the Fort on the 3d ult., for Santa Fe, in advance we presume of the main body of his forces. They remained five days at the Fort. The troops had lost about one hundred horses altogether, but were still in good spirits and willing to go ahead. The company of infantry reached the Fort two days before the mounted troops: they had not lost a man on the way, and were in excellent health. The whole regiment when he left, were on half rations and had but few days provisions them. The wagons taking supplies for them, were met some eight days behind them. [RWH]

The difficulties between Col. Stevenson and his regiment are not yet ended.- The colonel has chartered four vessels to take his regiment on to California- but as things look now, one will be amply sufficient unless he sails it very soon. The circuit court is crowded this morning with the parties and witnesses to a case of habeas corpus, which is to test the legality and validity of Colonel Stevenson's commission. General Sutherland continues to be the active instrument of opposition and perhaps will succeed in breaking up the enterprise. If he does not, it will fall to pieces of itself, most likely, under the operation of the new movement for peace. In either case a partisan of the government has been liberally rewarded and it is "all right." [RWH]

The disbanding of the volunteers. We have little said of the disbanded volunteers, about whom there has been so much effort to get up an excitement in New Orleans and elsewhere, because we had not the means of deciding for ourselves how far the war department had compromised itself in its correspondence, as it has been accused of doing, by engagements to receive and retain volunteers for a period of six months. We have always believed that the course of the department in disbanding these troops and sending them home, was in fulfillment of strict duty under the laws wherein there is no discretion allowed- nor have we had any doubt that it is for the benefit of the service and the interest of the country. These troops could not be retained lawfully for a less period than twelve months- and if they had voluntarily changed their term and reentered under new law for twelve months, they would have been, or at least some equal or larger number of these would have been supernumeraries in camp. Gen. Taylor has, without them, of the regular mustered troops, even more than he needs, and more than his means of transportation enable him to send forward. [RWH]

The four companies of volunteers called out at New Orleans, by Gen. Gaines, for Texas, without any orders from the war department; and without any occasion for their services, were paid $51,600 for three months services.-

"We take the liberty to say the assertion relative to the pay of the volunteers is wholly unfounded.- There is not one particle of truth in it. So far from receiving $51,600 neither the four companies nor any individual man of them has received on red cent of pay, from the general, state, or municipal government. It was not for pay or emolument or personal advantage of any kind, that those men volunteered their services to defend the country when it appeared to be menaced with invasion by the Mexicans, and it is hard that their proceedings should misrepresented to the public. What kind of encouragement is this for men voluntarily to leave their homes and endure the hardships of a camp for months in a distant region, at an inclement season of the year? They come back,, are paraded through the streets- display the skill in martial exercises which they acquire in the service- and are there dismissed without a dollar in their pockets - many of them not knowing where they shall obtain a pillow to rest their tired limbs, or procure a morsel of food to assuage their hunger. None of them, we believe actually suffered from either of these causes but if they did not, it was because they were furnished with food and lodging by the kindness of private citizens. It is a reflection upon the justice of our national and local authorities, that payment of these patriotic men has son long been deferred. Four months have elapsed since they returned from Texas, and this sacred debt has not been discharged. We say 'sacred' because it was incurred in a sacred cause and from honorable motives.

"The fact alleged that they went into the service without a call from the government, so far from being a bar to the validity of their claim to remuneration, strengthens it and makes it irresistible. Their service was voluntary and disinterested- and therefore its values is the mere enhanced and its recompense, as we first remarked, ought to be regarded as a sacred debt- a debt of honor, which concerns the whole country."

NRR 71.040: September 19, 1846 Terrible Riot

TERRIBLE RIOT. A very melancholy affair, little creditable to the discipline, order and character for civilization, which, in spite of all that has occurred during the present campaign, we are proud to say are the attributes of the volunteers, occurred near Burita, Rio Grande, on the 31st ultimo. On that day a steamboat took on board at Burita five companies of one of the Georgia regiments. A good deal of animosity had previously been exhibited by two of these companies, one against another; one of the rivals was an Irish company. From some circumstance or other, not explained, a row broke out in the evening between them-close proximity, we presume, producing hostile collision-and fire arms and bayonets and swords were very freely used. The Colonel of the Georgia regiment did all he could to put an end to this disgraceful affray; but so fierce was the conflict between the contending parties that all was unavailing although it is stated he shot one man and wounded two more with his own hand. While the battle was raging between these insensates on the deck of the steamboat, Colonel Baker, 4th Illinois regiment, ordered out companies A and G, commanded by Captains Roberts and Jones, to assist in putting and end to it. He then went forward. He then went forward at the head of twenty men, and urged the rioters to desist; but on his attempting to ascend the ladder of the steamboat, he was fiercely attacked by those on board, and after a desperate fight he was shot through the neck, the ball entering behind and passing through his cheek, prostrating him at once. His small party was obliged to retreat, having no ammunition with them, carrying off Colonel Baker senseless. Commissary Post, Sergeant Oglesby, and six men of the Illinois regiment were wounded-two mortally. Captain Roberts, company A, then attempted to board the boat, but, after a desperate conflict, he and his men were beaten off- Captain R. received a severe bayonet wound through the shoulders into the back, three in length. The affair having now assumed a serious aspect, Maj. Harris brought out the whole remaining force of the 4th Illinois regiment, well provided, with ball cartridge. At sight of this the rioters ceased their disturbance, when the Georgians were disarmed and put under a strong guard. Colonel Baker, who received his wound while fighting hand to hand with the Captain of the Irish company of the Georgia battalion, (also severely hurt), will recover, it is said, as will also Captain Roberts. There were thirty lying wounded on the boat and on shore on the morning of the 1st instant. Those who were killed outright, some eight or ten, were said to have been thrown overboard. An inquiry was to have been immediately instituted to ascertain the cause of his sad affair.

NRR 71.040(2): September 19, 1846 Health of volunteers

HEALTH OF THE VOLUNTEERS. The Louisville Courier says:"Some eighty volunteers who were discharged from the Kentucky, Ohio, and Indiana regiments on account of sickness, came up on the steamer John J. Crittenden."

The Lexington Observer of the 9th says--"Two of these volunteers belonged to this place and have arrived at home. Some of the Montgomery volunteers also passed through this city on their way home. They look to be in wretched health, and were discharged because of their supposed inability to do further service during the period of their enlistment. We understand they report a great deal of sickness among the volunteers. It may reasonably be inferred, however, that as they are now on the move, towards Monterey, the health of the men will be improved."

[JTW]

NNR 71.040(3): September 19, 1846 Illinois Volunteers

ILLINOIS VOLUNTEERS. The St. Louis New Era says- "About 20 sick volunteers returned to this city on furlough on the Corrine. They are sad specimens of the effects of disease, and some of them will scarcely survive. One volunteer named Escord, who had been suffering from fever, in a fit of phrensy, jumped overboard below Memphis and was drowned. There are said to be about two hundred of the Illinois volunteers at New Orleans in a lamentable situation, unwell and without money. -One of those men informs us that when he left the regiment they were twelve miles from Victoria in Texas, and on that day 260 of the Illinois volunteers were reported to be sick in camp, and unable to travel. Such are some of the practical results of war. A few heroes are made, but the mass of those who fill the armies suffer from privations and disease. We fear that many brave fellows will fall under the hand of inglorious disease during the present fall."

NNR 71.048 19 September 1846 difficulties with supplies for the Army of the West, arrangement of forces, depredations of Indians

Col. Kearney with a command of at least 1800 men, reached Fort Bent on the 30th of July, and left for Santa Fe on the 2d of August. All these men were mounted when they left Fort Leavenworth, except a few companies of infantry, which had preceded him from hence and arrived out before him. Absolute want of forage for his horses, obliged Gen. K. to push on immediately from Fort Bent, in hopes of finding food for them on the prairies. He had but a limited supply of rations, and these were extenuated by reducing the men to half rations.

"To all our inquiries,"says the St. Louis Republican of the 10th inst., "as to the prospect of forage for his animals at Santa Fe, we have received the same uniform answer; it was not to be had, except in very limited quantities- at the rancheros from ten to twenty and more miles from Santa Fe. In the whole department, the highest estimate of the surplus wheat is 7,000 to 8,000 bushels, and corn was so scarce as to make it worth, when it could be obtained at all, $3.50 per bushel. Such is the prospect presented for the support of the horses, mules, and cattle, which accompany the expedition."

A battalion of 500 Mormon infantry are marching in the general's rear, towards Fort Bent. These are followed by Col. Price’s regiment of mounted men, a thousand strong, and by Major Willok's battalion, consisting of five hundred mounted men. In the course of the present month, another regiment of infantry will be organized, and on their way, numbering at least one thousand men. And to these are to be added a thousand men, at least connected with the train of the army." Should they ever reach Santa Fe, the company will consist, in round numbers of forty eight hundred men; and with the teamsters and attendants of the camp, it will be swelled to six thousand. At least this number will, at all events, have to be subsisted and that subsistence must, beyond question, be derived from the United States."

NNR 71.048 19 September 1846 progress of President’s James Knox Polk’s "dispatches"proposing negotiations

"Those dispatches"- Mr. Habersham to whom is supposed the government entrusted the dispatches addressed "To the Mexican Secretary of Foreign Affairs,"dated 27th July last, we find has at length reached Commodore Conner, off Vera Cruz, by whom they were to be forwarded to Mexico. The New Orleans Picayune says, "If it did not evince a querulous spirit, we would say, that government carries travel to the tune of "take your time, Miss Lucy." We have been watching the progress of the messenger with some curiosity. He left the City of Washington on the 28th July-some days previous to the President communicating to the Senate in confidence, his having made pacific propositions to Mexico. Mr. H. reached Mobile on the 4th of August and proceeding thence to Pensacola, embarked on the steamer Walcott for Vera Cruz. The Walcott put back on account of weather and on the 13th we find Mr. H. at New Orleans- from whence, on the 19th he embarked for Brazos when he met with the Legare, on board of which he embarked for Vera Cruz and at length we have an account of his arrival there with his dispatches, which Commodore Conner the next day sent with a flag of truce to the city.

NNR 71.049 26 September 1846 mediation between the United States and Mexico proposed by Great Britain

From what has passed in the British parliament, it appears that their government did propose the mediation for a peace between Mexico and the United States, some time since. The Washington Union gave the public to understand that no such proposition had been made. The British minister states that the proposition was to such form as left it optional with our government to answer or not, and that no answer was given,- but that the offer has again been made, and in such a way as to require an answer.

NNR 71.049 26 September 1846 incident of Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna's passing the blockade, his reception at Veracruz

All counts say that Santa Anna was not received at Vera Cruz on landing with the cordiality which he had anticipated. Santa Anna proceeded to a hacienda some distance on the route, where he remained to recruit.

NNR 71.049 26 September 1846 doubts of reception by the Mexicans of an American minister unless forces are withdrawn, remarks of the "Union"

The impression derived from rumours at Pensacola, Mobile, and Washington, and which the public journals spread, was, that the Mexican Authority- for the time being had refused to enter into negotiations, unless the invading army was withdrawn. Others had it that they demanded an armistice as preliminary to receiving a Minister.

The last Washington "Union"however asserts that "the public journals are under erroneous impressions about the dispatches brought by the Princeton." Nothing can be inferred from this journal.

NNR 71.049 26 September 1846 French Journals

It is of some importance to notice, by the way, that some of the French journals are loudly complaining that the British ministry had not observed that cordiality which was to have been exposed from them, toward the French government, in a case where the interests of the two countries were so mutual, as in the arbitrating a peace between the United States and Mexico.

NNR 71.050 26 September 1846 debates in British Parliament, mediation explicitly offered

If that discussion had ended in rupture between Great Britain and the United States, our mediation, of course between the United States and Mexico would have been out of the question. The offer therefore, which was made to the United States was in effect this- that if the United States were disposed to accept the mediation of Great Britain that mediation would be frankly offered and tendered.

NNR 71.051 26 September 1846 letter on the capture of John Pine Bankhead and the Truxton

Having the honor of being a friend of your son's I take the liberty of addressing you to alleviate the solicitude of your family on the receipt of the news of the loss of his vessel, and the capture of her officers and crew by the enemy, with the exception of Lieuts. Hunter and Berryman.

The former gentleman informs me that your son was quite well when he left the vessel, and speaks in the highest terms of his conduct on the emergency.

I would also state that the officers are enjoying all the honors of war, and are residing with the Lieutenant Governor at Tuspan- a person very kindly disposed towards them- and that the province itself has declared for peace. As the Mexican Government are in our debt a number of prisoners, your son's detention must be a short one. Sincerely hoping that your son will shortly will be restored to you.

NNR 71.051-052 26 September 1846 loss of the Truxton on the breakers of Tuxpan

On the 16th a small vessel was seen standing to the port of Tuxpan, and Lieut. Hunter, with nine men, proceeded in the cutter to take possession of her. They forced their way through the breakers, and captured the vessel, which proved to be a Mexican schooner, with thirteen persons on board. After an unsuccessful attempt to board the Truxton, Lieut. Hunter anchored astern of the brig. On the morning of the 17th the brig hoisted flag of truce, lowered the dingley with sail battened over her, and cast her adrift. The current carried her through the breakers and Lieut. Hunter took possession of her. She contained some articles of provisions, and a letter to him from Commander Carpenter in the following words:

I have resolved to surrender the brig, and you are at liberty to use your discretion about going in. I shall as to have assistance sent to you immediately.

NNR 71.052 26 September 1846 Monterey (Pacific) surrenders

I wrote you from Monterey on the 6th of July, or shortly after, giving you a detailed account of the occurrences at this place. Fearing, however, that you may not have received it, I forward it to you by this opportunity, which will probably be the last communication you will receive from me, being now homeward bound.

On the 6th of July all was bustle in the cabin of the Savannah; some four or five men were busily employed writing letters, proclamations &c., preparatory to taking possession of California. It was long after the witching hour of midnight ere I was enabled to catch a short and troubled repose, as all was to be prepared by six o'clock the following morning, which came as bright and beautiful as a July day of our own favored island. At six A.M. Capt. Mervine came on board to receive orders, and at 7 he left with a summons to the military commandant to surrender the place forthwith to the arms of the United States, and also a similar summons to the military Governor for the surrender of all California.

At 9 A.M. of the 7th July, the expedition started from the Savannah, composed of the boats of the Savannah, Levant, and Cyane, and landed without opposition at the mole. The forces were then marched up a short distance to the custom house, where a concourse of the inhabitants were assembled. Here the marines and men were halted, and the proclamation read to the multitude by Rodman M. Price, Esq., purser of the Cyane, in a loud and distinct manner, which was received with three hearty cheers by those present. The flag of the United States was then hoisted by acting Lieut. Edward Higgins, immediately after which a salute of 21 guns was fired by the Savannah and Cyane. The custom house was then turned into a barrack for the United States forces, and everything settled down quickly.

Communications were immediately dispatched to Commander Montgomery, of the Portsmouth at S. Francisco, at which place, and at Zanonia, the U.S. flag hoisted on the morning of the 9th; and before ten days had elapsed the whole California, North of Monterey, was under the flag of the United States, much to the apparent satisfaction of the people; who hope it will last, knowing how much better off they will be under the Government of the United States.

NNR 71.053 26 September 1846 Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna's passport

The New York Telegraph states that they have received the following information exclusively, and that it is true:

Gen. Santa Anna, when the Arab was boarded by an officer of the St. Mary's was in bed. His handsome wife had risen a few moments previous to the officer's arrival, and sat in the cabin in a loose wrapper. A pass was exhibited to the officer, signed by the American Secretary of State, and of course he was allowed to proceed.

NNR 71.054 26 September 1846 "Union"repeats that the country is impatient for Gen. Zachary Taylor to "act", that he has mules now to enable him to advance, the "plan of the campaign has been concocted in a decisive spirit we ought no to doubt"&c., announces advances of the Army and that Monterey is probably taken

The Washington Union of the 14th says:

The last mails bring no very late intelligence from the army on the Rio Grande. The last dispatches from General Taylor state that the army will be on advance for Monterey by the 1st of September at the latest- perhaps several days earlier. - The country begins to be impatient for action. The heroes of the 8th and 9th May displayed such energies on those memorable occasions as could not but encourage the most sanguine expectations of a prompt and vigorous campaign. "Old Rough and ready"has become the soubriquet of the commanding general. We hope that he will realize the character in the end of the chapter. The General who leads the army into an enemy's country should be full of resources- "self-balanced, self-centered"- susceptible of the highest enthusiasm- capable of imparting it to all his followers-bold as well as active- confident of himself- exerting every means, and employing secondary substitutes, according to the circumstances in which he may be placed. Such, we hope, will prove to be the course of the brave commander and the gallant officers with whom he is associated. General Taylor, it is now understood, has the means of transporting in his bands- mules as well as wagons. We hope soon to hear of his rapid marches, and his victorious progress. The plan of the campaign has been conceived in a decisive spirit; and we ought not to doubt that the success of the results will correspond with the vigor of the design.

One rumor has lately prevailed for which we learn there is no sort of foundation. It came in the shape of a letter from Matamoros, about the 18th of August, and was published a few days ago in the "Baltimore Sun." It states that on the preceding night four hundred rancheros had broken into the town and created some confusion; that it was the commencement of the guerrilla mode of warfare, &c. The whole story was unfounded. It was an idle quiz, perpetrated upon the colonel of a volunteer force, which betrayed him into ridiculous blunders.

The Washington Union of the 16th says:

Dispatches have been received which agree, in the most material circumstances, about the movements of the army with the private letters. General Taylor, having sent forward the van and the body of the army, was to leave Camargo on the first days of the present month. A very experienced officer, who has the best opportunities of judging the course of events, expressed the opinion to us today, by this time General Taylor was in possession of Monterey.

We understand that no allusion is made to Colonel Harney in any of the dispatches just received. One would suppose that General Taylor was better acquainted with his GENTLEMEN: - "Thus far into the bowels of the land have we marched without impediment." The first Brigade, under General Worth, is now well on to Monterey, and the second, under Col. P. F. Smith, and third, under Colonel Garland, are expected soon to follow. - Captain May, with the second Dragoons and Major Munroe, with the Light Artillery, are to move forward in the same direction. These, with the Texans, Ohio, and Kentucky volunteers all under the command of Old Rough and Ready, will constitute an effective force of 7,500. But a portion of these, however, will proceed to Monterey, the remainder will be stationed at different posts in the rear, to guard them and preserve a communication with the supplies. This is not a pleasant service for those who are eager for the fray, but it can't be helped.

The want of proper means of land transportation is severely felt, although General Taylor has an effective force of nearly 15,000 men, not a single additional wagon has arrived, and the conveyance of baggage and accoutrements is effected exclusively by mules, of which come 1,500 or 2,000 have been hired or purchased from the Mexican. [Correspondent of the New Orleans Bee.

General Worth, with his command, arrived at a pleasant little town called Seralvo, at the foot of the mountains, on the 24th, where he will remain until the main body of the army approaches. It is about seventy miles from here. Colonel Smith is yet within a few miles of this point, but will advance immediately.

General Taylor expects to be at Monterey by the 15th of September, and in Saltillo, about sixty miles beyond, by the 1st of October. Whether any movement beyond the latter place will be made on this line of operations is unknown to the uninitiated. Whether we shall meet with any resistance, is a question upon which opinions are divided. It is certain there will be no resistance this side of Monterey, unless it may be a skirmish between small parties, and that is not very probable. Col. Hays in his tour, of upwards of two hundred miles, met no resistance. Gen. Worth has not seen any enemy. Single companies of Texan Rangers have traversed the country in different directions and me no opposition. Small parties of men have traveled different routes without interruption. So far, every thing indicates a state of quietude and peace.

At Montgomery we understand there is from three to five thousand men, almost in a state of disorganization, and deserting every opportunity. Gen. Mejia commands there. I doubt if there be any serious fight. The Mexicans have no army that can resist the one now moving against them. They are all excellent troops, and efficient in every respect.

'Col. Baker had just returned with a company of his regiment from the burial of one of their number, and, hearing the riot still progressing on the steamboat, he ordered..."
this company and one other to follow him to the boat, with the view of quelling it. In his attempting to do so, one of the officers attached to the Georgia companies engaged in the melee at once attacked him with his sword. They had been engaged but a few moments, when come cowardly villain among the rioters fired a pistol at him, which passed through the thick part of his neck from behind into his mouth, knocking out one of his teeth. Such is the report to me this morning from the assistant surgeon of his regiment. The wound is not this morning considered mortal, although last evening I did not suppose he would be alive at this time. He is more comfortable than could be expected, and we now entertain no doubt that he will recover. In addition to Col. Baker, Capt. Roberts was slightly wounded by a pistol shot. Capt. Post, acting commissary, slightly; Sergeant Helm, of company C, badly wounded, a ball passed directly through his body; Corporal Ursary very slightly; private Dillion mortally wounded with a bayonet—he probably will not live the day out; privates H. Martin, Shepherd, and Lee, all slightly wounded. This constitutes, as far as can be ascertained, all who were wounded in the third regiment of Illinois volunteers, and who acted under the command of Col. Baker in the effort to suppress this disgraceful and unpardonable riot. How many are killed and wounded among the two companies who were engaged in the riot on the Corvette I cannot ascertain with sufficient certainty to venture any statements.

[Letter to the New Orleans Delta. ]

NRR 71.056 26 September 1846 the march from Matamoros to Camargo, letter from "the sergeant"

After a twelve days march, I have arrived here well, although personal suffering and inconvenience have been with us all, more than you can possibly imagine. We have marched nearly eighteen miles every day, through a country of dense chapparal, the sun blazing upon us with an intensity of heat I never before experienced. But add to this a want of water, and such a condition and such a duty may well seem intolerable. We sometimes had not a drop of water for twenty and twenty four hours; and at others our relief was from drinking from the muddy pools which were found a hailed with a shout of delight upon the way. Were I to relate all, you would scarcely believe that human nature could endure such privation and exposure as I have witnessed. Out men have dropped from the ranks and sought shelter among the dry chapparal, careless whether they lived or died. The spot of their retreat has been marked, and when we reach water, a party has been dispatched to bring them in- and we made the march under these trying circumstances, without losing a man.

A hot sun- a breathless atmosphere- a thick chapparal- and no water; this is another picture of campaigning. In the last I gave you, we figured in water up to our necks, and w had a taste of that also. In the early part of the march we have just completed. On our way we killed several very large rattlesnakes; they are here in great numbers, but none of our men have so far been bitten. The reptile the most obnoxious our apprehensions is a very poisonous species of spider which very often proves fatal to the poor bitten. I witnessed a few nights ago the sufferings of one of our men from this cause; his agony was so great as to wring from him the most piercing screams; I am glad to say, however, that he recovered.

We have been very fortunate so far; the health of our men is upon the whole very good, and they stand the climate better than any other regimen here. Indeed, amongst the others it appears to me that the drum is continually beating the funeral note of some poor fellow who has just been "planted."

The other day a wagon of the Kentucky baggage train, passed over the fleshy part of the leg of one of their men; mortification ensued, and he was a dead man by morning. Several instances of this character have had the effect to confirm an opinion the wounded in such a climate, is but a passport to the grave; gangrene seems so sure and sudden. Our doctor is now getting ready to take off the foot or toes of one of Captain Piper's men, who was run over by the same train. But I give you these details to interest, not to alarm you that you may have definite idea about our whereabout and true condition. It is all in a man's lifetime you know, and what is to be will be. For my own part, I am happy enough. It is just the life I wanted to have a taste of, and I am by no means disposed to relinquish it.

When we left Barita, we marched through a lagune, nearly a mile of which the water was up to our armpits; I don't know that was ever more amused in my life, and it would have been an odd and ludicrous sight could connoisseur of fun have perched upon us. Imagine to your mind's eye, three men, feeling their way, wading and swaying here and there, holding their musket high over head to preserve them from the water, while now and then some unlucky fellows would souse into a hole, and tumble over out of sight, until he could scramble up or be hauled out by his comrades. Our baggage train numbered ninety-nine wagons, each drawn by six mules.

On our march from Matamoros, we were overtaken by a horse express, one of Captain May’s men, dispatched after us by Gen. Twiggs, with information that intelligence had been received at headquarters, that Canales would make an attack on us so as to cut off our baggage train. If you could have seen the Baltimore boys then! The blood was up to fighting heat in a minute - a perfect thrill of extacy accompanied the intelligence as it ran along the lines. Every musket was thoroughly examined, and all were anxious for an introduction to Canales and his army. But, alas! And alack a-day, their homes were blighted, and no Canales with his men appeared.

I am really beginning to be fearful myself that we shall have no fight. I would like to have on chance on a battlefield, if it were to only see how I should feel. There is nothing like a practical insight into human nature, as it exists in one's own breast. But I am almost certain we shall have no fighting to do. We are, however, still destined to proceed, "onward", is the word, to Monterey. We are not to have our baggage train; all our trunks are to be left behind. Provisions, air munitions, and all necessary articles are to be carried on packed mules. The route to Monterey is long, and I am told by one of our guides very difficult. Let it be ever so difficult we will let Gen. Paredes see that while war lasts, our determination to march through Mexico will never be abandoned. We have here something like twenty thousand men, which is rather more than enough to beat all the troops Mexico can bring into the field.

NNR 71.056 26 September 1846 operation of the Army of the Center, preparations to advance on Chihuahua, San Antonio de Bexar occupied

Gen. Wool is up early and late, and is fast bringing the volunteers into form. He is still in town, but, tomorrow or next day, will pitch his tent, with the troops in Camp Crockett, as will every officer whose constant business does not make it necessary to remain in town.

I have no doubt that the general will take possession of the capital of Chihuahua some time in the month of October. The distance to the Rio Grande is calculated at about 140 miles, and from there to Chihuahua 450 miles, making our march 600 miles, over lovely country.

The Kentucky and Tennessee cavalry, it is supposed, will join Gen. Taylor's command. They have as yet, not arrived. Gen. Wool's force will amount to about 5,000.

Since writing to you on the instant Capt. Washington's company of the 4th United States artillery arrived here from Carlisle, (Pa). They entered the city yesterday, and passed through in full uniform with four 6 pounders and two 12 pound howitzers, with their caissons, traveling forge, baggage train, &c, which made quite formidable appearance for this part of the country, and much astonished the Mexicans here, they never having seen so great an artillery displayed in an army, and believing nothing could equal that of the Mexicans. They encamped on the San Pedro, about two miles from the city.

NNR 71.056-057 26 September 1846 Army of the West, additional regiments mustered into service, paid, and discharged

The St. Louis Republican of the 8th says: "Major A. D. Stuart, paymaster of the United States army for this district, we understand will leave today for Fort Leavenworth, to pay the companies compromising the regiment of infantry now forming there to join Gen. Kennedy. They will be entitled, we suppose, to a year's clothing, and traveling expenses from the place of enrollment to the place where they are mustered into the service. If we are correctly informed, Major S., is anticipating what he supposes will be the orders of the proper department, and to do so, we understand has raised the money from the Bank of Missouri, upon his own drafts.

NNR 71.057: September 26, 1846 Missouri regiment dismissed

ANOTHER COUNTERMAND. - Letters were received at St. Louis on the 12th instant, from the war department, notifying the United States officers at St. Louis of the determination of the government to dispense with the services of the regiment of infantry called for by the requisition on the governor of Missouri of 18th of July, and which regiment had nearly all, assembled at Fort Leavenworth. The order directs that they shall be mustered out of services as speedily as possible, either at Fort Leavenworth, or any other point where they may be. They will, or course, receive pay for the time which they may have passed in service, for traveling to Fort Leavenworth, and, we presume, six months long.

NNR 71.057(2): September 26, 1846 Letter from a volunteer, artillery

FROM BENT'S FORT. - The St. Louis New Era has the following extract of a letter from a volunteer in Major Clark's artillery company:

Fort Bent, August 9, 1846.

"We are not encamped exactly at the fort, but about nine miles this side. Our intelligence is very limited as regards our future course, the officers seeming to consider that the dear people have no use for information. The impression is we shall start after resting eight or ten days to recruit horses and men, they are both in almost a universally use up condition, though there are not a great number actually laid up by sickness-in all, in our company, about ten. There is great complaining about a want of provisions, the men actually not receiving more than about half as much as they can eat. The issue to be made in the future of coffee is to consist of four tin cups for the entire company for 24 hours. One company lately attacked a provision wagon and took therefrom all they wanted; and their example may be imitated. Some of the companies, I believe, have less or nothing to complain of."

NNR 71.057(3): September 26, 1846 Disappointed volunteer

A DISAPPOINTMENT. - One of our citizens, a youth of remarkable courage and consistency, and indomitable perseverance, left this city some years ago for Texas, where he became distinguished in the military service. He was here, last spring, looking for an appointment in the mounted regiment, in which he was promised a captaincy. Being here, he was designated and employed by the government to carry the Santa Fe traders the intelligence of the war with Mexico. When the Texas senators were informed that he had undertaken the task, they pronounced that would be rash in the extreme for Capt. Howard to undertake the enterprise without an escort. But the captain did undertake and execute it with entire success. He returned to this city, a few says ago, and found that he had lost his captaincy, there being no vacancies-and the war department cut down his allowance for his energetic enterprise one half. [Washington corres. of the N. Y. Commercial.]

NNR 71.057 26 September 1846 New York California expedition delayed

New difficulties have broken out amongst California volunteers at Governor's Island, New York. On the 18th the regiment was marched to the guard house to receive their bounty money previous to embarking. The men of company C- the first company marched up- refusing to pay the prices charged for the clothing, viz: $5 for jackets, $3 for pants, and $1.50 for caps. They were willing to pay a fair price, but were confined for insubordination. Company A then came up and refused. They were marched back to their quarters; and confined to their tents. Col. Bankhead, finding the refusal general, told them they would be compelled to embark without their pay-which they preferred to taking the clothing at the prices charged.

NNR 71.057 26 September 1846 Col. Jonathon D. Stevenson’s effects seized, difficulties later resolved

Col. Jonathon D. Stevenson- A motion, we understand, was yesterday made for the appointment of a receiver of the property and the effects of this gentleman, upon a creditor’s bill filed against him, in which N. Dane Ellingwood was complainant.- The motion was granted. Will not this stop his supplies from the government? He is under bail, which was put in upon his arrest under a writ of ne excal, to stay within the jurisdiction of the court.

NNR 71.057-058 26 September 1846 letter from an officer at Matamoros

The main body of the army having advanced to Camargo, I am left here to follow on a few days with some of the rear parties. This leaves a few idle hours on my hands and it will be interesting for me to occupy them with a narration of facts and fancies that come within my observation or that pass through my brain: I only hope that it will be equally interesting for you and those around you to read these random thoughts strung together in a random manner.

I have seen many letters, dispatches, communications, &c. from Washington, and also letters from this place to the press of the United States, having the Mexican troops, affairs, country, and people as topics; but all that I have seen, has impressed me unfavorably as regards to the knowledge received by the one class of writers, and that intended to be conveyed by the other. Something, therefore, on these subjects may be interesting. My information and opinions addressed in the following manner: Shortly after arrival at this place I received the General’s permission to take a room in town. My next door neighbor, Don is a fair representative of the most worthy class of Mexicans- well educated, well acquainted with history, and statistics of his own country and those of the United States; at the same time, without energy, enterprise or industry; bigoted as a Catholic, yet opposed to the priests as republican opposed to all the recent military Governments, and as a patriot opposed to the Americans. I was called upon almost daily to protect his family from the unceremonious visits or the rude treatment of the volunteers, so that an intimacy was soon established between us: he was pleased to see me in his house, he and his wife and sister took pains to teach me the language, and we were soon on the most amicable relations; and enabled to interest each other in conversation. From the Mexicans one meets in the streets nothing is to be learned, except probably some isolated fact. They are polite and cold- Enter their houses, which you can seldom do without intrusion, and you are treated with a still more cold civility. From the Americans and Irish merchants could learn but little of the true character of the people. They are better acquainted with the state of trade, and geographical facts, and with the mere present temper and opinion of the people. But in this family I learned that feelings exist and opinions are entertained which I neither saw nor heard else, here. For more than two months I have been intimate with this family, and have been a daily visitor, and I have always found them consistent- warm impulsive feelings, weak judgment, and weak character.

The province of Texas extended say they, to the Nueces, and the conquest of Texas extended no further. On the east bank of the Rio Grande, and as far in the interior as the Arroyo Colorado, Mexican families resided- Mexican customs, and Mexican laws prevailed. Texas presumed to lay claim to the Rio Grande and by force of arms of the United States possessed themselves the country. This they say was ungenerous, unjust, and mean; as a powerful people did wrong to a weaker one; under the cloak of a shallow claim. The presence of our troops upon the Rio Grande they looked on as an invasion of their country; when we get among finer and more intelligent race of men. As a nation they are peculiarly given to hope for something better. They are satisfied to see things as they are; they can see no way by which they are to be improved, and are unwilling to make an exertion to improve them; and yet they hope and sincerely expect that things will turn out better.- They do not believe yet but their troops are superior to our regulars; and, as for the volunteers, they consider them as useless being undisciplined. They explain the defeat of the "Resaca" in different ways; the Ampudia men say that Arista sold the army; others say that Ampudia acted as a traitor. There is no doubt but that Ampudia demoralized the army much by his seditious talk, both to his officers and men.

They believe that their cavalry is the best in the world; all that they want is good horses; provided with these; they will be enabled to break any square or line of infantry. In their own fights, the cavalry ride over the infantry. They believe moreover that in May's charge the whole merit was due to the horse - that they ran away with the riders and carried them much further than intended. In want of other arguments, they fall back upon the history of their revolutions, when rude and undisciplined masses drove from this country the regular troops of Spain. Their first position is to doubt if we will be successful against equal numbers, and they calculate with certainty on our falling before superior forces. Second, that the great disadvantages we will labor under when in the interior of the country, far removed from our supplies, that these difficulties will defeat us, without the agency of Mexican troops. Third, that though they may be beaten, still they will not be conquered; they will have to continue the war three years, when we must be defeated by our own expenses. That these opinions are held is proved in other ways. We can get the services and property of these people for the money, but we have not got their good will.

There is another circumstance that will make our military success unavailable: the want of stiffness in the nation. If they had a commerce for this war to destroy; if they had an internal industry which it would interrupt, or if the people possessed luxuries and comforts of which they would be deprived, there would then be something to operate against, and by which we could move the people. We could be as the whirlwind in the forest - leave the desolation of war around us. But, constituted as Mexico is, our visitation will be as the tempest in the prairie: for a moment we will agitate the grass that is in our track, but leave no impression behind us. The country is without commerce, industry or institutions; the people are without comforts, and are armed with a panoply of vanity and pride which is bullet-proof. They have but to step aside and let the storm pass, biding their time to set. And, should it not come, they will still smile complacently as they reflect that this tempest, which had done them no harm, has at least been expensive to their enemies.

Nothing can be more uncongenial to their feelings than the idea annexation, or of living under American laws. They recognize the superiority of our institutions; they see that property is protected, that industry is promoted, that our people are not the sport of yearly revolutions, nor victims to the exactions of a ruthless and starving soldiery. They wish that their institutions and laws could be the same, and that they could have the same chance of being a happy and industrious people; but they want it among themselves. But, with annexation to the United States, they see not their amalgamation with our people, but to their own extinction. They see their religion sunk from the high position it now holds they will have strange laws and strange customs thrust upon them; they will see their lands pass from their hand through some deficiency of title, of which they are now happily ignorant; they will have the wild restless population from Texas and the valley of the Mississippi for neighbors, whose contempt for all law is supreme, and whose disregard of the decencies of life, and of property, and of life itself, is notorious. No its better for us to wait, say they; time may improve our Government, or we may be enabled to set up one for ourselves. At any rate, whatever disorders we have we must submit to; we have still our own religion, our own people, our own lands, and our own laws and customs, and no advantage which we might gain from annexation to the United States can compensate us for the loss of these. Such is the spirit and feeling as expressed by themselves, and is demonstrated by their acts. How will this affect our military operations? We must expect to find no party in our favor, no gratuitous information or assistance - every thing reluctantly given, even for high prices, whereas the Mexican General will be informed of all the particulars relative to us which he may desire to know. They will offer no resistance to our progress, and probably will cause us but little annoyance to our supply trains and our foraging parties; for although imbued with the feeling of bitterness and hate, they still want the courage and enterprise of the Spanish guerrilla to make them formidable. Should, however, occasions present themselves where there would be but little risk and certainty of escape, and booty to be acquired they would not fail to make the trial; and if successful would make it a bloody triumph. Should disaster happen to us, then would they be about us.

So much for General Arista. Ampudia did all he could to destroy Arista and, I think was gratified at the results of the two fights.

NRR 71.058-060 26 September 1846 Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna's proclamation from Veracruz for the regeneration of the republic

Vera Cruz, August 16, 1846. MEXICANS: Called by the people and the garrisons of the departments of Jalisco, Vera Cruz, and Sinaloa, South Mexico, and other points of the republic, I quitted Havana on the 8th inst. at nine in the evening, with the sole object of coming to aid you in saving our country from its enemies, internal and external. Great has been my joy, when, on arriving at this point, I learned that the former had been overthrown by your own forces; and that I was already proclaimed, on all sides, as general-in-chief of the liberating army. A proof of so much confidence will be met by me with the utmost loyalty; but on accepting the plan proclaimed, allow me to enter into some explanation, which I consider necessary, in order to dispel any suspicions founded on a past, the recollections of which are so painful to me.

Desiring to consolidate peace in the interior of the republic, in order to make it flourish and prosper, and to assure by that means the integrity of our immense territory, I devoted all my efforts, in consequence of the events of 1834, to establish an administration endowed with vigor and energy, and capable of keeping down the spirit of turbulence and discord. Without ever going beyond republican forms, I endeavored for this purpose to support myself on property, on high position, on creeds, and even on the few historical memorials existing in our country; hoping thus to moderate, by the inertia of conservative instincts, the vehemence of popular masses. But without ascendancy and prestige, as I was, and the elements assembled by me being viewed with distrust, resistance was made on all sides; which, however, expected to overcome in time. I call on God to witness, that in this I acted with patriotism, with sincerity, and with good faith.

After some years of trial, I began to remark that the republic did not advance; that some departments showed tendencies of separation from the others; and that the public discontent was daily increasing wavering then in my convictions, they afterwards lost all their power, when a part of the country had been occupied by strangers, and our national existence of the, whole was endangered. I called on the people to the rescue, and they answered me with threats; as if any other misfortune could have been preferable to that in which the country then was placed. Urged by the firm determination that we should be a sovereign and independent people, and knowing, on the other hand, the vast resources on which we could rely for support, I then became convinced that our government, being organized in a manner by no means conformable with the wishes of the nation, and governed by secondary legislature, not adapted for the advancement of its interests, the people revenged themselves in that way, by seeking for an occasion in which they should be called on to take care of their own good, and to organize their government in a manner which they should consider most proper.

In our time, we have seen another nation, in a similar conflict employing similar means to oblige its government to promise the representative system which it was anxious to have established, and when that had been obtained, we have seen its moral apathy changed into heroic enthusiasm against the foreign invader who endeavored to subjugate it. Is there anything, therefore, strange in the idea that our people should, in this instance, do as much to recover the full enjoyment of their sovereignty, acknowledged by all governments, though trodden under foot by all, in the practical administration of affairs? On this point I owe to my country, in consideration of the part which I have taken, to declare frankly and honestly, upon this critical and solemn occasion, that it can be saved only by a return to first principles, with entire, submission of the minority to the sovereign will of the majority of the nation. Upon proof so clear and peremptory, of the serious difficulties attending that which I had considered best calculated to secure to the republic respectability abroad, I found it right to recede, and to yield to public opinion, and follow it with the same ardor and constancy with which I had opposed it before comprehending it. To discover the most effective means of raising the spirit of the public, and predisposing it to the war, with which we were threatened on the north, was my employment; and I was beginning to develop the measures for that purpose, when the events of the 6th of December, 1844, occurred, and plunged the republic into the miserable situation in which you now see it.
Expatriated from that time forever from the national territory, with a prohibition to return to it under the hard penalty of death, the obstacle which I was supposed to present to the establishment of an administrative system, conformable with public exigencies, being removed, I believed that the men who had succeeded in placing themselves in my stead, by calling public opinion to their aid in effecting it, would respect that opinion, and summon the nation to organize its government according to its own wishes. Pained, as I was, not to be allowed to take part in the real regeneration of the country, I still most sincerely desired it; because I believed that whilst our political horizon was daily becoming darker, no other means was left to save us.

My prayers for this were redoubled, on seeing that, in consequence of the development of the invasive policy of the United States, stimulated by the perfidy of the cabinet of General Herrera, on the serious question of our northern frontiers, the European press began to indicate the necessity of a foreign intervention in our domestic concerns, in order to preserve us from the ambitious projects of the neighboring republic. That, however, which raised my uneasiness to the greatest height, was to see in a newspaper of credit and influence, published in the old world, a proposition made in October last, to bring us back, by force, under the yoke of our ancient masters. My conviction was, nevertheless, still strong, that no Mexican, however weak might be his feelings of attachment for his country, would dare to favor such ideas openly, and still less to recommend them to the consideration of the people.

Meanwhile, news reached me of a revolution projected by General Paredes, which revived my hopes; for though he had been the determined enemy of every representative popular government, I supposed that he had altered his opinions, and I honored him so far as to believe him incapable of advancing schemes for European intervention, in the interior administration of the republic. He succeeded, and his manifesto declaring his adhesion to the plan proposed by the troops quartered at San Lus Potosi, increased my uneasiness; because I clearly saw in it a diatribe against the independence of the nation, rather than the patriotic address of a Mexican general, seeking, in good faith, to remedy the evils of his country. His perverse designs were, in fine, fully revealed, as well by his summons [for the assemblage of congress] of the 24th of last January, issued in consequence of this revolution, as by the newspapers showing the tendency of his administration to the establishment of a monarchy, under a foreign prince, in the republic.

As one of the principal chiefs of the independence of our country, and the founder of the republican system, I was then indignant at this endeavor of some of its sons to deliver the nation up to the scoffs of the world, and to carry it back to the ominous days of the conquest. I thereupon took the firm determination to come and aid you to save our country from such a stain, and to avoid the horrible consequences of a measure by which its glorious destiny was to be reversed, carrying it back to what it was, and to what it never should be again. To execute this determination, was to offer up my blood to any one who, in case of failure, might choose to shed it, in compliance with the terms of the barbarous decree which drove me from the republic; but I preferred to perish in this noble attempt, rather than appear indifferent to the ignominy of my country, and see the countless sacrifices made for our independence, and the right to govern ourselves, all rendered illusory.

Mexicans: The real objects of those who, while invoking, order and tranquillity, have constantly endeavored to prevent the nation from organizing its government as it chose, have now been laid open; and the time is come when all true republicans of all parties, the body of the people as well as the army, should unite their efforts sincerely, in order to secure entirely the independence of our country, and to place it at liberty to adopt the form of government most suitable to its wishes, each sacrificing his own individual convictions to the will of the majority. How, indeed, can the minority, however wise, opulent, and powerful they may be, pretend to assume to themselves the right to regulate the affairs of the community, or to govern the majority, without an express delegation from the latter, given of their own accord, not presumed, nor still less extorted by force? This may be among people who are ignorant of their own rights, and where the want of the means of independent subsistence subjects the many to the few, who have monopolized everything; but it is not to be effected among us, in whom the democratic spirit, in the midst of so many favoring circumstances, has been developing itself for thirty-six years, and now renders imperious and decisive, the necessity of concentrating by practice, the political axiom of the sovereignty of the nation.

This most essential circumstance has been disregarded and despised in all the constitutions hitherto given to the country; and in the only one which has appeared most popular, the antagonism of the principles adopted, has rendered it ineffective; so that democracy, which alone can serve as a solid basis for our social edifice, has been unable to develop itself, and thus to afford the peace which is its instinctive law, and the other ineffable benefits which it produces. Hence the convulsions which have so long agitated us, and of which some European writers have taken advantage, so far as to depreciate our race; opposing the liberty and independence of the republic; manifesting the necessity of interference, in order to strengthen it against the febrile invasion of the United States; and declaring, in fine, that it would be as easy to conquer Mexico with a portion of the troops now quartered in the island of Cuba, as it was in the time of the native Mexican princess. My blood boils on seeing the contempt with which we are thus treated, by men who either do not know us well, or who, interested in transplanting among us the fruits of their old social systems, and of the times in which they originated, consider America in the same state in which it was in the sixteenth century. Should any attempts be made, as indicated, to carry these mad plans into effect, all interests of race would be silenced, and but one voice would be heard throughout the continent. The one hemisphere would then be seen arrayed against the other, and for the disasters each would fall on the rash aggressor who should thus attempt to interfere with the internal administration of other nations, he alone would be responsible.

To pronounce thus against the many nations which form the great Hispano-American family, to declare them incapable of enjoying republican institutions is, in fact, to be ignorant of the conscience, which is proved by the testimony of Chili, New Grenada and Venezuela, in contradiction of such assertions. It is to attribute, no doubt with evil intentions, to men of a certain race, defects of administrative forms, which, not being entirely democratic, have produced the bitter fruits of the monarchical forms, engrafted on them, without adverting to the fatal influence of the latter on the lot of the others.

To expect, moreover, to strengthen the nation by monarchy, under a foreign prince, is to suppose the existence in it of elements for the establishment and maintenance of that system; or that, wearied by its struggle, to conquer its liberty, the nation signs for European masters, or for anything else than the peace, which alone it wants. Erroneous, most erroneous indeed is this idea. In the efforts of the nation to emancipate itself from the power of the few, who, in good or in bad faith, have endeavored to rule it in their own way, its democratic tendencies have acquired such a degree of intensity and energy, that to oppose them, to attempt to destroy the hopes to which they gave birth, by a project such as that advanced, would be to provoke a desperate measure; to endeavor to cure an evil by the means calculated to exasperate it. Fascinated by the example of a nation not yet a century old, and which, under its own government, has attained a degree of prosperity and advantages not enjoyed by those of the Old World, notwithstanding their antiquity, and the slow progress of their political systems, our republic aspires only to the management of its own affairs, either by itself, or through representatives in whom it has confidence, in order to develop the vast resources of power and wealth in its bosom.

This being therefore its dominant, its absorbing idea, it would have resisted the other plan with all its might and if an attempt bad been made to change its direction by the employment of foreign bayonets, it would have flown to arms, and war would have burst forth throughout its immense territory, renewing even more disastrously the bloody scenes of 1820 and the succeeding years. From such a state of things, the Anglo-American race would have derived great advantage for the progress of its ambitious schemes, or for forming a new republic from our interior departments, by exciting their sympathies and gratitude for the services rendered them in repelling a project no less injurious to itself. This tendency, which has been excited in some departments by disappointment from not obtaining provincial liberties, which they desired, would have become general throughout all; and no force would have been able to restrain them from carrying such views into effect.

On the other hand, the republic being composed for the most part of young men, who have no knowledge of the past, except from the sinister accounts of their fathers, and who, educated with republican ideas, rely with confidence on a government eminently popular, to lead their country to prosperity and greatness--- where are the internal supports which monarchy presented as the means on which our salvation can be founded? That which has disappeared, habits of passive obedience no longer exist; and if there remains a sentiment of religion, time has undermined the political power of the directors of consciences. An influential aristocracy, so necessary for the permanence of monarchies such as exist in old Europe, the only proper place for institutions of that class, is not to be found, nor can it ever be organized here. In Europe, the misery of the great mass of the overloaded population, which depends on its own labor to obtain what is strictly and merely necessary for its subsistence, in the midst of an industry which is so severely tasked, allows no time to the people to think of their political rights, nor means to free themselves from the tyranny of the patrician families, on whom they depend, all the landed property being in their hands. But no such state of things can be found in our republic; in which all is uncultivated, virgin, rich, and fruitful, offering to man, in the utmost abundance, and with the greatest facility, all that he can ask for his labor---all that can lead to that individual independence which favors the development of democratic instincts.

These difficulties being, therefore, of such a nature as to render nearly impossible the establishment of monarchy in our country, attempts have been made, in order to overcome them, to throw the affairs of the republic into the greatest disorder, preventing the organization of its government within, and aggravating the most serious question of our northern frontiers with another nation.

In this manner the faction which fostered that parricide project, having attained the first of its ends by many years of artifices and maneuvering, next proposed to carry the second into effect, by provoking, in a manner almost direct, the government of the United States to aggrandize itself by taking our rich department of Texas, and then advancing into the very heart of our country. To involve our people in the evils of a fearful invasion, has been its last resource, in order to force them to accept its painful alternative obliging them either to become the prey of Anglo-American ambition, or to fly, for the safety of their national existence, to monarchical forms under a European prince.

For this object it was that this party, having the control in the chambers of 1844-45, refused to the government of that period the appropriations which it asked for maintaining the integrity of the national territory, already seriously jeopardized. It did more: it raised up a revolution, in which the slender allowances made to the government for that object, on its urgent demands, were unblushingly declared to be suppressed; and, on its triumph, it scattered the means collected for the war, and hastened to recognize the independence of Texas. The chief of this revolution, who has always acted under the influence of his own fatal inspirations, then appeared again in insurrection at San Luis Potosi, with the force destined for the defence of the frontiers; and withdrawing that force to the capital of the republic, he there usurped the supreme power, and began to put in operation his scheme of European intervention in our interior administration, whilst the hosts of the Anglo-Americans were advancing to take possession, even of the banks of the Rio Bravo. Having at his disposal considerable forces in the adjoining departments, he allowed the enemy time to advance, without resistance, through our territory; and at length—most tardily—be sent to Matamoras a small body of troops, needy, and unprovided with anything necessary for conducting the campaign with success. Who can fail to see, in these perfidious maneuvers, the bastard design of attracting the forces of the enemy to our central territories, in order there to propose to us, in the midst of the conflicts of war, as the only means of safety, the subjection of the republic to servitude, the ignominy of the country, the revival of the plan of Iguala---in fine, the return to the government of the viceroys.

With this object, and for this fatal moment, which every means was employed to hasten, was a congress assembled, chosen for the purpose, composed only of representatives of certain determined classes, not forming even a sixth of our population, and elected in a manner, perfidiously arranged, to secure a number of voices sufficient to place the seal of opprobrium on the nation. Leaving, with scarcely a single representative, the great majority of the nation, the eleven bishops of our dioceses were declared deputies, and our ecclesiastical cabildos were authorized to elect nine others on their parts, giving to the bishops the faculty of appointing such proxies as they might choose, to take their places in case they should not find it convenient to attend in person. Does not this prove abundantly that a decided endeavor was made to supplant the will of the nation, in order to give some species of authority to this scheme of European intervention in the settlement of our internal affairs?

The protestation of republican sentiments made by General Paredes, after these irrefragable proofs so fully condemning him, were only new acts of perfidy, intended to tranquilize the republic, to set its suspicions at rest, and to arrange the occasion for carrying into effect his base designs. He uttered these protestations in the middle of March last, when he saw the public discontent manifest itself against his powers and his plans. But what followed? Did he not continue to protect the Tiempo, a newspaper established in the capital itself, for the sole object of rendering republican forms odious, and recommending the necessity of a monarchy; advancing every argument which could be supposed calculated to lead astray the good sense of the nation? Did he convene another popular congress? Did he retract the summons which he had issued in January, placing the fate of the nation at the mercy of the few men who remain among us of the old colonial regime? Everything continued in the same way; and, when the press was prohibited from discussing forms of government, it was in order to give an amnesty to the writers in favour of monarchy, who were then prosecuted by the judicial power, and to encourage them to continue their criminal publications, while silence was imposed on the defenders of the republican system. Meanwhile he hastened, by every means in his power, the assemblage of the congress destined to carry into effect his monarchical plan; he concentrated his forces, in order to suppress all movements on the part of the people, alarmed by the neat, approach of such an unpropitious event; abandoning our frontiers to the invaders, or rather surrendering them to the foreign enemy, by the reverses which he had prepared and arranged at Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma.

No, Mexicans! let there be no compromise with a party whose conduct has been a tissue of cruel treachery towards our country; have nothing to do with it, however flattering be its promises, and whatsoever the forms with which it may in future invest itself.

In the last convulsions of its agony it sought to assure its safety by its accustomed maneuvers. It proclaimed principles which it detested. It allied itself with bastard republicans, and exhibited itself as the friend of liberty, in order, by that means, to avoid its just punishment, to maintain itself in power, and to continue to undermine the edifice cemented by the illustrious blood of the Hidalgos and Morelos.

The fraudulent schemes of the enemies of our country being thus unfolded, and the true source of its misfortunes being laid open to all, the radical remedy of the whole evil consists in putting an end for ever to the ruinous control of minorities, by calling on the nation honestly to fix its own destiny, and to secure its territory, its honor, and its welfare. Thus placed in entire liberty to act, as it should be, in the midst of the discussions carried on by the press, in the tribune, and even in the streets and squares, it will take into consideration the evils which surround it, and seek the means of resisting them and satisfied in its desires, mistress of its own fate, it will display the energy peculiar to a free people, will prove equal to the conflicts in which it is to be engaged and will come out of them, not only honorably, but moreover, entirely regenerated. In this way, the administration, established, resting on, and springing from public opinion, may display all its organized forces, to maintain our territory, instead of quartering them in the central towns, as hitherto, under a government created by seditious movements, constantly at war with the nation, and occupied solely in endeavoring to save itself, without regard for our external dangers.

Fellow-countrypeople, never has the situation of the republic been so difficult as at present. Its national existence threatened on one side, on the other an attempt has been to subject it to the hardest of all lots, to European dominion. Such is the abyss to which we have been brought by the endeavor to govern our young society according to the system adopted in the old. This is the true cause of the long struggle in which we have been engaged, which has weakened our forces, and by which the interests of the majority have been sacrificed to the extravagant pretensions of a small minority. This state of things must be ended, in compliance with the wishes of the nation; and by opposing to the former, the Union of republicans of true faith, the concert of the army and the people. By this union we shall conquer the independence of our country; thus united, we shall confirm it by establishing peace on the solid basis of public liberty thus united, we shall preserve the integrity of our immense territory.

But now, with regard to the plan proposed for revolution, it is my honor and my duty to observe, that by limiting the congress therein proclaimed to the organization of the system of government, and the determination of what relates to the serious question of our northern frontiers, the provisional government of the nation would find itself required, until the system has been thus organized, to use its own discretion on all other points. This would be investing the provisional government with a dictatorship, always odious, however imperious might be the circumstances rendering it necessary. I therefore propose that the said assembly should come fully authorized to determine with regard to all branches of the public administration, which may be of general interest, and within the attributes of the legislative, power; the provisional executive of the nation acting with entire submission to its determinations.

I consider it, moreover, indispensable that a uniform rule be established for the regulation of the interior affairs of the departments; and that for this purpose the constitution of the year 1824 be adopted, until the new constitutional code be completed. By this means we shall avoid that divergency of opinions, at this critical moment, when uniformity is so much needed; the national will which sanctioned that, code will have been consulted, and the executive of the nation will have a guide to follow, so far as the present eccentric position of the republic will allow. I submit both measures to the will of the departments, expressed by the authorities, who may be established in consequence of the revolution; proposing, moreover, that the provisional government of the nation should adopt forthwith the second, as the rule of its conduct, until it be determined otherwise by the majority of the departments, in the form already indicated. The slave of public opinion myself, I shall act in accordance with it, seeking for it henceforth in the manner in which it may be known and expressed, and subjecting myself afterwards entirely to the decisions of the constituent assembly, the organ of the sovereign will of the nation.

Mexicans! There was once a day, and my heart dilates with the remembrance, when leading on the popular masses, and the army, to demand the rights of the nation, you saluted me with the enviable title of soldier of the people. Allow me again to take it, never more to be given up; and to devote myself until death, to the defence of the liberty and independence of the republic.

NNR 71.065: October 3, 1846 LATEST FROM THE ARMY OF OCCUPATION.

Advices reached New Orleans, on the 21st from Brasos St. Jago.

Capt. Murray reached Camargo on the 8th Sept. post haste from Gen. Worth's camp at Seralvo, 60 miles from Monterey. McCullouch's rangers had come into camp with intelligence that on the 4th, about 40 miles from Seralvo, they discovered a body of Mexicans, who retired as the rangers advanced until the latter discovered a body of 800 to 1000 men. They ascertained the Mexicans to be in force, and probably designed to attack General Worth before the army arrived.

Capt. Murray met General Taylor, with a part of his force, some distance in advance of the main body, and within 35 miles of Seralvo, on a forced march to its relief. Captain Murray thought it highly probable that a battle was fought on the 8th. The Mexicans it was said had determined to make a strong resistance between Seralvo and Monterey. The forces of Ampudia and Arista were co-operating, and their numbers now said to be 8000, were accumulating rapidly, the Mexicans rallying to their standard from all quarters. Monterey is said to be well fortified.

Santa Anna, Ampudia and the Governor of Tamulipas, have issued proclamations which have been received at Camargo. The proclamation of Ampudia makes the penalty very severe upon all who may furnish provisions, assist in transporting provisions, or in any wise aid the Americans. It prohibits them from holding any intercourse or carrying on any trade with us. Death and a confiscation of property are the penalties for disobeying the order.

General Taylor issued an order on the 10th instant, at Camargo, forbidding any American citizen to locate in Camargo without a written permit from the General. No goods would be permitted to remain, and no person not connected with the Army suffered to stop in Camargo.

Intelligence from Point Isabel, of the 16th instant, states that two Mexican spies had been arrested at Camargo and hung. It is also stated that a party of Americans on their way from Camargo to Matamoras were attacked by some Mexicans, and one American and six Mexicans killed.

At Matamoras col. Clark was shot at while sitting in his room. It was ordered that all Mexicans be deprived of their arms, and none should either go out of the city or come into it without the written order of the commander.

There appears to be a vast deal of sickness at Matamoras and other towns on the Rio Grande. The McKim brought over 250 invalids to New Orleans, a number of whom were admitted into the Charity Hospital.

NNR 71.066 3 October 1846 curiousty respecting reply received by government from Mexican government, speculation thereon, hopes of a peace diminished, the "Union for going to war in earnest, another campaign required.

The government paper at Washington preserves a silence not easily accounted for, in regard to the nature of the reply received by the president from the government of Mexico, provided the general impression derived from other sources to be correct as to the tenor of that reply. Granting that state policy would frequently, especially during a state of war, render the promulgation of dispatches improper, yet it is difficult to perceive how such a reply as it is said the government has received, could be that of character. Not only public curiosity, but an immense amount of public private, and individual interests could relieve the anxiety incident to these involvements, so that the future might be duty attend to by all, is so obvious a duty that we are bound to presume that government has some motive for the silence in this case, however much it may puzzle us to conceive what that motive can be.

From information derived from our other sources, the impression has become fixed, however, that the authorities of Mexico instead of replying definitely to the proposition of President Polk, have alleged that their executive has not the adequate authority to act in the premises, and that until their congress shall assemble in December, they are compelled to defer an answer.

This resolves itself at once into a decision that war must be continued.

NNR 71.066: October 3, 1846 Gen. Stephen Watts Kearny marching for Santa Fe

"The Army of the West,"under Gen. Kearney, was at the last authentic intelligence from thence, in full march for Santa Fe, with more than ample force for its occupation. A report had arrived at St. Louis that General K. had taken Santa Fe without opposition, but it was believed to be premature.

NNR 71.066(2): October 3, 1846 The Mormon Battalion

Not only more than adequate force to take possession of, but many thousands of "settlers"intending permanently to occupy California, are far on their way towards that region. From one of those parties that started prior to the commencement of the Mexican war, we have in the St. Louis Republican of the 21st September, the following gloomy account:

"The Mormons. We have a most dismal account of the condition of the Mormons who undertook to migrate to California, but stopped at a place agreed on between them and Col. Allen, when the latter was desirous of raising a battalion of infantry from among them. They were to locate on the Platte river, and there to remain for an indefinite period of time. They attempted to raise a crop for their subsistence, but failed to do so, and have abandoned the Platte, and are now at Bellevue, on the Missouri river, near the Council Bluffs. -They are said to be in a starving condition, and nothing but the aid of the government, during the coming winter, will save many of them from death. President Polk, it is understood, some time ago dispatched an agent to their camp, to inquire into their condition--probably with a view of granting them some relief--and he is said to have returned to this city on the General Brooke."
NNR 71.066 3 October 1846 prizes taken by a Mexican privateer

Captain J. H. Rodney of the brig F. L. Vail, arrived at St. John’s, N.B. from St. Martins, reports that on the 23d of July, he saw Mexican privateer with three American vessels, prizes, passing by the Island of St. Martins, apparently bound through Sombrero passage.

THE REGIMENT OF INFANTRY, which had just assembled at Fort Leavenworth and about the marching of which so late in the season anxiety was awakened, at last received their pay and outfit, and had no sooner done so, than an officer arrived with orders from the department for their immediate discharge. The expenses incurred in raising, subsiding, clothing, supplies, and transports for this corps is estimated at between ninety and one hundred thousand dollars.

NNR 71.067 3 October 1846 intelligence from John Charles Fremont, &c.

We have received communication by which we learn that Mr. Toplin arrived at Independence September 11th, direct from the Sacramento river, where he left Capt. Fremont on the 3d of April last. Capt. Fremont had received no news of the war, but was intending to remain where he was until he received further orders from the United States, which were daily expected.- Our reader will remember that he was ordered out of the country, but did not intend to go until he was ready.

Mr. Toplin was at Bent's Fort on the 18th of August, Gen. Kearney and all of his troops had been gone some days. He met at Col. Price's regiment at Pawnee Fork and Col. Price himself at Pear Spring, with the remainder of his command. They were all in good health and getting on well. The Mormon battalion was at Council Grove on the 20th August.

NNR 71.067: October 3, 1846 The Army of the Center ready for Chihuahua march; Col Harney arrested

THE ARMY OF THE CENTRE, under General Wool, at the last dates from his headquarters announced to between 3 and 4000 men; were nearly ready to commence the march for the Mexican province of Chihuahua.

Colonel Harney, with his mounted dragoons, returned from his excursion into Mexico, without surprising Monterey, as some seemed to apprehend that he had done or might do, and without, so far as we can perceive, having achieved anything from which laurels can be culled. Three of his men were killed by the Mexicans on their route back. His corps will probably form the advance of Gen. Wool's division, which will consist altogether of over 5,000 men.

It was stated in some accounts that Col. Harney had returned in consequence of orders that effect from Gen. Taylor, and that he was under arrest and would be court-martialed, but the account has been contradicted.

NNR 71.067 3 October 1846 hospitals crowded at Camargo and Matamoros

There were 600 sick volunteers in the hospital at Camarago, and they dying very fast. So many were sick, that it required nearly a whol regiment to attend them.
Those whom the Tennesseans left behind, seemed particularly unfortunate, for they had to call on the Alabamians to attend the living and bury the dead. As fest as men get able to leave the hospital, they are discharged and sent home. In fact, Gen.
Taylor has a disposition to discharge all volunteers who are discontented and whish to return to their homes. Though the number of patients in the hospital at Matamoros is larger than at Camargo, the mortality is greater in the latter place-near three to one. Those who are accustomed to a southern climate, when once prostrated by the fever seldom regain their former strength on the Rio Grande, without a change of atmosphere. - They die off quickly, else become so enfeebled that they are unable to help themselves. A person who has visited the hospitals at the different posts has said that if one-half of the western and northern volunteers who went to the Rio Grande are effective men on the 15 th of October, it is more than he looks for.

NNR 71.067 3 October 1846 doubts expressed by the "Union" as to the accounts of "desertions"

In reference to the above and to previous accounts the Washington Union says.- The news which reached us from the army, on Saturday night through the New Orleans papers, is not to be received without many grains of allowance. No dispatches have been received for the three last days; but if it is not difficult to see that the last rumors from the army have come to us through reporters who have imparted hues of too dark a complexion to their stories. We do not credit this report, for example, that when General Taylor arrives at Seralvo, he intends to tarry for dispatches from Washington. It would have been far more consistent with a tactician to have remained at Camargo near to his depots, than to have gone on with provisions for 12,000 troops for 30 days, and then pause upon his march to consume his rations and receive his dispatches. We do not believe it. The reports of sickness, too, are probably extravagant- though it would not be surprising if at this season of the year, under new circumstances so trying to unacclimated constitutions, some hundreds of sick should be found in an army of more than 20,000 people.

[NRR]

NNR 71.067-068 3 October 1846 letter to relative campaigns, munitions, supplies, &c.

Before this reaches you I presume you will have known whether Mexico has declined our offer and is unwilling to receive a Minister from the United States or not. It is said here that Princeton; which arrived few days since at Pensecola, brought the reply of the Mexican Government to our proposition, and all the private letters received here from Vera Cruz and the city of Mexico unite in saying that our offer has been politely declined; the reason assigned is that the Executive Government do not feel authorized to act, and that it rests with the Supreme Congress, which does not meet until December.

When Mr. Polk, upon his own responsibility, brought on this war, I wrote you that neither the Administration nor the people were aware of the job they had undertaken. The former has found out this secret some time since, and the people are finding out very rapidly, and, before many weeks or months have elapsed, will have their eyes fully opened on the subject. Probably there is no man in the country so heartily sick if the war, or more sincerely desirous to get rid of it than Mr. Polk and never was an Administration placed in such a false position as he is at present. When he commenced it he thought he could swallow up Mexico at a single mouthful; that, so soon as she heard of the 50,000 volunteers and all the regular army she would "cave in" at once, and sue for peace on any terms; instead of which, after we have spent millions and millions of money, have collected all our military force on her frontiers, ready to advance from different points into her territory and cover her coasts with our fleets- whilst the cloud of war has thus gathered over and is ready to burst upon her, we offer to treat and to send a Minister for the purpose. She very coolly says, in so many words, to us, "we are very sorry you are so soon tired of the war; we are very comfortable ourselves; it has thus far done us no injury, or created any extra expense; and beg leave to decline receiving any Minister from you." The fact is, Mexico is impassive; she cannot be struck in a vital place; the natural obstacles of the country and the total absence or limited nature of the supplies will prevent a large army from penetrating to the capital, or near it, and the plan of doing so from the Rio Grande is peculiarly absurd, even if it were to succeed, as the distance is double what it is from the seacoast.

Gen. Taylor will no doubt reach Monterey and will find a city of non-combatants, and the object of the campaign no further advanced than at Matamoros. We may take some of their seaports, but that is of no material consequence, as Mexico has but little commercial trade, and none that is of any advantage to her, as it is all done by foreigners, and in foreign ships; and as to taking possession of her frontier towns or provinces, it is very acceptable to the inhabitants, as our army, by their immense expenditure, is enriching the country by consuming every thing they can furnish, and paying four prices for every article. As to the manner in which the war has thus far been conducted, utter ignorance, waste and extravagance, have marked all the arrangements connected with it here at home, and has consequently had corresponding effect on the condition and movements of the army; and in nothing has there been grosser or more palpable errors that as regard to the means of transportation, and a volume might be filled with details. At this moment our levee is incumbered with wagons intended for Gen. Taylor's army, lying day after day, with all their fixtures exposed to a sun which raises the thermometer to 130 degrees; and mules bought in the Western country, and brought here at great expense, are being shipped by vessels which receive $3000 to $5000 freight for the run down to the Brasos Santiago, carrying 100 to 150 mules each; many of which perish on the voyage from want of proper care, and the usual risks of a sea voyage, and one half of those landed will die from not being acclimated. One of these transports recently embarked 127 mules here and landed 22; the remainder died or were thrown overboard in a gale; and all this is done when far better, more serviceable and acclimated mules can be bought there at $25 each. All this, however, is but a mere item in comparison with other arrangements, and particularly with the arrangements connected with the inland expedition to Santa Fe &c.'

The following anecdote, among other things, shows what were the views and expectations of the Government as to the present war: A field officer of the army, now with General Taylor, told me, when passing through here, that he was in Washington last spring when the first news arrived of hostilities, and Congress adopted prompt measures for the war; he was conversing with a prominent member of Congress, the chairman of an important committee, which brought him in constant and confidential communication with the Government, of which he was an ardent political supporter and this officer was stating his views as to the most efficient plans for prosecuting the war against Mexico; and, after he got through doing so, added that if this plan was followed he thought the war might be brought to a close by January next. "January!" said the chairman in reply, and with much astonishment; "Well, sir," said the officer, "if such are your expectations, the sooner you being to get the money ready to buy her off the better."

NNR 71.068 3 October 1846 departure of New York California Expedition

The Commercial Advertiser of the 28th says- The California Expedition is off at last, shorn somewhat of its numeric force, as it has long been almost wholly of its moral. Its departure had been signalized by a prolongation of that un happy compound, made up almost equally of misfortune and misconduct, which has attended it from the beginning; and it requires no very abiding or superstitious faith in omens to believe that the issue will be useless and inglorious, in strict conformity with the inception and progress.

August 18. Gen. Kearney proceeded through the pass and at 5 pm reached hill that overlooks Santa Fe.

Major Clark's artillery was put into line, and the mounted troops and infantry were marched through town to the Palace (as it is called) and his staff dismounted and were received by the acting governor and other dignitaries and conducted to a large room. The general gave the assurance of safety and protection to all unoffending citizens. The stars and stripes were hoisted on the staff which is attached to the Palace by Major Swords. As soon as it was seen to wave above the buildings, it was hailed by a national salute from the battery of Captains Fischer and Weightman, under the command of Major Clark. While the general was proclaiming the conquest of New Mexico as a part of the United States, the first gun was heard. "There," said he, my guns proclaim that the flag of the United States floats over this capitol. " The people appeared satisfied. The general slept in the palace. (we democrats must call it the governor's house.) One company of dragoons ws kept in the city as a guard and the business of the day was ended.

Sir- By a decision of the honorable secretary of war, each soldier is entitled to 'six months' clothing to the amount of $21- all over that are to be charged with. There will be other charges of which you will be informed by this office. You will please consider this letter your guide in addition to the one you received from me of the 31st ult.--Jon M. McCalla, second auditor

Sir- I have the honor of acknowledge of receipt of two favors from you, one dated 31st July, the other 8th August. I can only answer by a yarn.

A countryman of mine was one indulging in the very intellectual occupation of sucking fresh eggs raw and reading a newspaper. By some mischance he contrived to bolt a live chicken. The poor bird chirped as it went down his throat and he very politely observed- "Be the powers, my friend, you spoke too late."

I can only say, sir, that your favors have reached me too late. They have been chasing me through the Mexican Post Offices; that is, to express myself more clearly, when I receive them, they (the letters) were down in Mexico and I was up here, and when I didn't receive them, they were up here and I was down there.

The fact is that most of my men have been paid off, and are now scattered to the four corners of the globe. They were mostly sanors, as I was myself. From them (if there be charges) nothing can be expected. The camp and garrison equipment has been turned over to the proper officers, with the exception of sundry axes smashed and placed hors du combat in chopping down there amiable chapparals on the banks of the Rio Grande. I except, also, the camp kettles and pans, many of which were used up in roasting, boiling, stewing, and frying our pork and beans, bacon, and fresh beef, not to speak of the slow venison, which some were nurtured enough to call Mexican beef (may the Lord forgive them).

For my own responsibility in the matter I regret more on Uncle Sam's account than on my own, that I am not worth a continental dime. I have been not only paid, but I believe over paid by about $40. My conscience compelled me to remonstrate with the Paymaster but they assured me that they made no mistakes. I considered their feelings and indulged them. However I am gonna make good on the money. I gave it to the sick and damaged soldiers.

Most of the other Captains are in the same fix as myself (barring the overpay) about the responsibility refer to my epistle as an answer.

If you have any further enumerations for me please direct the entire case to Major General John Davis V. Orleans. I seldom go to the Post Office cause I have nobody to correspond with, and yet I am not the man who never had a father nor mother, but was won at a raffle-Captain G.H. Tobin.

NNR 71.083 10 October 1846 General Stephen Kearney's proclamation at Santa Fe to the inhabitants of New Mexico

As by the act of the republic of Mexico, a state of way, exists between that government and the United States, and as the undersigned, at the head of his troops on the 18th inst. took possession of Santa Fe, the capital of the old department of New Mexico, he now announces to hold the department with its original boundaries (on both sides of the Del Norte) as a part of the United States, and under the name of the Territory of New Mexico.

The undersigned has come to New Mexico with a strong military force, and an equally strong one is following close in his rear. He has more troops than necessary to put down any opposition that can possibly be brought against him, and therefore it would be folly or madness for any dissatisfied or discontented person to think of resisting him.

The undersigned has instructions from his government to respect the religious institution of New Mexico, to protect the property of the church, to cause worship of those belonging to it to be undisturbed, and their religious rights in the amplest manner reserved to them. Also to protect the persons and property of all quiet and It is the wish an intention of the United States to provide for New Mexico a free done the laws hitherto in existence will be continued until changed or modified by competent authority, and those persons holding office will continue in the same for the present, provided, they will consider themselves good citizens and willing to take an oath of allegiance to the United States.

The undersigned herby absolves all persons residing within the boundaries of New Mexico, from further allegiance to the republic of Mexico, and hereby claim them as citizens of the United States.- Those who remain quiet and peaceable will be considered as good citizens, and receive protection.- Those who are found in arms, or instigating others against the United States, will be considered as traitors, and handled accordingly. Don Manuel Armijo, the late governor of this department has

NNR 71.087 announcement of the "Union" that the effort to negotiate peace is to be abandoned and more coercive measures pursued, comments of the "Intelligencer" thereon

There can no longer be a question that the refusal of the Mexican Government to accept our propositions for peace, instead of relaxing our own measures will stimulate our Government to a more vigorous prosecution of the war. We must bring its pressure home to the people of Mexico. We must make them feel the evils of the war more strongly, in order that they may appeal to their own Government for peace. It cannot be denied nor concealed that new energy is to be infused into our operations; and the strength of the national arm is to be put forth more efficiently than ever.

When the army of occupation became the army of invasion, and our victorious banners were planted on the right bank of the Rio Grande, with the view of the conciliating people of Mexico, it was proclaimed by the commanding General, under instructions from his government, that our armies were to respect their private property; and that they were to take nothing and receive nothing which was not to be paid for.- We were anxious to soften the horrors of war in every respect and to conduct it upon the most liberal and refined principles. We had even determined to dispose with the rights which the Laws of Nations fully recognized." Instead of th pillage of the country and defenceless places a custom has been substituted more humane and advantageous to the sovereignty making war. I mean that of contributions. Whoever carries on a just war, has a right of making the enemy's country contribute to the support of the army, and towards defraying all the charges of the war. We waived these rights in every sense of the term. But what has been the result? It is shown in several articles which have appeared in New Orleans papers, and in letters from the officers of the army. We republished one of them the other day from the columns of the 'National Intelligencer'. It seems certain that our forbearance has not been appreciated by the Mexican people, and that, not content with receiving fair value for their productions, they have demanded exorbitant prices, whilst their hostility to us has remained undaunted. Officers ask, how can you expect to make it the interest of such people to terminate the war? The experience of the lst five months strengthens the argument.

71.087 10 October 1846 departure of Gen. Thomas Sidney Jessup to take personal command of the quartermaster's department

So much complaint has been made, and so many difficulties experienced, that we rejoice to find from the Union of the 2nd, that "Major General Jessup, Quartermaster General, left Washington this morning for the frontier of Mexico, to take upon himself the general direction of the affairs of his Department in that quarter. This step has been taken with a view to provide for every exigency without the delay and inconvenience which sometimes result from warning instructions from Washington, and in order to secure the utmost clemency and economy to the measures of that Department. We understand also, that when General Jessup left Washington he had recently purchased two excellent steamboats on very moderate terms, for the operations of the Rio Grande, in order to have the high freights which were demanded for the transportation of our stores. Other appliances have been recently adopted, which will save much expense and contribute most effectually to the transportation of the necessary means of our army.

NNR 71.088-71.089 Conditions of the volunteers on the Rio Grande

VOLUNTEERS ON THE RIO GRANDE---A letter from a member of the Louisville (Ky.) Guards, to his brother in Louisville, written at Camargo, Mexico, September 1st says--
There are not so many sick as we have had, but the cases are generally of a more fatal character, being bilious fevers, which, being very violent, if not reduced in a day or two prove fatal. We have lost some six men since we have been here. Every day you can hear the roll of the muffled drum, and it casts gloom over the countenances of all. There are many going home from disability to perform military duty.

In a letter of Aug. 25, he says--

The day after the date of my last, the six companies of the Legion, whose lot it was to walk, took up the line of march for this place, (via Matamoras)--The country through which we passed is generally low and marshy. After going about four miles, we came to a Lagune, two miles wide and about two feet deep, mud and water. Being heavily laden with our clothes and provisions, the men suffered a great deal, a good many fainted, and had to be carried out by others. One man, belonging to the Baltimore and Washington regiment, died a few minutes after getting out.

The water decided the distance of our marches throughout. The march on the 18th I will recollect long as life lasts, not so much for any suffering I had to undergo, as for what I saw. We made twenty-five miles; the first ten was accomplished early in the morning and without a halt. At the end of the ten we had tolerable water, and rested two hours. ---It had been determined to go to the next water; the march was through a sandy prairie, with occasionally a few miles of chapparal; in the latter the heat is suffocating; they are not high enough to make a shade, and too thick to admit a free circulation of air. The troops were scattered along the road for ten miles in perfect disorder. By dark we came to a muddy pond of filthy water which served to quench our thirst. A great many did not get into camp, till past midnight; some had to be brought in the wagons. We pitched no tents, but tumbled down upon our blankets without taking off any of our equipment.

Thursday August 13- Started at 12M, Col Doniphan’s regiment in sight as we left the camp. We soon met the spy company, who, with his small party, had captured four Mexicans well mounted and armed. They summoned him and his party to surrender, but the captain told them that he thought their safest plan was to surrender to him.- They prudently consented to do so. They acknowledged themselves sent to ascertain who were.- They were made prisoners.

One of the Mexicans who was taken day before yesterday, was disarmed and sent forward to his village, distant 24 miles, with letters and proclamations. He promised to meet us tomorrow. At eight miles, we came to the establishment of a Mr. Wells, an American. He had an abundance of horses, mules, and cattle. With him was another American who had been sent from Santa Fe by an American merchant of that place, to inform Gen Kearney that the Mexicans were 10000 strong and had determined we were fifteen miles outside of Santa Fe, at a deep ravine.

The Americans at Santa Fe and other towns are very much alarmed for their safety. The Mexicans tell them that if defeated, they will return to their towns and villages and get full revenge on them.

All of this is news communicated to us in a heavy rain, and we are encamping in the midst of it. No little excitement prevails in camp. To retreat nine hundred miles is idle; and if they do met us, as they promised we shall vindicate the character of the Saxon blood in death or victory, Mark that! General Kearney is as cool as if walking to his office on a May morning to attend his accustomed garrison duties, and all look to him as to a man, who has shed glory on the American name. It is sad here that Governor Armijo is opposed to the fight, but is urged on by the rich men of the country; yet the latest accounts are that the rich are backwards in lending their money. But if 10,000 men are assembled they must have furnished the means. There is a Mr. Bonny living near this place, he visited us, and gave us a fat slicer. This is the first settlement we have met. The place is called "Moro." Two beautiful mountain streams meet here, each is sufficient size for milling purposes. The artillery came up at sundown. At this place the road by the Simerone comes in.

10 October 1846 rumor of design to call out volunteers to assail Veracruz, amount of the forces now in field operating against Mexico

There are various informations afloat, that it is the intention of the president to call out the residue of the 50,000 volunteers authorized by the late act of congress, for the city of Mexico, by way of Tampico or Vera Cruz

17 October 1846 review of the progress of the campaign

We have nothing from the Gulf Squadron or from the Pacific Squadron since our last. The intelligence which has reached us from General Kearney's division of the West, is that he is in quiet possession of Santa Fe, is busied in fortifying it, and in preparing for the movement of the one half of his forces to take possession of Upper California and penetrate to the Pacific, whilst the other half will proceed a view of forming a junction with General Wool.- The regiment of infantry that had just assembled at Fort Leavenworth for the purpose of reinforcing Gen. Kearney, has been paid off, and are discharged.

From "the Army of the Centre,"General Wool's division, we have but little further. An arrival from Galveston brings a letter which says:- "The Kentucky regiment under Colonel Marshall, numbering about 800, is encamped at the mouth of the Lavaca, with 200 men on the sick list owing to the fatigues of a long march. This regiment had just received letters to march forthwith to Camargo. The Tennessee regiment is daily expected. Neither of these regiments were intended to join Gen. Wool.

NNR 71.100-101 17 October 1846 Monterey attacked, defended for three days, surrenders to Zachary Taylor, armistice concluded, incidents

The morning of the 20th was devoted to reentering, and determining a plan of attack. In the afternoon General Worth's division marched by a circuit for the rear of the city and engaged that night between Monterey and Saltillo.

Captain Eaton one of the aids to General Taylor, left Headquarters, now at Monterey, on the 25th and reached Washington City on the 11th inst, bringin official accounts of the battles which took place between the 19th and 25th and the terms of capitulation were agreed upon.

The opportunity which Gen. Taylor so generously afforded Gen. Worth to cut the first laurels from the field,- we should say heights, that commanded Monterey, was worthy of both officers- and right gallantly did Gen. Worth improve the opportunity,- and as gallantly have those under his command seconded his daring.

NNR 71.101 17 October 1846 official dispatches announced by the "Union"on the battle of 22d Sept.

We lay before our readers this evening the official dispatches of General Taylor detailing the heroic and victorious onset of our army upon Monterey.- They bear the most ample and honorable testimony to the gallantry, the skill, and the patriotic self devotion of our officers and soldiers. In this respect, the intelligence from Monterey fully responded to the high wrought expectations of the country. Regulars and volunteers- through three days' battle alternately under a burning sun and drenching rains, against a foe strong in all overwhelming superiority of numbers, and in the advantages of a position so strongly fortified as to be apparently almost impregnable- seem to have vied with each other, their gallant leaders, in efforts noble and chivalrous daring. The result is a triumph every wasy memorable in military annals. In three days our army has carried intrenchments which the enemy had expected to maintain against any exhibition of military force on our part, and in which they probably stored, on the calculation, a large magazine of provisions. The Mexicans re thus driven from their chosen strong hold, and one of the strong keys of Mexico is now in our hands.

NNR 71.102 17 October 1846 report on the battles of the 23d September and 25th September, correspondence and articles of capitulation of Monterey INCOMPLETE

Sir: At noon on the 23d instant, while our troops were closely engaged in the lower part of the city, as reported in my last dispatch, I received a flag, a communication from the governor of the state of New Leon, which is herewith closed,- To this communication I deemed it my duty to return an answer declining to allow inhabitants to leave the city. By eleven o'clock P.M. the 2d division which had entered the town from the direction of Bishop's Palace, had advanced with in one square mile of the principal plaza, and occupied the city up to that point. The mortar had in the meantime, been placed in battery in the cemetery within good range of the heart of the town, and was served throughout the night with good effect. . . name.

The light batteries, one of which is commanded by Lieut. Mackalf, were now drawn upon the slope of the ridge, and the howitzers opened upon the height of Palace Hill.. A few shells only were thrown before the enemy commenced firing with a 9 pounder from the height immediately over the right of the column, aiming at Duncan's batteries. The several regiments took positions, and a few more shells were thrown towards Palace Hill, but did no execution. The 9 pounder continued to throw its shot, with great precision, at our batteries, one ball falling directly in the midst of the pieces, but fortunately hitting neither men nor guns. Finding his batteries thus exposed, and unable to effect any thing, Col. Duncan removed his command to a rancho about a half a mile further up the Saltillo road, where Gen. Worth took up his position, after ordering the foot regiments to form along the fence, near the point of the ridge. The artillery battalion, 5th, 7th, and 8th infantry, and the Louisiana volunteers remained in this position about two hours, directly under the fire of the enemy’s guns, (now two.) The balls fell directly in their midst all this time without wounding a man! The Mexicans manage their artillery in battery as well as the Americans do. This I believe is now conceded by every officer.

At half past 10 the column moved toward the general’s position. At this time Capt. McKavett, of the 8th infantry, was shot through the heart by a nine pound ball, and a private of the 5th infantry was so severely wounded in the thigh that he died the next morning. About fifty Mexicans now appeared upon the hill side, over the moving column, and fired at our troops some hundred musket shot, without doing any harm. The division deployed into the positions pointed out, and remained an hour or two, when Capt. C. F. Smith, of the artillery battalion; with two companies (his own and Capt. Scott’s) and four companies of Texan rangers on foot, were ordered to storm the second height. This the gallant officer cheerfully undertook, and was followed with enthusiasm by the officers and men of his command. It was considered on all sides to be a most dangerous undertaking, and this party was considered emphatically a forlorn hope. That the height would be taken no one doubted, but that many brave fellows would fall in the attempt seemed inevitable. The distance to be climbed, after reaching the foot of the hill, was about a quarter of a mile; a part of the way was almost perpendicular, and through, thorn bushes and over sharp-pointed rocks and loose sliding stones.

The 7th infantry, commanded by Capt. Miles, was ordered to support Capt. Smith’s party, and by marching directly to the foot of the height, arrived before Capt. Smith who had been ordered to take a circuitous route. Capt. Miles sent up Lieut. Gantt with a detachment of men, upon the hill side, to divert the attention of the enemy from Capt. Smith’s command, which could not yet be seen. The 7th had already sustained a heavy fire of grape and round shot, as they forded the San Juan, which winds around the foot of the height, which fell like a shower of hail in their ranks, without killing a man. Lieut. Gantt’s party were greeted with grape and round shot, which cut the shrubs and tore up the loose stones in the ranks without killing any one; but the gallant young officer came within an inch of being killed by a cannon ball, which ranked down the steep, and filled his face with fragments of rock, dust, and gravel. This fire was accompanied by a constant discharge of musketry, the enemy covering the upper part of the hill side, but the detachment continued to move up, driving the Mexicans back, until they were recalled. Capt. Smith’s party now arrived and moved up the hill, the Rangers in advance, and did not halt for an instant until the Mexicans were driven from the summit.

Whilst this was going on, Col. Persifer F. Smith, who commanded the 5th and 7th infantry- the 5th, with Blanchard’s Louisiana boys, under Maj. Martin Scott, had been ordered to support the whole, gave orders for these commands to pass around on each side and storm the fort, which was situated about half a mile back of the summit on the same ridge, and commanded the Bishop’s Palace. Such a foot race as now ensued has seldom if ever been seen; the Louisiana boys making the tallest kind of strides to be in with the foremost. Capt. Smith had the gun which he took on the height, run down toward the breastworks and fired into it. Then cam Col. P. F. Smith’s men, with a perfect rush, firing and cheering- the 5th and 7th and Louisianians reaching the ridge about nearly at the same time. The Mexicans fired at them with grape, but it did not save them or cause an instant’s hesitation in our ranks.- Our men run and fired and cheered until they reached the work, the foremost entering at one end whilst the Mexicans, about 1,000 in number, left the other in retreat. The colors of the 5th infantry were instantly raised, and scarcely were they up before those of the 7th were alongside. The three commands entered the fort together, so close was the race- the 5th, however, getting an advance in first. In less than five minutes the gun found in the fort was thundering away at the Bishop’s Palace!- Thus was this brilliant coup de main made almost without bloodshed.

NNR 71.105 17 October 1846 adjustments in territory of the United States, and other North American powers as a result of the conquest of California and New Mexico, and the Oregon treaty

The conquest of California and New Mexico extends the boundary of the United States on the west coast, from the forty-second to the thirty-second parallel of north latitude, and produces a great alteration in the territorial possessions of the belligerent powers. The comparative size of Mexico and the United States, in 1833, was as follows:

U. States territories 1,408,000,000 square acres
Mexican territories 1,081,600,000 square acres

We have now to deduct from Mexico and add to the U. States:

Upper California 240,869,160
New Mexico 137,472,000
Texas 123,904,000

Left to Mexico 579,363,840

In 1838 the possessions of various powers on this continent were as follows:

Russian 480,000,000
British 1,792,000,000
United States 1,408,000,000
Mexico 1,081,600,000
Central American 119,040,000

Total (7,328,000 miles) 4,880,640,000 acres.

Deducting from Mexico and adding to the United States 502,236,160 acres and from the U. States and to the British possessions, 32,000,000 which the United States claimed, but ceded to Great Britain by the Oregon treaty, the possessions of the various powers on the North American continent now stands as follows:

1846 Miles Acres

Russian 750,000 480,000,000
British 2,850,000 1,824,000,000
United States 2,934,744 1,876,236,150
Mexican 905,259 579,363,840
Central American 186,000 119,040,000

NNR 71.112 17 October 1846 Juan Nepomuceno Almonte appointed president of Mexico ad interim. Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna assumes control of armies

The New Orleans Picayune says that advices from Mexico via Matamoros states that General Almonte has been appointed president of Mexico ad interim, and Gen. Santa Anna generalissimo of the armies of Mexico; and further that Santa Anna was then engaged in raising and organizing troops, intending to take the field in person in the north. [RWH]

NNR 71.112 17 October 1846 Gen. Stephen Watts Kearny operating from Santa Fe
Advices to the 9th September are received from Gen. Kearney. He had ordered an expedition into the interior about 150 miles, expecting the Mormon battalion of infantry up by the time they returned. It had been determined that the two companies of dragoons under Captains Moore and Cook, and the Mormon infantry, should accompany Gen. Kearny in his expedition to California.

NRR 71.113 17 October 1846 Gen. Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna assumes the military and declines civil supremacy, Gen. Jose Mariano Salas defers determining whether to receive a minister from United States until Congress, which alone has power in the premises, shall assemble

Santa Anna instead of assuming the duties of civil supremacy has assumed the military, and takes the field as commander of the armies. He has suddenly become the chief head, and hope of the war party in Mexico, which indeed, to say the truth, embraces nearly the whole of the population.

The conduct of the present cabinet is as frank and honorable as it is possible for it to be, and none of the administrators which have preceded it, has been so explicit with the nations. We now see that none had such claims to its confidence; the present cabinet can be said to direct affairs, it is the people who really govern.

NRR 71.114 24 October 1846 Gen. Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna’s reply to the tender of supreme executive authority, his arrival and reception at the capital, levy of men for the Mexican army, articles relative to funds for the war

Sir: I have received your favor of this date, acknowledging a decree issued by the supreme government of this nation, embracing a programme of the proceedings adopted to regulate a due celebration of the reestablishment of the constitution of 1824, the assumption by myself of the supreme executive power and the anniversary of the glorious cry of Delores.

My satisfaction is extreme to observe the enthusiasm with which preparations are made to celebrate the two great blessings which have fallen upon this nation- her independence and her liberty- and I am penetrated with the deepest gratitude to find that my arrival at the capital will be made to contribute to the solemnities of so great an occasion. In furtherance of this object I shall make my entrée into the city tomorrow, at mid-day, and desire, in contributing my share to the national jubilee, to observe such a course as may best accord with my duties to my country- beloved of my heart- and with the respect due to the will of the sovereign people.

I have been called by the voice of my fellow citizens to exercise the office of commander in chief of the army of the republic. I was far from my native land when intelligence of this renewed confidence, and of these new obligations imposed upon me by my country was brought to me, and I saw the imminent dangers which surrounded here on all sides, formed the chief motive for calling me to the head of the army. I now see a terrible contest with perfidious and daring enemy impending over her, in which the Mexican republic must reconquer the insignia of her glory, and a fortunate issue, if victorious, or disappear from the face of the earth, if so unfortunate as to be defeated. I also see a treacherous faction raising its head from her bosom, which in calling up a form of government detested by the united nation, provokes a preferable submission to foreign dominion; and I behold at last, that after much vacillation, that nation is resolved to establish her right to act for herself, and to arrange such a form of government as best suits her wishes.

All this I have observed, and turned a listening ear to the cry of my desolated country, satisfied that she really needed my weak services at so important a period.
Hence I have come without hesitation or delay to place myself in subjection to her will, and desirous to be perfectly understood, upon reaching my native soil, I gave full and public expression of my sentiments and principles. The reception which they met convinced me that I had not deceived myself, and I am now the more confirmed in them, not from having given them more consideration, but because they have found a general echo in the hearts of my fellow citizens.

I come, then, to carry my views into operation, and in compliance with the mandate of my country. She calls me as commander in chief of the army, and in that capacity I stand to serve. The enemy occupies our harbors- he is despoiling us of the richest of our territories, and threatens us with his domination! I go, hen, to the head of the Mexican army- an army the offspring (rijo) if a free people- and joined with it, I will fulfill my utmost duty in opposing the enemy of my country. I will die fighting, or lead the valiant Mexicans to the enjoyment of a triumph to which they are alike entitled by justice, by their warlike character, and by the dignity and enthusiasm which they have preserved, of a free nation. The war is a necessity of immediate importance; every day's delay is an age of infamy; I cannot recede from the position which the nation has assigned me; I must go forward, unless I would draw upon myself the censure due to ingratitude for the favors of which I have been overwhelmed by my fellow citizens; or, unless I would behold her humbled and suffering under a perpetuation of her misfortunes.

Your excellency will at once perceive how great an error I should commit in assuming the supreme magistracy, when my duty calls me to the field, to fight against the enemies of the republic. I should disgrace myself, if, when called to the point of danger, I should spring to that of power! Neither my loyalty nor my honor requires the abandonment of interests so dear to me. The single motive of my heart is to offer my compatriots the sacrifice of that blood which yet runs in my veins. I wish them to know that I consecrate myself entirely to their service, as a soldier ought to do, and am only desirous further to be permitted to point out the course by which Mexico may attain the rank to which her destinies call her.

In marching against the enemy, and declining to accept of power, I give a proof of the sincerity of my sentiments, leaving the nation her own mistress, at liberty to dispose of herself as she sees fit. The elections for members of a congress to from the constitution which the people wish to adopt, are proceeding. That congress will now soon convene, and while I shall be engaged in the conflict in armed defence of her independence, the nation will place such safeguards around her liberties as may best suit herself.

If I should permit myself for a single moment, to take the reins of government, the sincerity of my promises would be rendered questionable, and no confidence could be placed in them.

I am resolved that they shall not be falsified, for in their redemption I behold the general good, as well as my honor as a Mexican and a soldier. I cannot abandon this position. The existing government has pursued a course with which the nation has shown itself content, and I have no desire to subvert it by taking its place. I feel abundant pleasure in remaining where I am, and flatter myself that the nation will applaud my choice. I shall joyfully accept such tasks as she shall continue to impose upon me; and while she is engaged in promoting the objects of civilization, I will brave every danger in supporting its benefit, even at the cost of my existence.

Will your excellency have the goodness to tender the supreme government my sincere thanks for their kindness? I will personly repeat them tomorrow, for which purpose I propose to call at the palace. I shall there embrace my friends, and hastily pressing them to my heart, bid them a tender farewell, and set out to the scene of war, to lend my aid to serve my country, or to perish among the ruins.

I beg you to repeat to your excellency assurances of my continued and especial esteem.

Antonio Lopez De Santa Anna.

Mason, of the 1st dragoons; is about to be organized into a battalion of four companies, preparatory to joining the regiments for which they have been enlisted; in the field.

They are a fine body of men, and will render efficient service whenever the torch of war shall illuminate their path.

NNR 71.115 24 October 1846 opinions stated relative to Gen. Zachary Taylor's movements, "plan of prosecuting the war,"government said to be dissatisfied with Taylor for delaying so long at Matamoros and to have ordered him on to San Luis Potosi, & c., letters detailing the operations against and surrender of Monterrey.

From the various and contradictory statements and opinions furnished by those who would appear to have the best opportunity of knowing or judging, leave our readers to form their own conclusions, it will be seen that some including the department in Washington, are urging Gen. Taylor to advance the army under his command without delay, further into the heart of Mexico; that others are of the opinion that an outward movement can not be made with a possibility of success before Gen. Taylor is reinforced by several thousand men, besides leaving the posts in his rear amply guarded, and his chain for transportation of munitions and supplies sufficiently protected.

The Washington correspondent of the New York Journal of Commerce, writes on the 15th instant: "It appears to have been doubted whether the government intends to take possession of Tampico or not; and whether it is intended to send reinforcements and supplies from that point to meet Gen. Taylor at San Luis Potosi. But I have been informed that the Mississippi took out orders on the 30th September to Com. Conner to take possession of Tampico immediately. He has four revenue cutters and a number of small steamers, by means of which he can execute the order. There are twice as many marines in his squadron as will suffice for the enterprise. It appears also that a force has been gradually drawn of late from various points, and is about to be concentrated at New Orleans or some other port, and that ample means of transportation have been put under the control of Gen. Jessup. It would seem therefore, to be the design to send some six or eight thousand troops from Tampico to meet General Taylor at San Luis Potosi.

Gentleman: The army arrived in sight of Monterey on Saturday, the 19th inst., about 8 a.m. As soon as the advance picket showed themselves on the plain, to eastward of the town, a battery, called the Old Monastery, opened its fire, and continued it, at intervals, during the day, without injury to any one. The day was spent in some unimportant movements to call attention from the engineers, who were busily engaged in making observations from every point, and during the night an expedition was out until a late hour. The result of these observations induced Gen. Taylor, on Sunday, the 20th to push General Worth's division, with two artillery batteries, commanded by Lieut. Col. Duncan and Lieut. Mason, and Col. Hays' Texas regiment, into the mountains, to the left of the town [their left] and all the enemy's works in that quarter.

ARMY OF OCCUPATION

The steamer Mckin left Brazos Santiago on the 5th, and reached New Orleans on the 10th instant, bringing Major Coffee, paymaster of the army, Capt. Dawson, U. S. artillery, Capt. Howard, Mississippi regiment, and more than two hundred sick and discharged volunteers. This arrival furnishes additional details, but nothing later from Monterey than we had before.

Major Coffee states that the loss in the late engagements was greater than at first supposed, especially the Mexican loss, which he rates 1,500, ours at 600.

We make the following external, the first from a letter published in the New Orleans Times. These letters evidence occasionally rather a free use of the pen as well as of Camp, three miles from Monterey, September 24, 1846.

Gentlemen: The army arrived in sight of Monterey on Saturday, the 19th inst., about 8am. As soon as the advance picket showed themselves on the plain, to eastward of the town, a battery, called the Old Monastery, opened its fire, and continued it, at intervals, during the day, without injury to any one. The day was spent in some unimportant movements to call attention from the engineers, who were busily engaged in making observations induced Gen. Taylor, on Sunday, the 20th, to push General Worth's division, with two artillery batteries, commanded by Lieut. Col. Duncan and Lieut. Mason, and Col. Hay's Texan regiment, into the mountains, to the left of the town (their left0 and all the enemy's works in that quarter.

Monday, 21st. Every thing being ready to make a demonstration on the enemy's works, the main body of the army marched into the plain. As the troops came in sight, the batteries opened on them, and also on a battery of two pieces commanded by Captain Webster and a mortar in charge of Captain Ramsey.

A part of the first division, led by Col. Garland, composed of the 1st and 3rd infantry and the Baltimore battalion, filed off to the left as they came up until they reached a point were Major Mansfield, assisted by Col. Kinney, was making observations. --- The order was to attack the point the engineers should point out. He said dash into the town; and Col. G. with his command, pushed into it, under a tremendous fire from three batteries and a shower of musketry. Major Mansfield and Col. Kinney went ahead with him. The fire of the enemy was returned with great spirit, and for more than an hour the thunder of artillery and the roar from the small arms exceeded any thing I ever heard or saw. The force of the enemy and the strength of their works made it necessary to order up reinforcements—accordingly the 4th infantry and Gen. Butler's division of volunteers were ordered up. The fire was soon renewed with increased animation on both sides.

I have not time now to go into the details of these attacks. The result was that we got possession of one fort in the lower part of the town, with five pieces of cannon; and were repulsed in the attempt on the second fort, distant about four hundred yards. The action was a most bloody one, and our loss very severe. The 1st, 3rd, and 4th infantry suffered terribly.

Colonel Watson, of the Baltimore battalion, was killed some distance ahead of his command, displaying much zeal and gallantry. I regret to state that many of the regular officers think that this battalion did not come up to the fight as they should have done.

Col. McClung, of Mississippi, the great duelist got upon the breast work, waived his hat, and was in the act of giving three cheers, when a ball struck him, from the effects of which he has since died.

Samuel W. Chambers, one of the Rangers, or "the Delaware hero", as they call him, got over the breast works, obtained a foot-hold on the top of an eighteen-pounder, and deliberately took aim with his "fire-shooter", firing with great effect, and crushing the Mexicans, until the piece was taken by General Worth and turned on the city. Chambers escaped without a wound.

Capt. Gillespy, of the Texas Rangers, was killed whilst pouring water, into the tube of a cannon, with the Mexicans all around him. But it is impossible for me to mention all the numerous incidents that occurred at the present time.

NNR 71.116 24 October 1846 details of deaths

I will relate you a number of incidents that occurred during the three days:

Col. McClung, of Mississippi, the great duelist got upon the breast work, waived his hat, and was in the act of giving three cheers, when a ball struck him, from the effects of which he has since died.

Samuel W. Chambers, one of the Rangers, or "the Delaware hero", as they call him, got over the breast works, obtained a foot-hold on the top of an eighteen-pounder, and deliberately took aim with his "fire-shooter", firing with great effect, and crushing the Mexicans, until the piece was taken by General Worth and turned on the city. Chambers escaped without a wound.

Capt. Gillespy, of the Texas Rangers, was killed whilst pouring water, into the tube of a cannon, with the Mexicans all around him. But it is impossible for me to mention all the numerous incidents that occurred at the present time.

This corps, seventy two in number, came down from West Point this morning, and have gone board the ship Clinton (transport) for Point Isabel, from whence they are under orders to join General Taylor, at his headquarters. The company is under the command is under the command of Capt. Swift, of the engineer corps.

NNR 71.117 24 October 1846 design on Veracruz contemplated

A Washington letter in the N. York Herald represents the future policy of the war department in its operations against Mexico, to be as follows:

The plan of the invasion is to be changed. The march from Monterey to the city of Mexico is at least six hundred miles longer than from Tampico on the gulf, or Alvarado, or Vera Cruz, which latter point affords the nearest and most accessible point. The detachment under Gen. Patterson, strongly reinforced by volunteers, is to attack Tampico, reduce it and march forward into the interior towards Mexico- and we are more strongly impressed with the idea this evening than we were yesterday, that nearly simultaneous attack by land and sea is contemplated upon Vera Cruz, if not already resolved upon and arranged.

The Progress Of The War

There seems now to be every probability of a longer war than was by many anticipated. The probability that at least a second campaign would be necessary before a peace would be "conquered"has been several times thrown out incidentally in out columns. That it was not more distinctly expressed was from apprehension that doubts expressed as to the success of our arms might dampen ardor in some direction. One point has been distinctly urged,- and, we believe, cannot be too earnestly pressed,- and that is, that government, if they design to carry on a foreign war for any length of time, should forth-wit take more effectual measures to recruit the regular army, as the only certain dependence for maintaining an adequate army out of the limits of the Union.

That a formidable movement against Tampico, and some say against Vera Cruz also, is contemplated, there can hardly be a doubt. To insure a success, worthy a contest there, a formidable land force will be indispensable. The mere occupation of the ports might be accomplished by an adequate naval force, but the object is understood to be, to approach the city of Mexico from this direction, as a shorter and more accessible route than the one Gen. Taylor has been ordered to pursue.

We are informed of a speedy attack upon Tampico, as a result of the late cabinet deliberations, and that with this view, a portion of the New York volunteers, called for last summer, may expect now a call for active service.
We have strong reasons to believe, also, that Vera Cruz is no longer to be spared; but that a co-operate attack by land and by sea will follow close after the storming of Tampico, if it does not take place simultaneously.

The government is resolved to force it upon the Mexicans that we are in earnest, and is satisfied that the sooner the enemy is convinced of it the better for them, for us, for humanity, and for the treasury.

A Washington letter in the N. York Herald represents the future policy of the war department, in its operation against Mexico, to be as follows:

The plan of the invasion is to be changed. The march from Monterey to the city of Mexico is at least 600 miles longer than from Tampico on the gulf, or Alvarado, or Vera Cruz, which latter point affords the nearest and most accessible point. The detachment under Gen. Patterson, strongly reinforced by volunteers, is to attack Tampico, reduce it and march forward into the interior towards Mexico - and we are strongly impressed with the idea this evening than we were yesterday, that a nearly simultaneous attack by land and by sea is contemplated upon Vera Cruz, if not already resolved upon and arranged.

Gen. Taylor will leave Monterey occupied with a garrison; and march forward with his main body up on Saltillo without delay, depending on the country for supplies. It is necessary that his army should be divided to enable it to subsist in their slender resources left in their retreat by the enemy. For the whole force to remain in Monterey would be to remain and starve. He will occupy the little towns in his progress in pursuit of the enemy, and if his force reserved for the forward movement be not sufficient for the conflict when he shall have overtaken Ampudia, (who runs like an Arab,) he will pause until his reinforcements in the rear can be called up, as the emergency may demand. Of course he will have his pickets and pioneers sufficiently in advance and upon his flanks to give notice of the approach to the Mexicans or any scattering parcels of their army.

From Monterey to the city of Mexico there is a journey of at least 700 miles, (some say 900) among the table lands, and deep gorges, and dangerous passes of the mountains of Mexico. This line of march running southward lies parallel with the eastern gulf coast, at about 250 miles distant, more or less. Vera Cruz lying nearly in a direct line across from the city of Mexico to the coast subsequently opens a passage to the capital as short and more convenient and accessible than the route traversed by General Taylor from Point Isabel to Monterey.

The Savannah Republican of the 15th instant has the following intelligence:

Lieut. Berryman, the gallant officer who behaved so nobly at the loss of the Truxton off Tuspan, passed through this city on Wednesday might last, as a barer of dispatches from the squadron at Vera Cruz to the Government in Washington. We learn from a gentleman who conversed with Lieut. Berryman on the cars, that it has been determined to attack Vera Cruz on the land side by an expedition from Tampico, and that the hoisting of the stars and stripes in the city, will be a signal for the attack by the squadron upon the castle of San Juan d'Ulloa. This is the only way in which the castle can be taken, and the obtaining possession of that point is deemed necessary to end the war.

The brig Saldana, with Capt. Mason's and Lieut. McLane's troops, of mounted riflemen, arrived safe at Brazos Santiago, on the 4th instant, and the brig Union, Capt. Hooper, which sailed about the same time as Saldana, arrived the day before. Both vessels weathered bravely the storms which have prevailed since their departure. This is gratifying news to the numerous friends of those who were on board the vessels.

Sappers and Miners.-This corps, seventy-two in number, came down from West Point this morning, and have gone on board the ship Clinton, (transport,) for Point Isabel, from whence they are under orders to join Gen. Taylor at his headquarters. The company is under the command of Capt. Swift, of the engineer corps. [N.Y. Express.

The editor of the Philadelphia 'North American,' who was recently on a visit to West Point, says of this corps- "Although the corps had already been but a few weeks in practice, it had already rivaled, in constructing bridges and throwing them across the river, the quickest time of the French engineers. In the works of mining and sapping, a harder, or more unusual labor had to be performed, and although the corps was engaged in digging trenches and throwing up breastworks for the two days we were at the point, the spirit of the men were not daunted by the prospect of hard labor.
Command of the Army of invasion.-The N. York Tribune, significantly asks the Washington Union to answer the following queries-

1. Has not General Taylor recently intimated to the government his desire to be aided or relieved in the command in the chief against Mexico?

2. Has not General Scott recently urged upon the government his claims to command the army advancing on Monterey, and been coldly refused?

3. Is it not the purpose of the president to appoint one of the new generals of his own creation to the chief command of our forces invading Mexico?

The Washington correspondent of the N. York Herald writes on the 19th –

We learn from an officer of the army, that General Scott, a few days ago, applied to the president for the privilege heading the army of invasion under the new plan of operations with the land forces; but that the executive declined his application on the ground that the services of the major general in chief would be as advantageous to the government at the war office as the head of the army.

[NJR 71.117 October 24, 1846 letter detailing the negotiations for surrender of Monterey]

Extracts from a letter from an officer of the U. S. army in Mexico dated--Monterey, September 25, 1846

"Yesterday morning a flag of truce came into our camp offering to surrender the town, provided the troops marched out with their arms, colors, artillery, and private property, which Gen. Taylor refused. They entered however into an armistice from 10 until 12 o'clock. Gen. Taylor transferred the negotiations from our camp to Worth's headquarters at the Bishop's palace a large work situated on an eminence in rear of, and commanding the city. After much discussion Gen. Taylor agreed that the cavalry and infantry should march out with their arms, and that the artillery should carry a field battery of six 6-pounders and thirty rounds of ammunition and personal effects. All the forts, fortifications, with their armaments, ammunition, supplies, and government property of every description to be delivered over to us at 10 o'clock this morning. They are allowed one week to vacate the city, and are then to withdraw beyond this province, the whole of which is given up to us except Tampico--and this I presume they claim, as the navy has not succeeded in taking it. This, you will perceive, makes the Sierrra Madre mountains the Boundary.

"General Ampudia, during the conference, said he had positive information that Gen. Kearney had taken Santa Fe and that our citizens had captured California. What a slice has this taken from them!

"They have further entered into an armistice for eight weeks. Gen. Taylor agreed to this on Ampudia's positive assurance that our commissioners were in Mexico arranging the basis of a treaty.

"Gen. Worth has just completed a series of the most brilliant operations in modern warfare, and with but little loss. He carried four works and then came into the town when every house was a fortification. He acted thus: Divided his forces into two columns, moving parallel, and opining their way with pick axes through the houses and walls. Thus when they knocked a hole in the house they of course had possession, and in this way avoided the streets and enemy's fire from roofs of houses and barricades thrown up in every street.

"Our side or wing of the army has had some hard fighting, and our loss has been very great. They had a very strong work on this side, the southeast, built of earth, stone and sand bags, containing a 12, a 9, and a 6 pounder and an old fashioned thirty-two pound howitzer, with a large musketry force. This work was flanked by a stone house arranged with loop holes and flat roof with a parapet for the men to lie behind. Both of these were again flanked by another redoubt about 300 yards distant, heavily armed with cannon, infantry with escopets and fine English muskets. The first works were carried, but attended with great, very great loss; for independently of all those, there was a cross fire from a very strong castle about 1,000 yards distant, with shell and 12 pound shot.

"We had been attached to the dragoons, and as they could do nothing in this kind of work we have had but little chance. However when our troops moved down Ridgely rode up to Gen. Taylor and volunteered to move with two pieces to what could be done, as all of us were ignorant of the ground. He cheerfully granted if Twiggs consented.  We moved forward at a dashing gallop, with only two pieces, leaving caissons behind; when within 400 yards they turned their whole fire upon us. It was terrific. We however gave them three or four rounds, but discovering the strength of the work, and perceiving we should be annihilated in 30 minutes, retired. Having had two men and three horses wounded. I verily believe two more rounds, as they then would have had the exact range, would have knocked us all over. The third and fourth infantry and the Baltimore battalion threatened the right and the Mississippi and Tennessee volunteers attacked and carried it on the left. Poor Watson was shot dead, through the neck, about seventy yards from the work leading his men on. The third infantry went into the engagement with twelve officers; five killed, one mortally and one slightly wounded.--judge of the fight.

"Shortly after these were carried General Taylor told Ridgely to take two pieces and move on an open plain not over 250 yards from the third fort mentioned and silence it. R. told him he thought it too strong for our pieces to affect it in the least, and asked if it had been reconnoitered. He said no, and proposed it should be done. Ridgely dashed off half speed, and perceiving it was very strong, returned and reported. God only knows how he escaped, as there was a continuous blaze of musketry fired at him until he returned, and yet neither him nor his horse was touched. ***

"We had on the 23rd a severe street fight, the Mississippi volunteers all with rifles, some of the Tennessseans and Texans on our side, against some 5,000 Mexicans whom Ampudia had collected in the plaza. They evacuated and carried off the cannon from the third fort on the night of the 22nd. We took possession on the 23rd and Gen. --brought on this street fight, greatly to Gen. Taylor's disgust, but he had to support him. Bragg was sent in with his battery and got badly used, as he also on the 21st." [PTH]

NRR 71.118 October 24, 1846 Order of General Stephen Watts Kearny for an expedition from Santa Fe, speculations on operations in New Mexico and California

Army Of The West

Head Quarters, Army of the West, Santa Fe, N.M., Aug. 31, 1846.

Order No. 17.-I, The Commander-in-Chief will, on the 2d proximo, leave this city for El Rio Abajo, with nine hundred men, who will provide themselves with provisions for twenty days, &c.

II. The expedition will consist of 300 dragoons, under command of; 500 Missouri cavalry, under command of; and 100 Missouri artillery, under command of Capt. Fischer, and Lieuts. Chouteau, and Kribben, &c. &c.

By order, Gen. S.W. Kearney, &c.&c. It is understood that the troops are to move 200 miles on the east side of the Rio del Norte, and return on the west side. The object of this sudden call is partly to put down some show of hostility at Albequerque, and to take formal possession of the small towns situated along the Rio Grande, and partly to make the proclamation of the General felt by the discontented amongst the Aristocracy about "El Paso." Besides, Armijo, and Ugarta are still engaged in the south with the raising of troops, and it is expected that this expedition will either disperse them or cause their submission.

The Pueblos, the poorer classes of the Mexicans, seem to be well satisfied with the changes in the Government, and receive us everywhere with open arms; but he who supposes that the rich do not watch every opportunity to shake off the American yoke (?) is much mistaken.

Whether, and how soon troops will be sent to California, is still uncertain, and it seems principally to depend on the reinforcements which General Kearney expects to receive by Captain Allen, the Mormons, and Col. Price’s regiment. So far Captains Moore and Cook, with 200 dragoons, are ordered for that purpose, but no time is specified, and but few volunteers to strengthen this expedition; at least it is not known that any other officers than Capt. Fischer, Lieuts. Kribben and Hassendeubel, have offered. The soldiers are still more backward than the officers; and it seems to be doubtful whether he will be able to raise a company for that purpose.—Among the knowing ones, it is a settled fact, that neither horses nor mules would ever be able to move in masses, of two or three hundred, over the mountains. For this reason they are preparing to march....with the expectation of subsisting, for several weeks, on the chance of game.

If the expedition to California should start before the 1st of October, it would, according to Fitzpatrick’s opinion, not reach Monterey before the middle of February, making the trip about 130 days.

A letter dated September 2, adds that Armijo and Ugarta are moving towards us with five thousand troops. But this story is not generally credited.—General Kearney expressed himself about it—“six thousand are better than two thousand; they are harder to manage and much more easily confused.”

NNR 71.118-71.119 October 24, 1846 march and route of Illinois volunteers through Texas

VOLUNTEERS.

Illinois Volunteers In The West.
Monday, August 24th, 1846

The 1st and 2nd regiments of Illinois volunteers have arrived at their encampment, two miles below the Alamo and city of San Antonio, on the river of the latter name. A few particulars, of interest to their friends, may now be furnished for your paper, which has so extensive a circulation throughout Illinois.

Our march from Port Lavaca, the point at which we landed in Lavaca Bay, has been one hundred fifty good Spanish miles, through a country of remarkable fertility, presenting to the eye of a northern man many striking features, which will hereafter become worthy of public notice.

While I write, the sun is just hiding his face in the forest of the Lapan, and the Tankawa, and around me the soldier is singing, "home, sweet home!"while he drives his tent pins, after a faithful eighteen miles for a days march. The laugh, the song, the joke, the hurra, and the merry talk, among seventeen hundred men, seem to indicate an absence of all care, and the enjoyment of good health and high spirits.

Since we landed in Texas the only death we have any intelligence of in camp was that of Mr. Vanduser, the orderly sergeant in Captain Dodge’s company, from Kendall County. He died of a lingering fever, at Camp Irwin, ten miles from Port Lavaca, on the 11th inst., where he was buried on the next morning, by his brother soldiers, with the solemnity and decency due to his merit and due to the feelings of the bereaved family he left in Illinois.

We have all been remarkably healthy in general, though the measles, in a mild form, has spread to a great extent in some of the companies. We left a sick station at Camp Irwin, on the 12th inst. and one at the Savilla Creek on the 19th; the latter in the care of Dr. Hope, and under the command of Captain Webb, who remained there with his company—one one of the best companies of volunteers ever offered for the service of the country. In all, I believe, we have left about two hundred me in the rear, one third of whom were sick, the other nurses, &c; but we have the cheering news to-day that the "rear guard," as we call them, are coming up strong, and what few still remain are nearly all convalescent.

The opinion prevails among our officers, that considering the change of climate, at this particular season of the year, our regiments have been singularly blessed with good health.

The most interesting camp news today is, that Dr. Price, of Bellesville, St. Clair county, one of the appointees of the president as surgeon, has arrived in camp, to be assigned to whichever regiment Gen. Wool may designate. This leaves our friends, Dr. Hope, of Alton, and Dr. White of Chicago, the right to toss up who shall go home and attend to his business, where there is competition. Ahem!

A dragoon arrived this morning with dispatches to General Wool from the Camp of Col. Harney, who is now on forced marches "back agin" from the Presidio of the Rio Grande to San Antonio. It is said, the Colonel, in his zeal to serve his country, so far forgot his military obedience as to take up his line of march from the latter to the former named place without any orders whatever from his superior and commanding officer, Gen. Wool, and that the General has ordered his return. If all this be true, I see no great harm in it. I suppose Colonel H. wished to train his dragoons by a few days marches, so as to keep their hands in for the coming trial of bottom and speed between this place and Chihuahua. Pooh! What's a thousand miles and then we will settle some important questions as to the comparative speed and endurance of American infantry and cavalry on thousand mile marches— for we calculate to go there and back again without seeing a hostile Mexican.

I believe the prevalent Texan opinion is, that a majority of the inhabitants of the Province of Chihuahua, have for several years, and still are, decidedly partial to our political institutions and our social security in proportion as they are tired of civil wars in Mexico and disgusted with their thousand and one mushroom tyrants, who reign to-day, ruin tomorrow, and run away the next day. Such a state of feeling in that province ought to render the protection of our newly required republic, in anything like border defense, an easy and economical task for Mr. Polk and his successors.

I hope there are important services in store for General Wool's command of four or five thousand troops in his central position, and I hope too, the laurels which he and those officers under his command, who would not appear awkward in laurels, may win, will be brightest and best. But I declare I do not know upon what foundation I have erected this hope.

As nothing of peculiar interest has transpired in camp since my last, I will make mention of some subjects which have proved worthy of notice on our march through the country—and, among these, I know of none more striking than the vestiges which now remain of the early Spanish settlements.

GOLIAD IN RUINS

On the 14th, as our long train was moving through the entirely unsettled country bordering the San Antonio river, most unexpectedly our attention was attracted to some venerable looking ruins in the distance, which proved to be the bare black walls of the now desolate and doomed city of Goliad. This stands on the west bank of the river, in the bend the shape of a crescent. The town site is elevated with commanding, so as to give the ruins a venerable appearance through the surrounding champaign country. The immediate cause of its abandonment and desolation is to be found in the history of the Texan revolution. The inhuman murder of Fanning and his men at this place by Urrea, under the order of Santa Anna made it necessary for the inhabitants and Mexican army at Goliad to fly in terror before the avengers, and on a dark and terrible night, they fled in despair, expecting never again to stand before the Texan forces at this point. They applied the torch to their own dwellings, and left in a heap of smoldering ruins where their once beautiful town had so long stood, the abode of civilized society and peaceful happiness. They snatched the gold and silver from the alters, and bid adieu to the holy church where, for a century, the faithful had worshiped in uninterrupted security.

MISSIONARY STATIONS

But after a fatiguing march of many days through the wilderness, with no human habitation in view, our eyes were directed to some lowering domes and lofty battlements, with a heavy growth of grass and prickly pear upon their summits, on the same river. This is the mission of St. John. Two or three miles further, ascending the same stream, stands the stupendous mission of St. Joseph. Again, two miles, the mission of conception, and two miles further, the city of San Antonio and the old mission now connected with the Alamo. What are these missions? Moss covered ruins. What were they? The out-posts of Christianity in the wilderness of the savage.- When Mexico was a Spanish province, the faithful ministers of her religion conceived the scheme of christianizing this vast portion of our continent.- With a zeal and courage like that of Ignatius Loyola, they planted the seeds of their religion in his rude heart. As we have visited them with feelings of no ordinary interest, we suppose the mention of their existence; being now within the undisputed limits of our country, might prove worthy the attention of tourists and travelers in general. We have seen only those we have mentioned and one other, which still stands unspoiled, and in use, in the town of San Antonio; yet we are informed that many others are standing in ruins on these rivers. St. Joseph's about five miles below San Antonio, on the rive, is the most extensive; its grand court yard is about two hundred yards square; its principle chapel is about one hundred and five feet long by thirty in width; the wing containing the cells of its nuns is about one hundred and fifty feet long by fifty-seven in width; the height of its principal dome is about eighty-feet; its court is surrounded by old buildings, enough for the accommodation of about one hundred families; the base of the wings is divided into small cells built with great strength; the battlements and towers are covered with the prickly pear, growing to the height of six feet above the walls, and with grass and mesquite wood, the common growth of the country; the bells lay scattered and broken, some in the courtyard, and others in the cupola.

The main front of the building opposite what was once the grand entrance is adorned with richness of architecture and statuary, so far superior to anything in its class among the religious edifices of our country, that it strikes an American with awe and admiration. Besides many statues of full size, in an arch around the entrance are also plaster images of small dimensions- the large one representing the saints and Christ and the Virgin- the small ones in groups surrounded by well preserved wraths of fleur de lis and other flowers, representing the striking scenes in the history of Christ and his Apostles. The entire exterior of these vast buildings, as well as the roofs, domes and parapets, have been painted in imitations of mazaic work, portions of which are not yet defaced. In a small chapel in the basement, which is still locked, stand in a state of preservation, under the care of the present keepers of the property, three statues- one of Jesus with a crown of thorns and pierced hands and feet, and bleeding one side; one of the Virgin weeping, and the others we could not distinguish through the grates, where we were obliged to peep in.

The principal material of these edifices is rock and a kind of cement, which in its mouldering condition, although hard, has the appearance of old lava. The sills of the doorways and the caps of many of the pillars, as well as the door posts or of white marble, of ponderous dimensions.

A strong evidence of most extensive labor in the establishment of these missions, is to be found in the canals which have been dug to irrigate with the waters of the San Antonio river, large tracts of country, extending over leagues of land. In some places this plan of irrigation seems to indicate that in former years the drought rendered agriculture and horticulture unavailable without much artificial aid, and it proves too, as well as does the completion of such vast public edifices, that the labor of large numbers of the aborigines must have been employed by the missionary priests and their associates in the work.

The dates of the completion of these respective edifices range along from the beginning to the middle of the last century, which makes some of them more and some less than one hundred years old, and although they do not boast of a very remote antiquity, the desolation of war and the corroding nature of this climate upon buildings, as well as the rapid growth of wood and vegetation peculiar to this region, gives them the appearance of very ancient ruins. They are, to say the least, much older in appearance than any of the other buildings we have seen standing in the United State, excepting, perhaps, the old Spanish cathedral at New Orleans, or the old Scandinavian fort or old mill at Newport, Rhode Island. The reason why I take such hasty notice of them now is, that we have men of competent skill and talents detailed from our camp for the purpose of making drafts and giving accurate descriptions of them they can find, as well also to furnish from the most authentic sources of the history of their construction, use and overthrow, for future publications.

LAPAN INDIANS.

A murmur of indignation was running through our lines to-day, in consequence of a scene of unusual interest which transpired here this morning. An old squaw from an encampment of Lapan Indians about two miles below us on the river, came to the camp of the Texan volunteers, and offered for sale two Spanish girls from thirteen to fifteen years old. They were dreadfully emaciated and almost destitute of a single garment of clothing. The Texans seized the girls and squaws and carried them immediately to head quarters, where, upon examination, it was ascertained that the Lapans had murdered a whole family, the parents and brothers of the two girls, in the vicinity of the Rio Grande, stolen all their property and led the girls into captivity; there they had treated them with extreme cruelty, and nearly starved them to death, and were now offering them for sale. The girls readily pointed out the ringleaders of the outrage, and some fifteen or twenty of them were arrested for further investigation by the order of Gen. Wool.

SAN ANTONIO

There is nothing very attractive in the present appearance of San Antonio, save the most ancient looking walls of such portions of the old towns are still occupied, and the dilapidated ruins of the parts now deserted. In 1813, when the Spanish entered this place during the Mexican rebellion, San Antonio contained a population of nine thousand inhabitants—now one thousand is the extent of its numbers. The principal houses are flat roofed stoned edifices, one story in height, with doors and windows constructed like those of prisons and fort-for protection at an early day against the Indians. Some two or three modern looking American buildings have been erected, also of stone, which indicate the commencement of a new era in this country—I mean the coming of the Anglo-Saxon. The society here is composed of illiterate Mexicans and a few intelligent Americans, as the people of the United States are called—the American society, however, is quite limited. The fandango is the chief amusement; this comes off every evening—resorted to by "the million;" the "upper ten thousand" keep aloof, "the boys," as Texan volunteers and others are called, go and pay their dime a dance for a few rounds in the waltz, quadrille or reel, with some olive signorita. The "Tiger rooms" are open and tolerably well patronized by both sexes of Mexicans, as well as by the "new comers." Some officers can beat the Jews winning at Monte. So passes the time, and we return to reflect upon things of more importance.

The few priests who still maintain their ground here, in spite of many bloody scenes which have marked the spot, are true to their profession and their duty; they celebrate mass, and keep holy days with fidelity and zeal, and vespers are attended by many of the older inhabitants with punctuality. I understand that one Presbyterian preacher has been encouraged to remain, who teaches school and preaches regularly in the town.

I will endeavor to give you some idea of the Alamo in a few days; at present, I must conclude by saying a few words about the mails. Since the Texan mail has been withdrawn, the United States mail has only begun an irregular foreshadowing of what I suppose is its intended to be hereafter, a system of arrivals and departures. The purport now to send and receive a mail, once a week, but I believe the black fellow who rides the mule, brings the mail bag without anything in it. However, send us the news, we may possibly get a chance paper occasionally.

Yours, respectively, P.L.

P.S. Since my last, one thousand mounted volunteers from Arkansas, have arrived and encamped with us.

The following letter from our esteemed correspondent Lieut. E. Eastman of Nashville Blues, will be found interesting:

Camp near Camargo, September 11, 1846.

Before this reaches Nashville you will doubtless have heard of the condition of our regiment, and of the great amount of sick among our volunteers. In view of the fact that some 250 or 300 volunteers have just been discharged from our regiment by the surgeon's certificate, and already left for their homes in Tennessee, I deem it a duty which I owe to my fellow soldiers and officers who have reluctantly been compelled to return before the conclusion of the war, and at a time when the country needed their services, to say that such was the only course they could preserve their own existence, and that in remaining here they could be of no service to the government.

Our situation here is truly melancholy, and I can see no good reason for concealing it. Many of our companies have dwindled away to a comparatively small number by sickness and death, and many noble brave, generous sons of Tennessee have breathed their last on the Rio Grande. The principal diseases are congestive fever, inflammation of the bowels, measles, and the chills and fever. The measles appear to be peculiarly fatal, and wholly different from the disease of the same name in the United States. --The patient scarcely ever recovers. The hand of death has been heavily upon us--dispensation of Providence are mysterious, and we submit without a murmur to Him "who spoke and it was done--who commanded and it stood still."

The necessity of discharging all who are sick consists in several particulars. 1st, want of medicine to effect a cure; 2nd, the severity of the disease, the uncertainty, and I would add the almost utter impossibility of recovering in this climate, and 3rd, very few, if any, ever recover after being prostrated by disease here.

In view of these facts I would ask, is not every soldier justified in getting discharged who is attacked by diseases which almost invariably proves fatal? He could be of no service to his country here, and by remaining would sacrifice his own life. Dr. Norris, who is now our principal surgeon, is worthy of the greatest praise for his noble conduct in the trying scenes through which we have passed. --The sick have been so numerous that frequently he could not obtain an hour's sleep for four days or nights in succession--Dr. Robertson, one of the assistants being dangerously sick, and Dr. Stearns being absent with a portion of the sick sent to the hospital at Camargo.

All the well men in the Nashville Blues left with Captains Cheatham and Lieutenants Bradfoot and Putnam, for Monterey some days ago, together with all the other companies of the regiment capable of performing the march. Enough well men, however, were left to take care of the sick. In our company some forty were left, including myself and those at the hospital at Point Isabel. Some twenty-five or thirty Blues have been discharged--four have died in all since we left, Nashville, and one died who was discharged are able to leave, I shall start with my small detachment for Monterey. I remained, in pursuance of Gen. Pillow's order, with the men in our company unable to march.

I should do injustice to Brigadier General Pillow did I omit to mention his unceasing exertions to alleviate the sufferings of the sick. He has done every thing in his power, and his magnanimous conduct as an officer meets with universal admiration.

This town is literally void of interest and I am heartily sick of it. Last night, to break the monotony of the camp, the regiment above u had an alarms, which spread up and down the river, and two companies were sent out as scouting parties, who fired many guns, had some fun, and returned in the morning to their quarters without discovering any thing in the shape of a hostile Mexican.

of Tennessee troops--most of them out of funds as well as out of health. Many of the other regiments have been considerably reduced by the same cause, as will be seen by the subjoined extract of a letter from Col. Samuel R. Curtis, commanding the third regiment of the Ohio volunteers. The more recent accounts, however indicate that the health of the remaining troops had much improved.

NNR 71.120 October 24, 1846 Col. Samuel Ryan Curtis' letter about the health of troops at Matamoros

Matamoros, September 7, 1846:

"In my regiment there are 150 on the sick list. The same proportion at Camp Washington, when you were there, would have made the list eight or nine hundred, as there was then under my command all the volunteers from the state, and five or six times the force I now command. My surgeon reports that, though the number continues large, there is evidently a change for the better, and almost every man is on the mend.

'It is considered a very hard battle, and a bloody one that carries off ten per cent of a given force. Very few battles of the many thousands the world has fought have risen above five per cent. But by disease and death I have seen my ranks already reduced from 780 to 620. --And in some of the regiments, where they have guarded themselves, or been more exposed, the regiments are reduced from 760 to 500. The number gone are not all dead. Hundreds pass down the river daily on their way home, having procured a certificate from their surgeon that they are attacked by incurable disease. They will many of them return home to their families emaciated, sick, and unable to oil. They are wounded soldiers who have met the pestilential foes of the south; and as much deserve the honor and care of their country as though the fatal shaft had been composed of lead.

'So far as life and death are concerned, I would rather risk a battle once a week, with my regiment in the north, than remain in a climate so unnatural to them. --But we do not repine--we do not complain. Those who stay, and those who die here, are doing so in the discharge of the duty. Of those who leave to return home, many will never reach there, but will find graves in the gulf or river. '

CAPT. THORNTON, of the United States dragoons, accompanied Capt. Eaton, the bearer of despatches from Monterey to the city of Washington,--with the purpose of prevailing upon the department of war, to afford him an opportunity of retrieving himself from the effects of the late disaster near Matamoros.

LIEUT. COL. WATSON. --Every thing relating to this gallant officer has a melancholy interest for our citizens. The following is an extract of a letter written in the camp before Monterey on the 22nd of September, by an officer of the US army, to a gentleman of Baltimore.

"In the attempt to enter the town we lost Colonel Watson of the Baltimore volunteers, who conducted himself most gallantly. I saw him a few minutes before he fell. He had lost his horse, which was killed under him, and was on foot. He was shot dead while leading his men to the charge."

The York (Pa. ) Republican says:

Col. W. H. Watson. --"We notice with regret the fall of this gallant Baltimorean in the fierce conflict at Monterey. He was one of the most popular and esteemed residents of Baltimore--the commander of one of the oldest volunteer corps--once her representative in the state Legislature, and speaker of the house of delegates of Maryland. He was also the chief Marshal of the great Whig Young Men's convention in May, 1844, and passed the 4th of July of that year in York with the Colombian Fire company, of which he was president. He was appointed by Gov. Pratt to command the Baltimore and Washington battalion of volunteers in Mexico, where he has bravely fallen in his country's service. Noble, gallant, and chivalrous, due honors to Messrs. Editors: I send you extracts from a letter I have jést received from Col.

Dragoon camp, near Monterey, Mexico.

September 26th 1846

Dear J--It is sad and painful duty to perform, in announcing to you the death of your father's young friend. We have had hard fighting for the last three days, and he was mortally wounded in a charge against the enemy's cavalry. He behaved most gallantly and fell in the front of battle. Yesterday he died, but retained his senses until the last. He was a gallant fellow, and is much regretted. You can say this to his friends, that he had every attention. I was not present when he expired, but was absent on duty. He was buried with military honors.

Many gallant spirits have gone out in the last three days. The flowers of our little army have fallen--peace be with them! The enemy yesterday surrendered the city on condition that they should be allowed to march out with the honors of war. *****

The gallant Watson fell at the head of his regiment, leading the charge. I cannot tell you of our loss, but it is at least five hundred killed and wounded.

My men have not suffered any, as they have been exposed but very little. *****

I write this on my saddle, and am so tired I can't hold my pen any longer. I have not slept for the last three days or nights, so you must excuse this wretched scrawl.
Yours, Charley May.

We regret very much that the above letter announces the death of a most respectable young gentleman, Mr. Herman Thomas, of Harford county, of this state.
When congress passed the act calling into service the volunteers, numerous were the applications to those in authority for commissions.--All, of course, could not be gratified, and Mr. Thomas was among the unsuccessful applicants.--Resolved, however, to win laurels in his country's service he left for the seat of war among the first, and took his place in the ranks. He was especially recommended to Colonel May's notice, as will be seen by the above letter, and had scarcely time to distinguish himself before he met a soldier's death.

Capt. Field.--The New York Express says:--among the officers killed at Monterey was Captain Field, of the United States army. His lady was on a visit to this city, residing at the house of Assistant Alderman Oliver, anxiously expecting letters from her husband. The first intelligence that reached her after her arrival here, was his death. Mrs. F. is the daughter of the late Colonel Vose, a gallant officer who was with the army on the Rio Grande, and whose death also she was called to mourn a short time since. Thus has she to lament the loss of a husband in whom her very life seemed wrapped--sorrows sufficient for one, at least, to be called to bear.

"Capt. Williams, of the topographical engineers; killed during the series of desperate conflicts before Monterey, was a resident of for some time married in this town. He married the daughter of the estimable widow of the late Thomas Peters, Esq. , at whose residence the orphans of Capt. Williams now remain, their mother being also died. Georgetown is not only fully represented in the gallant army of the south, but offers her share of the shining victims to be immolated on the altar of this most unfortunate war."GEORGETOWN DC ADVOCATE.

Capt. Lewis N. Morris.--The details of the battle of Monterey confirm the sad rumor that Captain Lewis N. Morris, of this city, fell at the head of his regiment, during the progress of that sanguinary conflict. The mournful intelligence has deeply afflicted his surviving relatives, and brought sorrowing to the hearts of a large circle of the friends and acquaintances of the departed.

Captain Morris was a native of this state; grandson of Lewis Morris, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, and eldest son of Capt. Staats Morris, who served as aid-de-camp to Gen. Wayne, during the Indian wars, at the close of the revolution. He graduated at West Point Military Academy, in 1820, as second lieutenant of artillery, but was soon after attached to the 3rd infantry, then, and for several years, stationed on the western frontier. He served in the Black Hawk war, in 1832, and was promoted to a company in October, 1833.

In November, 1840, he was ordered to Florida, where he remained in active and often dangerous service, until the spring of 1843. During most of the period of his residence in Florida he had the command of his regiment, and for six months he was entrusted with the command of the Middle District of Florida, having his headquarters at Fort Gamble. During that campaign he rendered efficient service. Few men displayed greater personal courage, as none stood more deservedly high as an accomplished and successful disciplinarian.

He went to Corpus Christi with Gen. Taylor, and commanded the 3rd regiment in the well fought battles of Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma. During those battles he exhibited great coolness and courage, and for his distinguished gallantry in those engagements, was nominated by the president brevet major.

Captain Morris, in the battle, which has terminated his career, accompanied the command of Major Lear, in their gallant charge upon the masked batteries within the walls of Monterey. He was among the foremost of the column, and when Major Lear fell wounded, he took command. His position was one of great hazard and responsibility; and fell, pressing forward to the capture of the battery, under a murderous and sweeping fire from the enemy.

The death of Capt. Morris will be deeply regretted. He was an officer of great experience, and promise, in the 46th year of his age. He has left a wife and family; and the tears of a grateful people, who can appreciate the virtues of a brave soldier, will be mingled with hers over the grave of the departed. Albany Journal

Lieut. D. Irwin. --In the list of officers who fell at Monterey we are pained to recognize the name of Lieut. D. Irwin of the regular army, son of Joseph Irwin, Esq. at Fort Monroe. But while we sympathize with the venerable parent in the loss of a gallant and accomplished son, it is a consolation to reflect that he met a patriot soldiers death, in his country's cause, in the van of the battle, and in the arms of victory. Norfolk Herald.

THE HEROS OF MONTEREY. --General Worth is a Massachusetts man, born at Martha's Vineyard.

GENERAL DAVID E. TWIGGS. --The citizens of Augusta, Georgia, have made arrangements to present to General Twiggs, a sword, as a testimonial of their appreciation of his gallant conduct in the battles of Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma, on the 8th and 9th of May last.

CAPTAIN ALBERT BLANCHARD, who distinguished himself at the battle of Monterey is the son of Reuben K. Blanchard, of Charlestown, Massachusetts, Captain B. was born within a rifle shot of Bunker Hill--and educated amid the recollections which belong to the spot.

Col. A. C. Fanning, of the United States army, died suddenly in Cincinnati a few days since, of apoplexy, in the 59th year of his age. He entered the army in 1812, served through the war with England; was with General Jackson through the Seminole war, and was in service in Florida, where he participated in two of the most sanguinary battles. He was Lieutenant Colonel of the 2nd regiment of artillery, and colonel by brevet of date December 31, 1835.

DEATH OF CAPT. WM. WALTERS. --The St. Louis Republican of the 31st announces the death of Capt. W. at the Planters House in that city, on the day before. He was assistant commissary in the army, and was on his route to assume his new duties. -- Capt. Walters was the editor of the Illinois State Register published at Springfield, and in this capacity had taken an active part in state and national politics, for many years past.

COL. McLUNG, of Mississippi, died of the wounds received in the battle of Monterey.

CAPT. CROGHAN KER, and LIEUTS. A. LOWERY, and G. HUMPHRIES, United States dragoons, embarked with the United States recruits from Fort McHenry, a short time since on board of the brig C. H. Rogers, for Brazos Santiago. Captain K. has served in the army upward of ten years, and besides having been engaged in the actions of Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma, served through the entire Florida campaign.
Two days before Capt. Ker left Baltimore, as a testimonial of their appreciation of his worth as a soldier and gentleman, Sept. 9, 1846.

The presentation was made through B. C. Presstman, Esq., preceded by a very eloquent an appropriate address which drew forth the warmest applause from those assembled, and was received by Captain Ker with a few brief but appropriate remarks. On the conclusion of the ceremonies of the presentation, the company sat down to a collation, prepared in a handsome style.

Lieut. Woods, who fell at Monterey, was a native of Lewistown, Pennsylvania, where his father the venerable Congregational clergyman of that place, still resides. His maternal grandfather was John Witherpoon, one of the signers of the declaration of Independence and president of Princeton College.

A DELAWARE HERO--A correspondent at New Orleans, who belongs to the army, has sent the Philadelphia Ledger a letter detailing the exploits of a young Delawarian, named Sam'l E. Chambers, who it seems, was the "brother in arms" of the writer. -- Chambers joined the army at Corpus Christi, and went with Captain Walker's Texas Rangers to the Rio Grande. On the first of May, when Walker made the desperate attempt to cut his way through to Taylor's camp for the purpose of opening the communication, Chambers was one of the few men who went with him. In the encounter with the Mexicans, they lost all but fifteen men. Chambers had a horse shot under him. He captured another from a Mexican, which shared the same fate as the first, and was the last man who returned to camp. --Chambers did admire the discretion of Captain W. as much as he did his courage, and applied to Captain May for a place in his company in the expected battles on the 8th and 9th. The application was granted and C. was the second man that crossed the Mexican battery in charge. He was found after the battle lying under his horse by the side of one of the Mexican pieces, with his dislocated and much bruised, and entirely insensible. He was removed from the field, and has since recovered from his injuries. The writer of the letter says his comrades have given him the name of the "Hero of Delaware." Some of those who observed his conduct during the battle, say he fought as if he intended with his single arm to put to flight the whole Mexican Army. With his sabre in one hand, he assaulted the men in charge of the battery, and with the other he discharged his pistols in their faces. --Three bayonet wounds through the body which he received, show how desperate the contest was, and how gallant he stood his ground. The father of this young hero was named Isaac Chambers. He resided in the state of Delaware, and has also lived in Philadelphia. His mother lives at present in Wilmington, it is believed and the object of the letter is to acquaint the latter of her son's safety. --Success to him, and may his gallantry win him more substantial honors than the admiration of his comrades.

A correspondent of the New York Journal of Commerce, who signs himself "A friend of the Army," has published in that paper a communication the object of which "is to detail some of the services rendered by a portion on gen. Taylor’s army which have heretofore been passed over almost in silence, while the services of others have been placed before the public in a most conspicuous fight." The following passages were extracted from it:

"In the gallant charge of Capt. May with a squadron of dragoons of the 9th, there were several officers who participated with him in all the danger of the onslaught yet their names were never mentioned. But few know that such a man as capt. L.T. Graham was in that charge with his company, and entitled to just as much distinction as capt. May, who because his name happens to be placed two above the other upon the Army Register, or from some other unknown cause, gets all the glory, not only from the public, but from congress, receiving two brevets, while the other officers of the squadron are not noticed. This is manifest injustice.

Among other instances which might be cited, is that of capt. Duncan, a brave and gallant officer, who is brevetted for gallant services on the 8th, and again for highly meritorious and distinguished services on the 9th, while lieut. Ridgely gets a brevet
Now let us inquire what each of these two gentlemen did on the 9th, and see if justice has been done them.

Each of them on the morning of the ninth commanded a company of light artillery of about the same magnitude. It was however Ridgely’s fortune to be placed in the advance of the army with the 5th infantry. This position he retained until the action commenced. Captain Duncan was placed near the rear of the column, which marched by platoons through the narrow road, and of course extended a long distance to the rear.

The action commenced the moment the head of the column reached the enemy, and from this time until he was routed, and the retreat towards the river, lieut. Ridgely’s battery was most actively engaged, and as he very justly remarks in his report, he had the honor to command the only artillery that was engaged; consequently all that was done in that engagement by artillery, is due to him, and not to Duncan, as it was as it was impracticable for the latter to reach the field until late in the action, and Ridgely is not noticed. Such instances of injustice as the foregoing have created much dissatisfaction in the army, and in my opinion it would have been better for the service to bestow no brevets at all, than to pass over so many who so richly deserve them.

There appears to be another cause for dissatisfaction in the army, which is, that some regiments that figured conspicuously, have not had justice in the official dispatches.

I have as yet seen no statement which appeared to me to do justice to the gallant manner in which our infantry received and repelled the charge of the Mexican Lancers on the 8th.

The commanding in his report says, "the enemy’s cavalry made a charge upon the 5th infantry, and was repulsed; "that Ridgely’s artillery did great execution among them, scattering them in every direction." Hereby leaving the inference that the infantry did no execution, but that the cavalry were in fact repulsed by Ridgely. This impression would most certainly obtain from the reading the general’s report; but so far from this being the case, the services of this regiment on that occasion contributed not a little, (in our opinion) towards a victory.

When Gen. Taylor discovered that the enemy’s lancers were making a movement from the left of their line, passing around a skirt of woods towards our right flank, apparently with the intention of turning it, he ordered the 3rd and 5th regiments of infantry to march in that direction and intercept them. This movement was promptly executed, and over cover of the woods and the smoke of our guns, these regiments gained a position about a half mile from the main body of the army, where the lancers must pass; and it was but a few moments before they were seen approaching around the pint of woods which had until now concealed them.

The regiments were instantly thrown into square, -the 5th front, the 3rd about three hundred yards in the rear, and in this position they awaited the enemy.

When the Lancers espied our troops formed in square, they were taken by surprise, halted at a distance of some four hundred yards from the 5th Infantry, and formed for a charge. Their numbers appeared most overpowering, and it was afterwards ascertained that the odds were at least three to one in their favor.

As soon as their columns were formed, the charge was sounded from numerous trumpets through their lines- at the same time setting up a most unearthly shout, and putting their horses at full speed, they came bounding towards the 5th, a little band of three hundred and forty men.)

As they came sweeping down the prairie, dressed in the wild costume of the Mexican cavalry, their appearance was truly terrific: but the officers encouraged their men to stand firm in their places, and not to permit their ranks to be broken, impressed upon them the importance of maintaining the square. It required all of their efforts to give confidence to the soldiers, as they heard the most formidable accounts of their troopers: they were considered the choice troops of the Mexican army, and it was upon them that their general had placed the most reliance. Indeed they had been pronounced by one of our dragoon officers a fine body of well disciplined troops.- This, together with the fact that they were one thousand strong, rendering the situation of the 5th anything but enviable at this particular juncture.
It is stated by an experienced officer, that the situation of soldiers when in square against cavalry, awaiting a charge is the most trying of all others. There is no excitement in the attacking party which simulates the most timid, and blunts the thought of danger. The enthusiasm of the impetuous assault when making the charge, spreads from man to man like wildfire, and the most cowardly get some sparked of courage from their brave comrades around them: on the contrary, imposing array of a large body of horse coming upon them at full speed, is enough to shake the nerves of brave men. The moral effect is very great; and the Mexican general, (Torrijon) taking advantage of this fact, to cut the square to pieces in a short time. Little did he know of the material of our army; the men behaved most nobly. Not a man moved, spoke, or fired a shot, but permitted the Lancers to approach, fire their carbines into the square, and when within a distance of thirty yards from the second front, the command was given in a distinct and audible tone of voice, for that front to "ready, aim, fire." It was well timed, and well directed; and most fatal and decisive was the effect. Thirty riders plunged headlong from their saddle never to mount again; and the others, thrown into the utmost terror and confusion, turned back to their army, and did not make their appearance again.

It was while the Lancers were retreating, that two pieces of Mexican artillery, each drawn by five mules, were seen approaching within two hundred yards of the square. Had they brought them into battery at this distance, and given the infantry a round of grape, the effect on the condensed square would have been most fatal; but they continued to approach still nearer. Whereupon Col. McIntosh called for lieut. Ridgely, who had been with him during the day with two pieces of Ringgold’s artillery, but had been detained with the main army when the fifth were ordered to the right. At this moment someone exclaimed ‘there he comes!’ and sure enough he was discovered approaching from the direction of the army, his horses flying at the very top of their speed, and in an incredibly short space of time had reached the square, wheeled his guns into battery, unlimbered, and before the Mexicans had time to detach their mules from their guns, he was pouring charge of grape and canister into them from his battery.

The first shot killed four gunners at one of their pieces, and was followed up by other equally effective, which soon placed "Messieurs Mexicanos"completely "hors du combat,"and drove them back in double quick time back to their lines without firing a shot in return.

Thus it will be seen that the 5th Infantry repulsed the Lancers with great loss on the 8th, and that lieut. Ridgely repulsed the artillery on the same day, but that the operations of each were separate and distinct from the other, and that lieut. Ridgely did not fire a shot at the Lancers, or do "any execution"among them at the time they charged the infantry.

When the bill comes to be footed up, the nation will be amazed at the extent to which the lives of our citizens have been literally sacrificed and the treasury of the nation wasted; which might have been saved by a more judicious and wise policy on the part of our rulers.

The following is an extract from the letter above referred to. It is dated at Port Lavacca on the 23rd September:

"Disease has increased in our camp alarmingly since our arrival here. Yesterday the surgeon reported 160 new cases in the hospital. Many of our boys look chapfallen at this sudden reverse of our condition, but the commander and the surgeons seem to recognize the change as one they had expected, and to feel no great degree of fear for the result. I hope by the next letter I write to give you an account of improving health in the regiment. You ought to see the boys. Their condition is a reproach to the government. They are barefooted, and some of them literally without breeches, many without hats and coats, but they stand up as proud as if they were dressed in imperial purple. The government is in debt to this regiment this day 75,000 dollars-- it has received no pay whatever, and though paymasters pass and repass, it has seen no signs of payment. Young men of education and intelligence, used to the luxuries of private life, are by this neglect absolutely turned naked in a wild country, and exposed to the climate and suffering from the weather, without any care for their condition on the part of the government they serve. They would raise a row pretty quickly, but that they respect too highly the feelings of their own officers to place them in an awkward position by drawing down on them the displeasure of the war department."

Army of the West. A letter from a distinguished officer of general Kearney's staff, dated Santa Fe, September 1, 1846, says--"Mr. Charles Bent informs me that Sublette left Fremont in May, at the head of the Sacramento, and he thinks he will return by the way of Bent's Fort.

'The rumors from below in reference to the forces collected to oppose us are very contradictory. We move in the morning to meet them, and my opinion is, that they will disperse without giving us battle.

'Nothing, however, prevents the people of the country from rising en masse to rising should take place on any extensive scale, I think it will be after Gen. Kearney leaves here for California."

NRR 71.128 October 24, 1846 requisition for additional regiments of volunteers, "mum"as to future operations, "mental food for the Army"

REQUISITION FOR VOLUNTEERS. We have from various sources, intimations that the President of the United States either has made, or is about to make requisitions upon the governors of many states for their quota of volunteers under the act of last session of congress. The Philadelphia Inquirer states that it is rumored that six regiments are called for from Pennsylvania. New York papers signify that a brigade is called for from that state, and add, Col. Webb, of the Courier & Inquirer, has applied for the command. A rumor was circulating at New Orleans at the last dates from thence, that a call had been made also upon that state. After what Louisiana has already furnished, we should hardly suppose that another requisition would be made on their patriotism, especially as her position on the frontier renders her immediately liable to any emergency, such for instance as she so promptly met when Gen. Taylor was in danger of loosing his munitions and supplies at Point Isabel.

It is supposed that those volunteers are intended for the expedition against Tampico, or Vera Cruz. The Union, of last night, has an editorial in relation to the above and other rumors, under the caption of "CALL FOR VOLUNTEERS," which says, "whether, or when, the government will call for some volunteers, we know not, and it is possible they have not as yet decided; but no such call has yet been made." The article thus concludes: "We cannot be mistaken in stating that a vigorous prosecution of the war is the order of the day. But we will not undertake to develop the plan of the campaign. The extents will duly develop themselves."

From this as well as another editorial of the Union a few days since, we judge that "mum"is to be the word in future, as to operations.

MENTAL FOOD FOR THE ARMY – "It would have done your heart good,"(says the Tract Agent, Rev. Mr. Vail, who raised $1,000 in New Orleans fir supplying the army with Christian books,) "to have witnessed the gratitude with which the soldiers received our books-in some cases, as I address-ed them, company by company, passing a formal vote of thanks-and in others in the ar'dor of their feelings giving three cheers to the American Tract Society."

NRR 71.128 October 24, 1846 comments on the inability of Secretary of the Treasury Robert John Walker to negotiate a loan with the banks, speculation on his future course United States Finances.- The unsuccessful attempt of the Secretary of the Treasury to negotiate a loan, either with the Banks or the Bankers of New York and Boston, has given rise to a number of pointed articles in the opposition journals. We have been looking for what the official journal would say upon the subject, but have met with nothing definite in its pages as yet. Letter writers at Washington intimate that the Secretary is now more than ever determined to sever all connection between the Government and the banks. He has refused such offers as they have made him. The Banks have refused the offers he made to them, and so the case stands as to the Banks. Business men were certainly alarmed, their own interests being involved and apprehensions awakened that their usual resources for making purchases and payments might be so absorbed by the banks attempting to sustain the government in its expensive war. It is now said that their remonstrances would prevent the banks from parting with funds on the terms which they had offered to Mr. Walker.

The Bankers, on the other hand, are no doubt anxious to negotiate the loan, but, - they look ahead to see what United States stock is likely to command in market some time hence – and whether the expenses of the war are not likely to throw a large amount of United States stock in some form, into the market, thereby depreciating its value. Their offer has no doubt been predicated accordingly. The Secretary of the Treasury believes that he can obtain money on better terms. It is supposed that Gen. Armstrong, Consul at Liverpool, who went out in the last steamer, has instructions to attempt to negotiate a loan in Europe, - and that the Secretary will in the mean time, rely upon the issue of Treasury notes for contingencies.

Congress will meet in six weeks from this. Mr. Walker may get on until that period, with the aid of what funds he yet has in the deposit banks, the cash he will receive for duties and sales of public lands, and the issue of treasury notes. If he can keep those notes and the U.S. stocks at par till that period, he will achieve more than many believe to be in his power. When he took charge of the treasury, United States stock was at a premium of somewhere about 16 per cent.

The period arrived at which it is natural for the people to be somewhat anxious as to the project which the Secretary will be likely to submit to Congress in his Annual report, for providing ways and means to meet the expenditures of the cifsuing. Curiosity is awake to see what amount has been expended during the past year, and especially for the two months during which we have been at war. Mr. Walker’s exhibit will be most anxiously looked for as some criterion may be formed therefrom as to the future expenses of the war.

The heavy importations of foreign goods which reduce duties will invite from abroad during the first year after the new tariff comes into operation, will replenish the public treasury and measurably relieve the government. This will continue until the goods have to be paid for and until the space is drained out to pay up the balance which our exports will fall below the amount of our imports. Then look out for the consequences of abandoning our own manufacturers, and resorting to foreign, instead of availing of a home market.

Since placing the above type we find in last nights’ Union the following:

OFFICIAL. Treasury department, October 22, 1846. This department will issue treasury notes to the amount of three millions of dollars, bearing an interest of 5 2-5 per cent per annum, payable to the order of persons or corporations making deposits therefore in specie in sums of not less than one thousand dollars, with either the Treasurer of the United States, assistant treasurer at Boston, New York, Charleston, or St. Louis, or treasurers of the mint at Philadelphia, or New Orleans. The notes will bear even date with the date of the deposite.

R.J. WALKER, secretary of the treasury.

The Union, in an editorial, noticing the advertisement says, "The notes issued will be receivable "for all public dues, both in the land office and customhouse, as well before and after maturity, and must be regard in the light, for many uses, of specie bearing interest; and at the rate now proposed, we cannot doubt, there will be a large demand for these notes."

From the National Intelligencer of the 10th instant.

It may be affirmed that there is no country in the world in which the lessons of common sense and experience are so entirely disregarded, when they conflict with party dogma, as in these Unites States. Practical and shrewd as the people pf this country certainly are, in all that concerns the ordinary pursuits-of life, this proneness to surrender their judgments, if not their consciences too, into the hands of party leaders and hyprics, constitutes a striking feature in our national character. And this remarkable inconsistency, strange to say, appears to be peculiar to the popular form of government; for in such only can demagogues rise and flourisch by party legerdeman and cajolery. A striking instance of this obedient surrender of the judgment glaring party imposture is furnished in the support still given to the sub-treasury scheme—a scheme only congenial to despotic governments, and utterly incompatible with the habits, the conveniences, and the whole social structure of free communities.—This scheme, originally broached many years ago by a southern abstractionist, was then discountenanced—he being at the moment in favor with the dominant party; but, unhappily for the country, that same party, not long after, selected it as its specious scheme for popular delusion, and put it into operation. It proved, however, so repugnant to our system of government, so impracticable indeed, and so obnoxious to the public taste, that, a wiser party coming into power, it was soon repealed and discarded. But it had now become an item of the party creed and therefore must be adhered to; and when its friends regained the ascendancy in the government it must needs be received, and all he faithful called on to stand by it. Every days experience calls on its impracticability, and its mischievous nature, even were it practicable. Its very patrons, the officers of the government, are obliged daily to violate its provisions, although their observance is enjoined under the severest penalties.

At the very moment the government organ here is singing hosannas to its wisdom, the act is treated with contempt and derision by the government itself. While one high officer is in New York begging the banks to lend the government money—receivable of course, in their notes—another proceeds thither, and with government funds buy New York bank notes to bring here for disbursement to the public creditors. And all this while the pains of the penitentiary are denounced by the law against any officer or agent who violates its provisions. The whole matter is become a farce, yet party allegiance requires the system to be upheld and defended. We have seen nothing which exhibits more strikingly the grossness of the whole hard money imposture than the two following paragraphs, appearing in the same number of the leading democratic paper of N. York, the Evening Post, which articles, indeed, gave rise to these remarks. In that paper of Wednesday we find, first, this paragraph extracted from the address of the New York Democratic Convention assembled to nominate a governor:

"Experience has shown that the fiscal transactions of the government should be disconnected with all banking institutions; that the revenue system should not be made an instrument for the circulation of a paper currency; and that these objects should only be secured by collecting the public dues and discharging the public obligations in specie; or, in other words, that the government should collect, keep, and disburse its revenues in gold and silver."

And, in the same paper, the following item of intelligence:

"the Secretary of the Treasury has been in this city several days, and, we understand offered to sell the deposite banks treasury notes from three to four millions of dollars, bearing interest at 5 per cent. The banks offered to take them at 6 per cent per annum."

NNR 71.129 October 31, 1846 GENERAL JOHN ELLIS WOOL'S division marching for Chihuahua and naval affairs

The details given this week from the seat of war, are full of interest. The operations of the navy in the Pacific, and of General Kearney in the west, furnish a tolerably distinct view of affairs in both directions. From General Wool's division we have nothing definite, except that he has marched in full force for Chihuahua. The arrival of the steamer James L Day at New Orleans on the 22nd, brings the latest intelligence. She left Port Lavaca on the 19th. The Kentucky regiment, Colonel Marshall, took up their line of March on the 13th, and the Tennessee regiment, Col.
Thomas, on the 15th for Camargo. On the 18th news reached Port Lavaca that they were now ordered to proceed to Matamoros instead of Camargo.

From Victoria, Texas, we learn that Colonel Thomas' regiment passed that place on the 5th October for Placedo's Creek where they intended to remain 8 or 10 before starting for Camargo.

Three companies of the Kentucky regiment passed through Victoria on the 6th instant, on their way to Comargo. The Advance consisted of Captains Milam’s, Lillard’s, and Pennington’s companies, and is commanded by Major Gaines. The remaining companies would leave in eight or ten days under the command of Col. Marshall.

From the "Army of Occupation" a number of interesting letters have been received, besides those which we insert, from which we shall cull for our next.

It is reported that Ampudia has been superseded in command of the army of the north, by Mejia.

The report from Monterey that Santa Anna had reached Saltillo, is manifestly premature. Accounts from the city of Mexico, via Havana, state that Santa Anna left there on the 28th with 4,000 men. He could not make the march from thence to Saltillo in less than three weeks. They had not heard of the battle of Monterey at Mexico on the 28th.

Major Graham, United States army, bearer of the President’s orders to General Taylor to terminate the armistice, left New Orleans on the 22nd for the Rio Grande, in the steamer Galveston; Captain Webb, quarter master’s department, and Lieut. Kearney with his company of U. S. dragoons, on board.

Some of the latest letters from Monterey represent the army there as being not only without adequate means of transportation, but as being upon short allowance for provisions and as requiring to be immediately reinforced.

[NRR] 71.129 October 31, 1846 Incidents and results from recent battles

"Army of Occupation"

Much anxiety has been relieved by arrival of the steam ship Galveston, at New Orleans on the 20th, bringing accounts from Monterey as late as the 6th October.

The reports from the several officers to the commanding general, of the battles at Monterey had not yet been completed. The accounts heretofore given are now confirmed in general. The N. O. Picayune says.

"Captain Owen (formerly Lieutenant) of the Baltimore battalion, left Monterey on the 6th instant, and we are indebted to him for many interesting details. He informs that the American loss in the three actions is set down at five hundred and sixty-one killed and wounded. Our correspondent, writing on the 29th ult., makes the loss a little less, but it had not then been ascertained with precision. The Mexican loss has not been, and probably never will be ascertained with precision. The Mexican loss has not been and probably never will be ascertained with certainty. It is believed to exceed one thousand."

We rejoice to learn that the report we had of the death of Col. McClung, of the Mississippi volunteers, was untrue. It was believed at Monterey on the 6th that would recover.

His friends will regret to hear that Lieut. Dilworth, of the 1st infantry, was still alive and hopes were entertained that he would recover. He was so desperately wounded that his recovery would be deemed a miracle, but he has great strength of constitution and his numerous friends do not despair.

Maj. Lear, of the 3rd infantry, is doing well, and it is believed that he will recover.

The death of Mr. Herman S. Thomas, of Harford county Md., will be deeply felt in his native state. He had joined McCulloch’s rangers to see active service, and fell in storming the second height. He was in Mr. Kendall’s mess.

The following officers, who came on the Galveston, were in the battle of Monterey;
Lieut. Sackett, United States army, Captain Nicholls, Louisiana; Lieut. B. F. Owen, Baltimore battalion; Lieut. Thomas J. Curd. --Lieut. C. is the bearer of despatches from the army to Washington.

NRR 71.129 October 31, 1846 Gen. Zachary Taylor orders up additional forces to Monterey, steamer Col. Harney and schooner Atlantic lost, duels at Camargo

General Taylor has now under his command at Monterey upward of 5,000 troops, and he is ordering up all his regulars and most of the volunteers. He feels confident of maintaining his present position against all Mexico. All the fortifications, but a short time since the glory and boast of the Mexicans, are now in Taylor's possession.

A bearer of despatches reached Matamoras from Washington, en route for Monterey, on the 5th inst., in ten days and was expected to arrive at Monterey in four more. There is quick work.

The steamer Sea, supposed to have been lost in the gale, arrived at the Brazos on the 3rd inst. She brought half a million of dollars, and steamer Whiteville which arrived on the 6th, brought 40,000 dollars more.

The Mexican force at Monterey could not have been less than 10,000 or 12,000 men; and now that their forts have been examined by our engineers, they are pronounced to be of the strongest and most scientific construction--impregnable, indeed, it would seem.

A Letter from Gen. F. Smith says--

"We have taken 32 pieces of brass cannon, and an immense amount of ordnance stores, and are now in possession of all the works, city, and surrounding country."

The steamer Colonel Harney, Captain Shannon, was totally lost on the 12th instant, on Rio Grande Bar. --Twelve persons perished, two of whom were sergeants of the U. S. Army. Captain M. could not ascertain the names of the persons lost. The Col. Harney was loaded with government stores from Brazos St. Lago, bound up the Rio Grande.

The schooner Atlantic hence for the Rio Grande, with a load of coal for the government, was also totally lost on the 8th inst. 8 miles to the south of the mouth of the Rio Grand.

The Hon. Balie Peyton and Brigadier Gen. Thomas Marshall, of the Kentucky volunteers were to have fought a duel at Camargo on the 12th inst. another duel between Capt. Munson, of N. Orleans and Capt. Cheevers, of the volunteers, was also to have taken place on the same day.

NRR 71.129 October 31, 1846 Gen. Zachary Taylor's general order No. 6, issued 29th Sept. at Camargo, respecting Mexican outlaws, provocations inducing the measure

The steamer Major Brown has left Camargo to go up the river to ascertain how far the river may be navigable, and the "flag"says it is intended to establish a military depot at the furthest navigable point, so as to have stores at at a place as near as possible to the route taken by Gen. Wool, marching from San Antonio to Chihuahua. At the last accounts she had reached Mier without meeting obstruction, and was proceeding on up. An officer was on board to survey the river and select the extreme navigable point.

Some excitement has been occasioned at Monterey by the refusal of Gen. Taylor to allow Col. Cazenau to open a stock of goods at Monterey, which he had brought there at great expense. It is said he was required to pay over to the alcalde of the city the same duties which would have exacted had a Mexican imported them for sale. The details of the affair we do not clearly understand.
The following order from Gen. Patterson will promote the safety of travelers going to and from Monterey:

ORDERS – No. 6

Headquarters Army of Occupation, Camargo, Sept. 29, 1846.

Agreeably to the terms of the armistice entered into by Maj. Gen. Z. Taylor, commanding the army of occupation and the commander of the Mexican forces at Monterey, it was established that all the troops in the service of the Mexican government should retire west of a line passing in a north and south direction, 30 miles to westward of Monterey.

All bodies of armed Mexicans, therefore, who shall be found henceforth in the neighborhood of the Rio Grande, or on the route to Monterey, will be viewed as acting without authority from their government officers, and will be considered and treated as outlaws.

The recent murders in this vicinity and on the road call for decided action, and the commanding general directs that all commanders of posts and camps on the river, and of escorts on the route use every exertion to apprehend any Mexicans who may be found in their vicinity bearing arms; and furthermore, that in the event of resistance or attempt to escape of said Mexicans, they shall be treated as outlaws and enemies to mankind, and shall be fired upon by troops and captured or destroyed.

ARMY OF THE CENTRE – GEN. WOOL.

I avail myself a short respite from my arduous duties to give you some little information in regard to the movements and operations of this division of the invading army. I arrived here on the 20th Sept. from La Baca, after a somewhat fatiguing journey. On the 26th ultimo the advance of this army left from Presidio Rio Grande, consisting of the following troops, viz: company B, 4th light artillery, under captain Washington: two companies 2d dragoons, under brevet major Beall; three companies 6th infantry, and one company Kentucky volunteers, under major Bonneville, United States army; six companies Arkansas cavalry under colonel Yell; four companies of Illinois volunteers, under captains Webb and Morgan; corps of pioneers, artificers, &c. under command of captain Lee, of the engineers U. States army; a train of one hundred and eighteen wagons, loaded with subsistence, ammunition and quartermasters stores, boats and lumber, for making a flying bridge across the Rio Grande- the train under charge of captain O. Cross, assistant quartermaster United States army. The entire command of col. Wm. S. Harney, 2d dragoons, amounting to fourteen hundred effective men.

On the morning of the 29th ultimo. Gen. Wool, with a portion of his staff, and escorted by two companies of the first dragoons, left here to overtake the advance.

Col. Churchill, inspector general is left in command of the rear division, to follow the remainder of the forces as soon as a sufficient number of wagons (now en route for this place) shall arrive from La Baca. Major Thomas, chief of the quartermasters department, also remains for the purpose of hastening the forwarding of supplies, &c. and will be here in about five days, with col. Churchill and the remainder of the forces, to join gen. Wool at the Presidio, when the entire forces under his command will march upon Chihuahua. Eight companies of the first regiment volunteers, (Illinois) took up their line of march yesterday for the Presidio, under the command of Col. J.J. Hardin, with a train of twenty four wagons and two pieces of cannon.

The wagons with supplies and stores, are rapidly arriving; one train of fifteen wagons came in on the 30th ultimo, and one to-day of twenty-one wagons.

It is almost impossible to imagine the difficulties encountered by the quartermasters department towards fitting out and preparing the "trains"for transporting supplies. In the first place the mules have to be broken to work in harness. There is a scarcity of teamsters, and inefficient wagon-masters are sent from New Orleans, where they are picked up and sent out upon their representing that they are first rate teamsters – the greater part of whom scarcely know how to harness a mule, not to speak of their driving a five mule team.

Too much praise cannot be awarded to maj. Thomas for his untiring exertions and unceasing vigilance in organizing the department, and protecting the interest of the service from the depredations of those who are constantly devising means to cheat the government. It was really amusing to see coming into La Baca with old wagons and broken down oxen to sell to the government, for which the most exorbitant prices were asked. Six hundred dollars has been asked for a wagon and five yoke of oxen, for which three hundred dollars would be a great price. Individuals have an idea that the government must purchase from them at any price, and that government officers are bound to believe what they say, without examination. However, they found major Thomas an officer possessing to much practical knowledge to be taken in by them. Consequently he is abused in the newspapers in the most outrageous manner, and why? For the simple reason that they cannot deceive him and rob the government.

The Picayune publishes a series of letters from Monterey from Mr. Kendall, from which we select the following items:--

Speaking of wounded comrades reminds me of poor Thomas. He was one of the most daring fellows in McCulluch's company, and had his horse wounded in the charge the enemy's lancers made upon us on the morning of the 21st. On the following morning, while storming the battery on the height overlooking the Bishop's Palace, he was mortally wounded, and after suffering incredibly died on the morning of the 24th. A musket ball shattered his hip joint, at the same time that the brave Capt. Gillespie was shot through, and the two are now quietly resting side by side on the height where they received their death wounds—Mount Gillespie, as it has been appropriately named by Gen. Worth. The friends of Thomas are among the most respectable in Maryland; he was in the same mess as myself, and it may afford his acquaintances some consolation to know that every attention was paid him, during his last hours, that circumstances would admit.

I saw Ampudia as he left town for Saltillo on the morning of the 26th - rode along in his escort for a mile or two. The base and lying wretch, for every page in his black history proves him such—looked crest-fallen, nervous, and timid to a degree. He was fearful less some of the Texas rangers, many of whom had deep wrongs to avenge, might shoot him from the way-side; and as he rode through their encampment, situated directly on their route, he could not conceal his fears. They allowed him to pass, however, without even a cry or shout of exultation.

A great many are discontented at the terms given the Mexicans, and think that they now will certainly fight again after being let off so easily. Had the battle continued on the 24th three hours longer, the Mexicans would undoubtedly have been on their knees crying and begging for their lives.

A terrible carnage would have ensued had not Ampudia sent in proposals for the surrender of the town, for his forces were huddled, if I can use such a term; and all this General Taylor well knew. To carry out the known conciliatory policy of our government, however, appears to have been his aim—to spare life and property, in accordance with his instructions, his object—and this should relieve him from all censure in the matter. For myself, I believe the whole policy of our government is, and has been wrong for years.

General Taylor is still encamped at the old ground, three mile from here—Generals Worth and Smith are in town. The main part of the wounded officers are doing well. Gen. Butler is recovering, while Colonel McClung and Mitchell are also in a fair way.

Our army has taken, or rather, retained, thirty-five pieces of artillery, many of which are valuable, and as much ammunition as will ever be needed to use with them. The killed and wounded of the enemy cannot be ascertained with any degree of certainty, nut it is known now that there loss far exceeded ours. The reports of the different commanders in General Taylor's army have not all been sent in yet, but enough is known to render it certain that our loss will not very twenty from five hundred killed and wounded. A considerable number of the wounded will die, so that the number who will have lost their lives will be about three hundred. Gen. Worth lost eighty, killed and wounded; about twenty killed, or have died since battle.

The large fort on the north of the town is a very strong work, and it would have cost a heavy sacrifice of life to have taken it. It is built scientifically—has four salients, each of which is pierced for eight guns. Inside of the walls, which are apparently new, and 'which enclose an area of some two or three acres are the thick walls of an unfinished cathedral, inside of which are twenty very large pillars intended for the support of the roof. These pillars are at least twelve feet square at the base; and, like the walls, are about 20 feet high. The walls of the fort are solid and neatly built, having a gateway and drawbridge on the side next to the city.
THE MARCH AGAINST MONTEREY. We have published very full accounts of the three days siege of Monterey and the capitulations of the Mexican troops occupying the town and fortifications. The correspondent of the New Orleans Picayune, in his letters written previous to the 19th, furnishes some of the progress of interesting sketches and explanations of the progress of the invading army, or which we at once avail ourselves.

Seralvo, Mexico, Evening, September 11, 1846.

Gentlemen—The following order has just been read at parade. It is important, and I hasten to furnish you with it in time for the express or mail carrier who goes down tomorrow. It is better than all the rumors that have emanated from the army these two months:

Head quarters, army of occupation.
Seralvo, September 11, 1846.

[ORDERS NO. 115.]

1. As the army may expect to meet resistance in the further advance towards Monterey, it is necessary that the march should be conducted with all proper precaution to meet attack and secure the baggage and supplies. From this point the following will be the order of march until otherwise directed:

2. All the pioneers of the army, consolidated into one party, will march early tomorrow on the route to Marin, for the purpose of repairing the roads and rendering it practicable for artillery and wagons.—The pioneers of each division will be under a subaltern to be specially detailed for the duty, and the whole will be under the command of Capt. Craig, 3d infantry, who will report to head quarters for instructions. This pioneer party will be covered by a squadron of dragoons and captain McCulluch’s company of rangers. Two officers of topographical engineers, to be detailed by capt. Williams, will accompany the party for the purpose of examining the route. Two wagons will be provided by the quartermaster’s department for the transportation of the tools, provisions, and knapsacks of the pioneer party.

3. The first division will march on the 13th inst. to be followed on successive days by the 2d division and field division of volunteers. The head quarters will march with the first division; capt. Gillespie with half of his company, will report to major gen.
Butler; the other half, under the 1st lieutenant, to brig. Gen. Worth. These detachments will be employed for out posts and videttes, and as expresses between the column and head quarters.

4. The subsistence supplies will be divided between the three columns, the senior commissary of each division receipting for the stores and being charged with their care and management. The senior commissaries of divisions will report to capt.
Waggaman for this duty.

5. Each division will be followed immediately by its baggage train and supply train, with a strong rear guard. The ordinance train under captain Ramsay will march with the third division, between it’s baggage and supply train, and will come under the protection of the guard of that division. The medical supplies will, in like manner, march with the first division.

6. The troops will take eight days rations and forty rounds of ammunition. All surplus arms and accoutrements, resulting from casualties on the road, will be deposited with lieut. Stewart, left in charge of the depot at this place, who will give certificates of depot to the company commanders.

7. The wagons appropriated for the transportation of water will not be required, and will be turned over to the quartermaster’s department for general purposes.

8. Two companies of the Mississippi regiment will be designated for the garrison of this place. All sick and disabled men, unfit for march will be left behind, under the charge of a medical officer to be selected for this duty by the medical director. By order of major general Taylor.

NNR 71.130-71.131 October 31, 1846 "march of the second division of the select six thousand"

On the road to Monterey, Mexico,
14 miles from Marin, in camp, Sept. 15, 1846

GENTLEMEN—We are encamped for we know no how many hours—for an express has just arrived from gen. Taylor, bringing orders for us to overtake him in the morning—and I will foot up our progress to this place, by copying from my note book:

Second division of the select six thousand—march from Servalo to Monterey.

Sept. 14—The 2d division under general Worth, which was ordered to march to-day—the 1st division, under general Twiggs, having marched yesterday—had just placed their personal clothing and accoutrements in convenient conditions for packing yesterday evening, when they were called out for inspection, orderlies, servants, and all, leaving their tents unattended. Just as gen. Worth appeared on the field a heavy rain, accompanied with wind, commenced, and, prostrating many of the tents, soaking every thing in camp. At 2 o'clock this morning, the reveille beat, and the poor fellows, with all their duds still wet, commenced their preparations for the march. The tents were at once struck and packed—wagons were brought up to receive the tent poles, camp kiddles, &c.—private mules and pack horses were harnessed—camp women with children at the breast, and of all sizes, packed themselves and little ones upon Mexican mules and ponies, and, by daylight the column was in motion. The rear guard did not get off until 11 o'clock. The day has been exceedingly warm. We have marched twelve miles, over a country different in every respect from any I have ever before seen. The shrubbery and plants are entirely new to me, with the exception of the eternal cactus, which grows all over Mexico, in a hundred varieties. The wild olive, and a white, round leaf shrub with pink colored blossoms, cover the mountains and table lands. We have crossed five or six clear, cool streams to-day, and are encamped upon the brow of a ravine, down which runs a spring brook. On one side of the ravine is a perpendicular rock of limestone filled with slate pebbles. From this rock hundreds of cool streams gush out, and opposite the headquarters of the old 7th infantry, is a basin of cold, clear water, about five feet deep into which at least one thousand of our men have plunged, this evening. This stream is full of pataxas (sun fish) and trout.

15, we are now about 14 miles from Marin. We passed a few moments since, a rancho which had just been deserted in great taste—the cows, goats and chickens having been left behind. We left camp this morning at four o'clock. Our way has led along the foot of a mountain which rises on our right to a height 2,500 to 3,000 feet. We likewise have a mountain on our left, of nearly the same height. These two mountains converge before us, and descend at the same time, to about the level of the table lands upon which we now are. But far in the distance before us rises the Sierra Madre, higher and more majestic than any we have before seen. Our march has been over a very bad road to-day. Up hill and down—all rocks and pebbles, ravines and mines. The whole country over which we have to-day traveled is covered with aged "Spanish bayonet" trees, a species of palm, each leaf of which is pointed with a sharp thorn. Some of these trees are two and a half to three feet in diameter, and must be from 150 to 200 years old. As we reached this camping place, and express came from gen. Taylor, directing this division to join him at Marin by a forced march. We are, therefore, bivouacked, ready to march at a moment's warning. It seems that the Mexicans are assembled in force, between here and Monterey, and that Santa Anna himself is in the field. [Rumor.] There is no doubt about there being a strong force at Monterey, and gen. Taylor therefore directs that the 1st and 2d divisions shall join to-morrow, and march before the town.—Capt. Graham of the dragoons, had a skirmish last night near Marin, with some Mexican videttes, and killed one or two, and took two or three more prisoners. As I have said before, it is the opinion of most of the officers, that a harder fight is in store than has before taken place. Gen. Worth keeps his division always in readiness, so that he could hardly be surprised by night or day. Last night a sort of stampede was got up in camp, and we shall have another night of course. I can not help thinking that if an alarm were to come off to-night, a most singular scene would follow. We are bivouacked in a thicket of trees, or large shrubs, all of which have thorns. To walk through them without stooping and dodging about to avoid the thorns, is impossible. Horses and mules are tied by long lassos, in every direction. The whole thicket, as well as the road for a half mile, is filled with men stretched out on blankets, chatting about the probabilities of a fight—some predicting that no such happiness is in reserve for them, whilst others of more experience, think differently. Gen. Taylor enters Marin to-night, and will there consolidate his little army. We march to-morrow morning at half past 3.

NNR 71.131-10/31/1846 Ampudia's Address to His Troops

Ampudia's Address to His Troops. The following is a translation of gen. Ampudia's address to his troops upon learning of the advance of gen. Taylor upon that city, forwarded to us by our correspondent. The address is conceived in good taste, and it is useful showing the mounted force of the enemy hovering upon the skirts of our army, and the estimation in which Ampudia held gen. Taylor's troops.

The general in chief of the army of the North to his companions in arms

Soldiers - The enemy numbering only 2,500 regular troops, the remainder being only a band of adventurers without valor or discipline, are, according to reliable information, about advancing upon Seralvo, to commit the barbarity of attacking this most important place. We count near 3,000 regulars and auxiliary cavalry, and these will defeat them again and again, before they can reach this city. Soldiers, we are constructing fortifications secure, and hence we will sally forth at a convenient time and drive back this enemy at the point of the bayonet.

Soldiers! Three great virtues make the soldier worthy of his profession; discipline, constancy under fatigue, and valor. He who at this moment would desert his colors, is a coward and a traitor to his country. Our whole nation, and even foreign countries are the witnesses of your conduct. The question now is, whether our independence shall be preserved or forever lost; and its solution is in your hands.

I have assured the supreme government of the triumph of our arms, confiding in your loyalty and enthusiasm, and we will prove to the whole world that we are worthy sons of the immortal Hidalgo, Morelo, Allende, Iturbide, and so many other heroes who knew how to die combatting for the independence of our cherished country.

Soldiers! Victory or death must be our only device.

PEDRO DE AMPUDIA.

NNR 71.132 10/31/1846 San Juan D'Ulloa

The London Daily news gives the subjoined minute description of this famous castle:

"On the termination of the war with Spain, after the miserable remains of their garrison had been sent off to Havana. I went with two companions over the castle of San Juan d'Ulloa. It is a tremendous place if at all well manned. No wonder it had held out so long. Had it not been for the raging of the yellow fever within its walls and the want of provisions, the Mexicans would never have taken it without a naval force very superior o the one they possessed, though they have never since had any force comparable to that one.

"The outer walls of this fortress are of immense thickness-upwards of twelve feet; and in the positions most exposed, the walls are seventeen or eighteen feet in depth of solid white stone. It is a very porous and rather soft stone, so that balls do not split or crack it so much as they quietly embed themselves. These outer walls have batteries all round; the guns are well planted, with here and there a neat corner for mortar. The inner walls are so constructed that if the outer walls are gained it would still be at a slaughterous expense to the besiegers, if the garrison were at all competent to avail themselves of their position."
We entered the fortress from below at the principal gate, which was of great strength, and very skillfully contrived; and then went along a stone passage, which had several gateways, and cunningly devised 'narrow passes, with high stone walls on each side. This was terminated by a canal, or moat, with a draw-bridge over it. We next arrived at flights of stairs, and passing up several vault-like ascents, we gained the top of the grand batteries. The general characteristics is that of great strength, and plenty of room to work in. They mounted 120 long 24-pounders, all of brass. They were, for the most part, in excellent condition. The mortars were of large calibre, though not in such good order as the guns. The powder magazines were each literally a dry stone well, plugged at the top with blankets, and having a round metal lid over the mouth that opened upon the batteries.

We next descended to the inner works, and gained the secondary walls by a circuitous route. Besides the necessity to the besiegers of having guides who well knew every turn of the works, the excitement and smoke are almost certain to produce a confusion, in which the voice or presence of the guides would be lost, and the party dashing onward might only arrive at a dead wall, a gap looking out upon the sea, or the mouth of a twenty-four pounder. -The circuitous route of our descent from the upper to the lower range of walls was entirely exposed to their batteries, the guns grinning at us all the way, like so many black tusks, as we traversed stone causeways and narrow passes. Whole regiments might here be raked down, after they had conquered thee outer walls. But the "chances of war"are numerous; and one imperfection in the greatest power (if otherwise perfect) may render it inapplicable, and perhaps ridiculous. On arriving at their inner batteries, we found the guns in a wretched condition. They were better than a Chinese effect "calculated"to strike terror into his mind. But one may imagine how very angry the subtle architect of this formidable castle would have been, could we have seen his excellent arrangements for the safe and nearly certain destruction of the assailants thus rendered abortive.

We now descended a very wide and steep flight of stone stairs which led down into the grand castle square, or little town, as one might call it. --We entered at the bottom through some gateways, [the architect had never passed an opportunity for giving besieged protection in retreating, and time to rally] and then found ourselves in a large open square, enclosed on all sides by very lofty walls, the lower part of which displayed the doors and entrances into the barracks, guard houses, and shops of various kinds for the sale of such articles as a garrison would need. The governor's house is at the farther end. -- It was a genuine soldier's lodgement, and very bare of ornament, except for that of war, for it was riddled all over with the marks of shot and shell. Its strong covered balcony, intended to serve as a protection both from the broiling sun and from the fall of missels, was in many places torn in long gaps. All the towers and buildings of any elevation had also been knocked about and defaced by the shot and shells from Vera Cruz, previous to the surrender of the castle. But the mutilations and destruction did not materially affect the strength of the place. Very few of the guns had been dislodged; even the outer batteries were not injured so as to render them ineffective, with the exception of a gap of ruins in one or two places. There is about a mile's breadth of sea running between San Juan d'Ulloa and the town of Vera Cruz.

"How strongly and skilfully this fortress is protected by art the reader has now some idea: but San Juan d'Ulloa is equally protected by nature; for while the defences of art which I have briefly described are chiefly devoted to the side and angle facing town, those angles which face the main ocean on the opposite side, or back of the castle, are protected by a long succession of rocky reefs, utterly defying the approach of any vessels of war. Many black and rotting wrecks visible even at high water, attested some of the natural 'terrors of the place. ' -But in these days it is generally understood by all military men that no place is impregnable, and that thorough soldiers, well officered and led, can, and will, and do, take any place. At what cost, is not the question. The thing can be done."

[NCR]
government, invaded the territory of the United States north of the Rio Grande, and had attacked the forces under Gen. Taylor, and that the squadron of the United States was blockading the coast of Mexico on the Gulf.

“These hostilities, he considered, would justify commencing offensive operations of the west coast.—He therefore sailed on the 8th, in the Savannah, for the coast of California, leaving the Warren at Mazatlan, to bring any dispatches or important information that might reach there. We arrived at Monterey on the 2d on July, where we found the Cyane and Levant, and learned that the Portsmouth was at San Francisco.

“On the morning of the 7th, having previously examined the defenses and localities of the town, the commodore sent Captain Mervine, with a summons to the military commandment of Monterey, requiring him to surrender the place forthwith to the forces of the United States. In reply, he stated that he was not authorized to surrender the place, and referred the commodore to the commanding general of California, Don Jose Castro.

“Every arrangement having been made the day previous, the commodore immediately embarked the necessary force (about two hundred and fifty seamen and marines) in the boats of the squadron, which landed at ten o'clock, under cover of the guns of the ships, with great promptitude and good order, under the immediate command of Capt. Wm. Mervine, assisted by Commander H.N. Page as second.

“The forces were immediately formed and marched to the custom-house, where commodore Sloat's proclamation to the inhabitants of California was read, the standard of the U. States hoisted, amid three hearty cheers by the troops and foreigners present, and a salute of twenty-one guns fired by all ships. Immediately afterwards the proclamation, both in English and Spanish, was posted up about the town, and two justices of the peace appointed to preserve order and punish delinquencies,-the alcaldes declining to serve.

“Previous to landing a ‘general order,’ was read to the crews of all the ships for their guidance under the new circumstances in which they were placed. We feel confident that the inhabitants of Monterey and all other places where our forces were, have been safe from the least depredation or the slightest insult.

“Immediately after taking possession of Monterey Com. Sloat dispatched a courier to General Castro, the military commandment of California, with a letter and a copy of his proclamation, to which he received a reply. On the 9th, he despatched a letter by courier to Sr. Pio Pico, the governor of Santa Barbara.

“On the 6th of July he dispatched orders by sea to Com. Montgomery to take immediate possession of the bay of San Francisco; &c. and at 7 a.m. of the 9th, that officer hoisted the flag at San Francisco-read and posted up commodore Sloat’s proclamation, and took possession of that part of the country in the name of the U. States.

On the 13th, at the request of the foreigners at the Pueblo of San Jose, the commodore furnished a flag to be furnished at that place—about 70 miles interior from Monterey, and appointed a justice of the peace to preserve order in the town—the alcaldes declining to serve. The flag was hoisted on the 16th.

On the 8th, Commodore Sloat selected Purser D. Fauntleroy to organize a company of 35 dragoons from volunteers from the ships, and citizens on shore to reconnoitre the country—keep the communication between Monterey and San Francisco, and to prevent the people of the country from being robbed &c., &c., and directed him to purchase the necessary horses and equipment to mount them.

Passed midshipman Louis McLane having also volunteered for that service, he appointed him first lieutenant of that company. On the 17th, Fauntleroy was directed to reconnoitre the country with his command as far as the mission of St. Johns—to take possession of that place—hoist the flag, and to recover ten brass guns said to have been buried there by Gen. Castro when he retreated from that place. On his arrival there, Mr. Fauntleroy found that place had been taken possession of an hour or two previous by Capt. Fremont, with whom he returned to Monterey on the 19th. He was subsequently sent to garrison the place, dig up, mount the guns, and recover a large quantity of powder and shot, said to have been secreted there; all of which he accomplished before we sailed for Monterey; between which—the Pueblo of San Jose and San Francisco, a perfectly free communication was maintained.
On the Afternoon of the 15th July the Congress arrived with Commodore Stockton.

On the 16th, the British Admiral, Sir George F. Seymour, arrived in the Collingwood, 80. An officer was immediately sent by Commodore Sloat to tender him the usual courtesies and the facilities of the port. He was subsequently furnished topgallant masts and other spars for his ship, and sailed on the 22d for the Sandwich islands.

The visit of the admiral, I have no doubt was very serviceable to our cause in California, as the inhabitants fully believed he would take part with them, and that we would be obliged to abandon our conquest; but when they saw the friendly intercourse subsisting between the two commanders, and found that he could not interfere on their behalf, they abandoned all hope of ever seeing the Mexican flag fly in California again.

On the 23d Commodore Sloat directed Commodore Stockton to assume command of the forces and operations on shore, and on the 29th, having determined to return to the United States via Panama, he hoisted his broad pendant on board the Levant, and sailed for Mazatlan and Panama, leaving the remainder of the squadron under his command.

At the time of our leaving Monterey, the United States were in quiet possession of all 'Alta California' north of Santa Barbarra.

The Cyane sailed for St. Diego on the 26th to carry down Captain Fremont, with about 150 riflemen, (Americans,) to take possession there, and to cut off General Castro's retreat to Lower California or Mexico. The Congress was to sail on the 30th for San Pedro, to take possession there. That place is 27 miles from the city of Angelos, where General Castro and Governor Pico then were; and it was believed that immediately on their arrival they would surrender, which would put an end to all opposition to the United States in the Californias."

The Philadelphia U.S. Gazette has also the following letter, dated-

U.S. flagship Savannah,
Monterey, Territory of California, July 27, 1846

SIR: I send you this by the sloop of war Levant, which is bound to Panama, Commodore John D. Sloat, who comes home by that way, and send you all the news I am in possession of. We left Mazatlan on the 9th of June and arrived at this place on the 2d of July, all well. On entering the bay we found lying at anchor the sloops of war Levant and Cyane, and on the 15th of July the frigate Congress, Commodore R. F. Stockton, arrived-all well.

On the 7th of July, 1846 at half past 10 o'clock, we sent our boats ashore, armed, under the command of Captain Mervine, took the place, hoisted the American ensign and saluted it with twenty one guns, and ever since we have had a strong guard on shore to protect the place. From all appearances the inhabitants are well satisfied. On Sunday, 19th of July, Col. Fremont, and his party arrived here. A nobler looking set of men I never saw. Full of health and vigor. They have a Delaware Indian chief with them, and some Indians of the same tribe.

We have had the pleasure of a visit from Col. Fremont. We have received official information that the flag of the United States is now flying at Yerba Bueno, St. Johns, Sutlas fort on the Sacramento, Laviritli, Somona, and Bodega, and that the forces of the United States have quiet possession of the Bay of San Francisco, and all the country within one hundred miles around, to the manifest satisfaction of the inhabitants, many of whom have enrolled themselves under the flag and officers for protection.—In taking possession of these places, many fine pieces of brass ordinance have been acquired. The sloop of war Portsmouth Captain Montgomery, is lying at San Francisco, taking care of that part of the country.

As Commodore Sloat leaves us, we shall be under the command of Com. R.F. Stockton, and Captain Mervine takes command of our ship and Capt. Dupont of the sloop of war Cyane. We expect to leave this place in two or three months for home. I think it is most time, for next October we have been out three years, and by the time we get home it will make our cruise three years and six months. We are all well, and our ship is in beautiful order. We are very sorry to lose our commodore, for he is very popular with us. The barque Sterling of Boston, is here at anchor, and on the 4th of July the barque Angola left this place of Oahu and the East Indies: [MJK]

Mexican Movements.

Extract of a letter from an officer in the squadron, dated

"Off Vera Cruz, Sept. 22.

The files of the El Indicator and other journals contain intelligence of passing events, with nearly all the decrees issued since the formation of the new cabinet, but for the increase of the military force, and regulation of other branches of the government.—The national guard in being organized: and from the statements in the public papers, the measure would seem to be a popular one, as the citizens are said to offer themselves freely to be enrolled. The decree embraces every citizen from the age of sixteen to fifty. The citizens of Puebla have armed and equipped a force of one thousand men, at their own expense, for the service of the government. General Santa Anna entered the city of Mexico on the 14th inst. with a great parade. In his letter, written to the minister of war on the occasion, he states his intention of proceeding immediately to assume the command of the army on the northern frontier, and disclaims any design of accepting the supreme power, if his services are required in the field.

The report which was previously mentioned of his having given orders to the army at Monterey to fall back on San Luis Potosi, is contradicted by Gen. Mejia, in the dispatch dated at Monterey, Aug. 24.—He states that a force of eight thousand men will soon be assembled there, and he will defend the place to the last extremity. It is said that our army is in possession of Santa Fe.

The present government has manifested in great activity since its accession to power, and adopted every measure for a vigorous prosecution of the war.—Detachments of troops from the city and other parts of Mexico, with thirty pieces of artillery, have been lately dispatched from the north, and by the end of the month it is not unlikely they will have a force of 15,000 men — or perhaps more, in the neighborhood of Monterey. It is difficult to say how this large force is to be kept in the field, as it is well known the public treasury is empty. The only money received by the government, within our knowledge, are the small sums contributed by private individuals, not sufficient to maintain a regiment for a month."

There is a report that Com. Stewart us to have the command of the naval force in the gulf, and that the big ship, the Pennsylvania, which is now being fitted out at Norfolk, will be his flagship.

The U. S. schooner Bonita, command by Lient. BENHAM, Passed midshipmen THOMPSON and COLBY, and Midshipman PHELPS, was cruising at the entrance of the harbor of Vera Cruz where the recent gale commenced, since which nothing has been seen of her. It is probably she was lost.

Capture of a Mexican brig of war. From a letter published in the city of Mexico, it appears that the Mexican brig of war Malek-Adhel was captured in the ports of Mazatlan by one of our vessels, supposed to be the sloop of war Warren. The Warren being outside, despatched five launches, well armed, to capture the Mexican then at anchor in the bay. The officers and crew on board the brig, unprepared for an attack, took to their boats in great confusion on the appearance of the Americans. Two officers named Zerega and Cilloio, and several sailors, were taken prisoners. The moment the "Yankees" found themselves masters of the vessel, they cut her cables and made sail for the frigate.

NRR 71.134-10/31/1846 Stockton's Proclamation

To all whom it may concern. I, J. R. Stockton, commodore, and commander in chief of the United States naval forces in the Pacific Ocean, and governor and commander in chief of the territory of California, do, by the authority of the president and congress of the United States of America, hereby declare all the ports, harbors, bays, outlets, and inlets on the west coast of Mexico, south of San Diego, to be in a state of vigorous blockade, which will be made absolute except against armed vessels of neutral nations.

All neutral merchant vessels found in any of the bays and harbors on said coast on arrival of the blockading force, will be allowed twenty days to leave.

Given under my hand and seal, this nineteenth day of August, A. D. one thousand eight hundred and forty six, at the government house in the "Ciuod de los Angelos," the capital of California.

[Signed] J. R. STOCKTON

Commodore and commander in chief of the naval forces of the U. S. in the Pacific Commodore Stockton has declared the whole of the coast of Mexico in a state of blockade. He has established himself governor in the capital of Upper California. It is reported that the ports of Lower California are to be taken possession of, and San Blas made a rendezvous for the squadron and their prizes.

The Cyane arrived off San Blas on the 2d of this month and sent the notification of the blockade to the authorities. She is cruising off the coast, occasionally anchors in the bay, and has seized a couple of coasting vessels. Another vessel has also arrived off Mazatian, and has cut out of that harbor a coasting vessel.

Commodore Sloat Returning Home--arrived at Havana on the 7th inst. - accompanied by five or six of his officers, having left at Monterey Pacific, U. S. frigate Congress, bearing the broad pendant of Commodore Stockton. The officers and crew of the squadron were all in excellent health. Commodore Sloat hoisted his pennant at Havana on the 10th inst. on board the U. S. brig Perry, and would sail for Norfolk or Charleston in a few days.

Gen. Castro employed to revolutionize California

The Philadelphia North American has the following interesting letter, dated

U. S. frigate Congress,
Monterey, California, July 26, 1846

We proceed from Callao to the Sandwich Islands; we made the passage in 28 days, though it covers about six thousand miles. We landed Mr. Van Eyk, our new commissioner, and Mr. Turrell, our new consul at Honolulu under appropriate salutes, and commodore Stockton introduced the new commissioner to the king; we found the missionaries in good health, actively employed, and received from them many kind attentions. We visited all their schools and were highly gratified. In these are educated those on whom the destiny of these islands depends. Nothing struck me here with so much force as the huge volcanoes, which threw up these islands to the light of heaven, which ages became extinct, but which still lift their towering cones, which look out in savage grandeur on the seas.

We sailed from Honolulu on the 22d of June, and arrived here after a passage of 28 days. We found all Monterey in a state of revolution and the American flag flying over Monterey. There has been but little fighting as yet, as Gen. Castro with his forces has retired to the south. Commodore Stockton had dispatched the Cyane, with Capt. Fremont and his two hundred riflemen to cut off his retreat, and the commodore, with marines of the squadron, is to engage him as he wheels about to the north. He is a savage military chieftain—usurper who has covered this country for years with rapine and blood.—He massacred in the most brutal manner, but a few days since three American residents here. His overthrow will be hailed by the natives as well as foreigners. He is held as an outlaw by both.

This revolution commenced in an attempt to drive all of foreign birth, who had settled here and were not Roman Catholics, out of the country. The proscribed party took up arms, appointed Mr. Ide, of the United States, their leader, declared California free of Mexican rule, and avowed their determination to make her an independent republic.

They took Sonoma, an important town, the inhabitants joined them, fortified the place, and repelled successfully, every force sent against them. When Monterey was taken by our squadron, they immediately put up the American flag. On the arrival of Captain Fremont from the west they joined him and came here; Captain Fremont took up arms in consequence of having been assaulted, while engaged in his surveys, by the forces of General Castro. He is a man of great coolness and resolution. His original force consisted of thirty, but since he espoused the republican cause his force has increased, by volunteers, to three hundred: but they are now all under the command of Commodore Stockton. They will debark from Cyane, when she reaches her destination, mount fresh horses, and take the field with their rifles, revolving pistols, and rapiers, glistening in light over their buckskins.

We have taken the harbor of San Francisco, and our flag floats over the bright beauties of the Sacramento. All California will, in a few months, be under its protection. The natives, disgusted by the sway of military chieftains, are flying to it for repose, for hope, and blessings of a republican government. Our government cannot pull it down if they wanted, or make it stay down. The people will run it up again: are determined to establish anew state and connect themselves with our Union.—Mexico cannot prevent this. She has had but very little to do with California for years, and has abandoned her to the cruel sway of bloody usurpers, till the people have at last risen in arms. We are going to aid them, and if you cannot find the defense of our conduct in the let-alone policy, then look into the obligations of humanity, which rests on nations as on individuals. Having established a free representative government, extending its protection alike to all classes, we expect to withdraw. But the government will stand, for its foundations will be laid in the allections and confidence of the nation.

Our squadron consists of the Congress, Savannah, Cyane, Portsmouth, Warren, Levant, and schooner Shark. The Columbus is expected here in a few days from the East Indies. The Savannah, Warren, and Levant have been out here three years and ought to return, but will be detained until difficulties are settled, or they are relieved, except the Levant—she leaves for home and lands Commodore Sloat at Panama, when he will cross the isthmus and reach the United States by West India steamers. The officers and crew are in general god health. As spirit of cheerfulness and activity pervades all ranks. We are patrolling streets under arms, building forts, and administering law and justice.

GENERAL KEARNEY AND THE ARMY OF THE WEST

We have been favored with the following extract of an unofficial journal of 1st Lieut. Emory, of the corps of Topographical Engineers. Lieut. Emory is Chief of the Engineer staff of General Kearney’s command. We are pleased with the opportunity of laying before our readers such scenes as are here described, with so much novelty and freshness around them. The author of the journal, Lieutenant Emory, is distinguished for his superior intelligence as an officer and a man.

EXTRACTS FROM THE JOURNAL.

August 2d, 1846. I looked in the direction of Bent’s Fort, and saw a large United States flag flowing to the breeze, and straining every fiber of an ash pole that was planted over the center of the gateway, with no very mathematical regard to centering or perpendicularity. The reason of this display was soon explained by a column of dust to the east, advancing with the velocity of a fast-walking horse. It was the "Army of the West." I ordered my horse hitched up, and as the column passed, took my place with the staff."

"The river was forded without difficulty, opposite the fort, being paved with well-rounded pebbles of primitive rock.

We advanced five miles along the river, where its bed slides over a black carbonaceous shale, which has been mistaken for coal, and induced the Bents to dig for it.

Here we turn to the left and pursue our course over an arid and elevated plain for twenty miles, without water, and when we reach the Timpas, find the water in puddles, and the grass bad.

Colonial Doniphan was ordered to pursue the Arkansas to near the mouth of the Timpas, and join the army, following the bead of that stream.
Near where we left the Arkansas, found on the side of the slope several singular demi-spheriods protruded from the ground, about the size of an umbrella, coated with a singular substance, (specimen 22) in pyramidal crystals.

The growth along this part of the Arkansas consists of mean grass and few cottonwoods; on the plains very short grass, burned to a cinder; artemesia in abundance. The only animals seen were one black-tail rabbit, and one antelope—both killed.

Our march 26, that of the army 37 miles. The last twenty miles without water. The artillery did not get up until 11 P.M.; horses and men parched with thirst. The teamsters, who had to encounter the dust suffered extensively; when water was near, they sprang from their seats, and ran for it like madmen. Two horses sunk under the march.

August 3d.—Ascended the Timpas 6 miles, and halted for the day, near running water; the grass was all burned dry, not a green sprig to be seen; passed three buttes of singular appearance, composed of limestone, and (specimens 23 and 24) evidently of ingenious origin: saw more of the nodules described yesterday; passed the dry bed of a river, with bottom paved with argillaceous limestone, containing now and then the impression of shells, very distinct. The valley in which we are now encamped presents the appearance of a crater being surrounded with buttes capped with stunted cedar. The stratification, however, appears regular.

Growth—an evergreen (see specimen) which Fitzpatrick says is the Fremont. A beautiful cactus three feet high, with round limbs, shaped like a rope, three and a half inches in diameter. It is said the Mexicans make hedges out of it.

Doniphan’s regiment passed our camp about four P.M. Water saltish. Went to the top of one of the adjacent hills. Formation distinct. Limestone 10 feet; hard sandstone with impression of shells; and then blue marl. Gendes, with crystallized limestone on top, and the interior of serpentine. The ground covered with a great many detached pieces of ferruginous sandstone.

Growth—cedar, very stunted Missouri flax, some wild gooseberries, a very stunted growth of plums; moss, cactus in great variety, one or two new plants.

Our march only 6 2/3 miles.

August 4th.—Road runs along the valley of the Timpas, and the dust was overpowering; soil impregnated with lime which makes the dust distressing. Stunted cedar on each side; strata on each side of the valley the same as that described yesterday. Iron nodules very frequent. March 13 miles, to the crossing of Timpas:
The only water hole 40 feet in diameter, into which the volunteers rushed, pell-mell, and soon destroyed it. March 9 miles further, to the "Hole in the Rock;" a large hole, with plenty of pretty good stagnant water. Saw antelopes, rabbits, wild horses, two jackdaws, (magpies,) larks, king birds, and robins. The grass is so bad the Col.
Kearney thinks of marching 16 miles further, to the "Hole in the Prairie," where there is no water, but some little dry grass. We passed a dead horse black with crows, a wolf in the midst, quietly feeding on the carcass.

March at 5 P.M., with the staff, to the "Hole in the Prairie," and reach there at 10; distance 14 &frac12; miles. Find grass, as we expected, and were agreeably surprised to find water also. All slept in the open air, the colonel setting the example. Found infantry encamped here. Total distance to-day 36 miles. What we call good grass, is grass burned as dry as cinder. Horses falling away in alarming manner. Mules seem to require the stimulus of distention, and nothing else; this the dry grass affords. The people of the country to whom we apply for information, he without mercy; when they tell you there is fine grass for an army of 2,000, your may find grass for a small party of 10-15.

On the march, Nattah-Yah, (twin hills,) rose suddenly to view, about 75 N.; and soon Pike’s Peak, 20 or 30 further to the north. The dim outline of the great western parallel of the Astek chain began to show itself. We were now crossing the divide between the waters of the Timpas and those of the Purgatory, or Rio de los Animos, of the Spaniards.

August 5th—Descended 11 &frac12; miles and reached the valley of the Purgatory; a swift running stream, a few yards in width. No grass of any amount at the crossing.
Large trees, for many miles along its course, all dead, cause is not apparent. Growth of the bottom, which is very narrow, locust, the everlasting cottonwood, red willow (kinikinck) wild gooseberry, plum, and grape. No fruit on the bushes. March 5 \(\frac{12}{16}\) miles farther, and encamped on the bed of a stream tributary to the Purgatory which comes down from the north side of the Raton, or Mouse, which is the name given to a chain of low ragged looking mountains, that strikes the course of the Purgatory nearly at right angles, and separates the waters of the Arkansas from those of the Canadian. The banks of the Purgatory now begin to assume something of a mountainous aspect; different from scenery in the states. The hills are bare of vegetation, except a few stunted cedars, and look less the work of God than the hills at home. In this valley, 'tis said, we have the grisly bear, turkeys, and antelope.

Passed the rear wagons of the infantry-the horses almost done. Trotting in the wake were 3 wolves. Many a horse of the army of the west, must this night, I think, give up the ghost.

Captain Cook, sent ahead day before yesterday to Armijo. The day before, Lieffendorfer, a trader, married to a Santa Fe woman, sent in the direction of Taos, with two Puebla Indians, to feel the pulse of the Pueblas and the Mexican people, and probably to but wheat, if any, and distribute the proclamation of the colonel commanding. Yesterday Wm. Bent and six others, forming a spy guard, sent forward to reconnoiter the mountain passes.

August 6th.-Col. Kearney left Col. Doniphan’s regiment and Clark’s artillery at our old camp ground of last night, and scattered Sumner’s dragoons three or four-miles up the creek. This done, we commenced the ascent of Raton, and, after marching seventeen miles, halted, with the infantry and general staff, within a half mile of the summit of the pass. Strong parties were sent forward to repair the road, which winds through a picturesque valley, with the Raton towering to the left. Pine trees, which here attain a respectable size, lined the valley through the whole’s day’s march; a few oaks, big enough for axles, were found near the halting place of to-night. When we first left the camp this morning, we saw a few clumps of the pines which much resemble the common pine, stunted. It bears a resinous nut, eaten by Mexicans and Indian. We found, also, the samita in great abundance. It resembles the wild gooseberry. It grows to the height of several feet, and bears a red berry, which is gathered, dried, pounded and then mixed with sugar and water, making a delicious drink, resembling our current shrub.

Neither this plant, nor the pinon, nor plum, nor any of the grapevines, had any food on them, which is attributable to the excessive drought. The stream, which last year was a dashing torrent, is this year dry and in pools. Several beautiful flowers. Turned over the charge of botany to Lt. Peck, this day. Spanish bayonets, soap plant, in great abundance.

The view from our camp transcendently beautiful and singular, reminding me of the pictures I have seen of some parts of Palestine. Rocks chiefly a light colored sandstone. A great deal of stone of (specimen 24) volcanic appearance; color purplish brown, porous, and melts over a slow fire. The road is well located, and the general appearance of the scenery something like the summit of Boston and Albany railroad, but the scenery bolder, and more oriental in appearance.

Express arrived from the spy guard, reporting all clear in front; Cook and Lieffendorfer have only reached the Canadian.

At Captain Sumner’s camp, about seven miles above our camp of last night, and twelve from the summit, there is an immense seam of coal cropping out, thirty feet deep. Grass and water good at camp 35.

August 7th camp 36 – Commenced the ascent of the Raton, which we reach with ease with our wagons; in about two miles observed the barometer, and determined the elevation to be about 7,000 feet above the sea. From the summit we had a beautiful view of Pike’s Peak, the Nattah-Yah, and the chain of mountains running south. Saw several large white masses near the summit, which we at first look for snow, but which, on examination with the telescope, I determined was the [ . . . ] limestone of which we see so much in this country.

The near view was no less imposing. To the east rose the Raton, which appeared still as high as from the camp 1,500 feet below. There is singular formation on the top of the Raton giving the appearance of a succession of castles. [ . . . ] would be required to visit it, I was obliged to forego that [ . . . ] sure, and examine it with the glass. The mountain appeared to be formed chiefly, of sandstones disposed in horizontal strata, dipping gently to the east, until you reach near the summit, when the castle,
The valley is strewn with pebbles and fragment of trap rock and the fusible stone described yesterday.

There is said to be a lake about 10 miles to the east of the summit, where immense herds of deer, antelope, and buffalo congregate; but of this I have my doubts. I would certainly test the matter if I could dispose of my own time.

The descent is much more rapid than the ascent; and for the first few miles, through a valley of good burned grass and stagnant water, containing many beautiful flowers, specimens of which were collected. But presently you come, to a place where a stream, a branch of the Canadian, has worked its way through the mountains, and the road has to ascend and then descend a rugged spur. Here is where the real difficulties commence, and the road, for three or four miles, is just passable for a wagon. Many of the train were broken in the passage. A few thousand dollars, judiciously expended here, would be an immense saving to the government, if the Santa Fe country is to be permanently occupied.

After 10 miles from the summit, we reached a wide valley, where the mountains open out, and the rugged and inhospitable looking hills recede to a respectable distance to the right and left. Sixteen from camp 36, brought us to the main branch of the Canadian, a slow running stream, discharging a volume of water to the thickness of a man's waist; found here Bent's camp. Dismounted under the shade of cottonwood, near an anthill and saw something black, which had been thrown out by these busy little insects; and, on examination, found it to be bituminous coal. I crossed the river, and proceeded about 1 and 12/16 miles, and found the colonel, from whom I had become separated, encamped on the river, with a plentiful supply of grass, wood, and water. After crossing the river, found the plain strewn with lumps of bituminous coal.

Growth on to-day's march—pinion, in small quantities, scrub oak, scrub pine, a few samita bushes, and, on the Canadian, a few cotton wood trees.—Grass, except at the camp little or [ . . . ] rain this evening, but the clouds passed away, and I had a good night for observing. No rain since we left our creeks twenty-seven days ago. And yet this a country that some men talk of one day being settled—this sun-burnt country, that produces no vegetation except on the very edges of the few and far between streams.

We are now in the Paradise of that part between Bent's Fort and San Miguel and yet he who leaves the edge of the Canadian must make a good day's march to find wood, water, or grass.

There may be mineral wealth in these mountains, but that must be left to some explorer not tied to the staff of an army, marching for life into an enemy's country. I say for life, for we are from day to-day, on half rations bread, and, although we have meat enough to prevent anything like immediate starvation, we are sufficiently hard pressed to make it expedient to pounce on Santa Fe, - and its stock of provisions, as soon as possible.

August 8th.—Remained in camp all day to allow Doniphan's regiment and the artillery to come up.—Observed at night for the latitude and time, and found our chronometers preserving their rates admirably. Light hurricanes of wind, and clouds discharging rain to the west. Captain Sumner drilled his three squadrons of dragoons, and made quite an imposing show.

August 9th.—At 2 broke up camp, and marched with the colonel's staff and the 1st dragoons 10 and 12/16 miles, encamped under the mountains on the western side of the Canadian river, on the banks of a small stream, a tributary of the Canadian. Grass, short but good; water—in small quantities and in puddles. Here found a trap dyke, course N. 3. W. which shows itself also on the Canadian, about four miles distant, in the same course. Six miles from last nights camp the road forks: one running near the mountains to the west, but nearly parallel with the old road, and never distant from it more than four miles, and almost all of the time in sight of it:—The army is here divided: the artillery, infantry, and wagon train ordered to take the lower road, Missouri volunteers and 1st dragoons the upper.—The valley here opens out into an extensive plain, slightly rolling flanked on each side by ranges of perpendicular hills covered with stunted cedar and the pinion. In this extensive valley or plains me be traced, from any of the neighboring heights, the valleys of the Canadian and its tributaries— the Vermijo, the Poinel, the Crimaron, the Rajado, and the Ocate. Saw great quantities of antelope, deer, &c. cactus in great abundance, and a plant which my friend Dr. DeCamp. Pointed out as being highly balsamic: he collected quantities of it in his campaign to the Rocky Mountains, and tested its efficacy with entire success as a substitute for balsamic coparva.

Observed a great many insects at the camp to night, the first of any number since leaving the Arkansas. Scarcely a bird, however, to be seen, the cow bird always excepted, which has been in great numbers on the whole route and very tame, often lighting by your horse. The horned frog is also numerous and has been the whole distance from here to beyond Bent's Fort.

August 10th.- Col. Kearney, dissatisfied with the upper road, determined to strike for the old, which we did. After reaching the Vermijo, 9 &frac12; miles in a diagonal line, and reaching the road at the Cimaron, where we found the infantry encamped; total distance 20 &frac12; miles; grass good, and water plenty, though not flowing. Another trap dyke parallel nearly to the last, and 3 miles distant from the last; both strewed with fragments of ferruginous sandstone, and crystallized carbonate of lime. A Mexican came into camp from Bent’s Fort; reported Lieut. Abert much better. Colonel Kearney, allowed him to pass to Taos; for which place, 60 miles distant, by a brittle path, he set out to reach to-night. The Colonel sent by him copies of his proclamation, letters to the alcalde, padre, &c.

Five Mexicans were captured by Bent’s spy company; who had been sent out to reconnoiter us, with orders to retain all persons passing out of New Mexico. They were mounted on diminutive asses, and cut a ridiculous figure, along side the thumping big men and horses of the 1st dragoons. Fitzpatrick, our guide, who seldom laughs, became almost convulsed when he turned his well practiced eye upon them.

Tonne, an American citizen, came to headquarters, when at the Vermijo, and reported himself just escaped from Taos: He reports that the proclamation of Governor Armijo reached there calling the citizens to arms, and placing the whole country under martial law. He stated that Armijo had assembled all the Puebla Indians, above 2,000; all the citizens capable of bearing arms; that 300 Mexican dragoons arrived in Santa Fe the day Armijo’s proclamation was issued; and that 1,200 more are hourly expected. That the Spanish Mexicans to a man, are anxious for a fight, but that about half the Puebla Indians are indifferent on this subject, but will be made to fight.

A succession of thunderstorms passed yesterday to the north and west of us, but nothing reached us. The ground showed recent rain and so does the grass which looks as it does in the spring, just sprouting.

The hills of the left are, as near as I can judge, the same as in the Raton, of different colored sandstone, regularly stratified, and dipping gently to the east.

The growth, on the mountains, pinion and cedar; on the plain, scarcely a tree can be seen, and those along the edges of the streams. Observed at night for latitude and time.

August 11th.- Made a long march to-day, with the advanced guard—the 1st dragoons, to the Ocate, 31 miles. The road approaches the Ocate at the foot of a high bluff, to the north, and runs through a canon, making it accessible to horses. We followed it four or five miles. Where the road crosses the river from the road, and found good grass and running water.

The scenery to-day was very pretty, sometimes approaching to the grand. The road passes through a succession of valleys and crossed numerous divides of the Rayado and Ocate. The Rayado is a limpid running stream, 10 miles from the Cimaron, and although we have been in the midst of mountains for some days past, this is the first stream that has any thing the look of a mountain stream. The grass, however, is not good. Two and a half miles further on, at the foot of the mountain, there are springs. At the last place they halted. About five miles before reaching the Ocate, the road descends into a valley overlined by confused and rugged cliffs, which give promise of grass and water; but ongoing down, we found it had no outlet, and that this beautiful valley, terminated in a salt lake, which is now dry, and the bed encrusted with a thin coat of a white substance, (see specimen.)

Here the road is indistinct, and takes a sudden turn to the left, at this moment we discovered, coming towards us, at full speed, Bent’s spy guard. All though they had met the enemy, I rode forward to meet him, followed by Fitzpatrick and two dragoons. It turned out to be a false alarm. Like a set of silly fellows—or as Fitz called them, d----d fools—they got off the road, which we were not aware of, and were now galloping back to it in full speed.
The hills are composed of what I take to be trap and a porous volcanic stone, very hard, with a metallic fracture and luster. It is underlayed by sandstone. From the uniform height of those hills, one would think they originally formed the table land, and that the valleys had been washed, and their limits determined by the existence or non-existence of the hard crust.

Things are now becoming very interesting. Five or six Mexicans were captured last night, and on their persons were found the proclamation of the protect of Taos, based on that of Armijo, calling the citizens to arms to repeal the Americans, who were coming to invade their soil, and destroy their property and liberties; ordering an enrollment of all citizens over 15 and under 45, and list of arms and ammunitions. It is decidedly less [ . . . ] than any Mexican paper which I have yet seen. Colonel Kearney assembled three prisoners together, some ten or a dozen; made an admirable speech to them, and ordered, that when the rear guard of the army have passed, that they be released. In his speech he informed them that he considered New Mexico a part of the United States; that he intended to extend our laws over it, and substitute laws for the arbitrary will of one man; that he came as the friend of the people, that he would protect them in the exercise of their religion, and of their property, that he would defend the weak against the strong, and the poor against the rich. This brightened their faces, as far as such poor, down cast, unmeaning faces could be brightened. They were mounted on little donkeys, or jennies, and guided by clubs instead of bridles; the whole turn out contrasting in a way with our large, well mounted dragoons that was very ludicrous.—The colonel said to me, "Emory, if I have to fire a round of grape into such men, I shall think of it with remorse all of my life."

To-night two more Mexicans were captured; or rather came into our camp, who were severely cross-questioned by the colonel. Their story was, that they came out by order of the alcalde of the More-town to look for their standing enemies the Eataws, who were reported in the neighborhood; that they had heard of our coming some time since. They believed us at the Rayado, twenty two miles back, but seeing our wagons, and having faith in the Americans, they rode with out hesitation to our camp.—When they said they had faith in us, the Colonel, with great quickness, ordered them to shake hands with him. He then told them pretty much the same that he told the Mexicans this morning. These men appeared to be of a higher class, and listened with profound attention. The Colonel had told them, in conclusion, that he must keep them for a day or two; for it was quite evident to all of us that they were spies, who had come too suddenly into the ravine into which we were camped.

They appeared well satisfied. One of them, with the guard, turned back, and presented the colonel with a fresh cream cheese.

Collected a great variety of new and beautiful flowers. The hills sparsely covered with cedar and pinon. Antelope and horned frogs in abundance; no other animals seen.

August 12th.- The Colonel discharged the oldest Mexican, giving him two proclamations—one for the alcalde, another for the people of the town. He sent a message to the alcalde to meet him at the crossing of the Moro with several of his head men.—The other Mexican was detained as a guide. About 12 o’clock, the advance was sounded, and the Colonel, with Sumner’s command marched twenty miles, and halted in a beautiful valley of fine grass and good pools of cool water. The stream, when flowing, is a tributary of the Moro. From the drift wood, &c., found in its wide, well grassed bed, I infer it is subject to great freshets. In crossing the Ocate to the valley of the Moro, the mountains became more rolling, and as we approach the Moro the valley opens out, and the whole country becomes more tame in appearance. Ten miles up the Moro is the Moro town, containing, as the Mexican informed me last night, 200 houses. It is off the lower road, but a tolerable wagon road leads to it from our camp of last night.

The plans were strewed with a red porous lava-like substance (See specimen 30.) The plains are almost destitute of vegetation—the hills covered with a stunted growth of pinon and red cedar. Rains have fallen here recently, and the grass in the bottom is good. The gamma now constantly appears, but very thinly scattered over the ground. Saw, to-day, some prairie dogs, with stripes on their sides, resembling the common prairie dog in every thing else. A flight of birds to the south, but too far to distinguish them. Antelope and horned frogs as usual. Attracted to the left by an object supposed to be an Indian; on reaching found it a sandstone block, three feet long, standing on end, and topped by another, shorter. A mountain man, who was along, said it was in commemoration of a talk and friendly smoke between some two bands of Indians.
August 13th.-At 12 o’clock, as the rear column came in sight, the call of "boots and saddles" were sounded, and in twenty minutes we were off. We had not advanced more than one mile when Bent, of the spy guard, came up with four prisoners. They represented themselves to be an ensign and three privates of the Mexican army, sent forward to reconnoiter and ascertain our forces. They said 600 men were at the Vegas to receive us, and give us battle, or treat us as friends, according to our intentions towards them. They told a great many different stories, and finally delivered up a paper being an order from Captain Gonzales, to the ensign, to go forward on the Bent road, and ascertain our position and numbers. They were severely cross questioned by the Colonel, and told very much the same the all the rest have told. They were retained for the present as prisoners.

As soon as we commenced descending into the valley of the Moro creek, Col.
Kearney’s orderly, who carried his telescope, reported a company of Mexicans at the crossing. Col. K. ordered me to go forward with 12 dragoons, and reconnoiter the party, and if they attempted to fly, to pursue and capture as many as we could. As we approached this company, it seemed wondrous and still motionless; but a few steps dispelled the illusion, and showed the pine stakes of a corral. The dragoons were sadly disappointed, they evidently expected a fight or chase. A few minutes brought us to the first settlement we had yet seen in 775 miles. The first object I saw, was an American, with clean white stockings, who came to me, very cordially shook hands, and asked for tobacco. Fitzpatrick said I was singled out for my large red whiskers; but I was at the head of the party, and that was the reason of honor done me.

The next house, and out popped a live American, and soon after, his wife. This was Mr. Bonny, who has lived here for some time, owns a large number of cattle and horses, which he keeps in defiance of wolves, Indians, and Mexicans. He is a perfect specimen of a generous, open-hearted adventurer, and is in appearance what I have supposed Daniel Boon to have been. He drove his herd of cattle into camp, and picked out the largest and fattest, which he presented to the army.

Below, about 2 miles, at the junction of the Moro and Sapilla, is another American-
Mr. Yells, of North Carolina. He has been here but six months, and from his gay dress may have been taken for a sergeant of dragoons, with his blue pantaloons with broad gold stripes on the sides, and his jacket trimmed with lace. I bought butter of him at 4 bits the pound.

We halted at Sapilla, distance 9 ½ , miles from our last night’s encampment, in a tremendous shower.—Grass indifferent, having been eaten up by the cattle from the ranchos. Wood and water plenty. At this place an American came into camp from Santa Fe, on foot, with scarcely anything on his back; escaped from there night before last at Mr. Houston’s request; to inform Col. Kearney that Armijo’s forces were assembling to the number of 8,000 or 12,000, and that he might expect vigorous resistance; and that a place called the Canon, 15 miles from Santa Fe, where I had before predicted the battle would be fought, was being fortified, and advising the colonel to go around it.

The canon is a narrow defile, easily defended, and of which we have heard a great deal. A conflict now “is inevitable,” and the advantages of ground and numbers will, no doubt, enable the Mexicans to make a stiff fight.

Miserable grass, and the camp ground inundated by the shower of to-day, which was quite a rarity with us, although we understood the rainy season had commenced ten days before, farther in the mountains.

August 13th.-The order of march to-day was the order of battle. After proceeding a few miles, we met a queer cavalcade, which at first we thought was the looked for cavalcade from Moro town; but it turned out a messenger from Armijo. A lieutenant, one sergeant, and two privates, of Mexican lancers. The men were good looking enough, and evidently dressed in their best bib and tucker. The creases in their pantaloons were quite distinct. Their horses were mean in the extreme, and the contempt with which our dragoons were filled was evident.

The messenger was the bearer of a letter from a Armijo, in answer to the colonel’s.
The army was on tip-toe to know the contents of the letter. The colonel communicated it to but a few myself amongst the number. It was a sensible, straightforward letter, and written by an American, or by an Englishman, would have meant this: “You have notified me that you intend to take possession of the country I govern. The people of the country have risen in mass to my defense. If you get the country, it will be because you prove the strongest in battle. I suggest you stop at the Sapilla, and I will march to the Vegas. We will meet, and negotiate on the plains.
between them."

The artillery were detained a great while in passing the Sapilla. This kept us stewing in the plains for four hours, but it gave the colonel time to reflect on the message with which he should dismiss the lancers. There were apprehensions that Cook was detained, and this made their discharge a matter of reflection. Sixteen miles brought us in sight of the Vegas, a village on the stream of that name. A halt was made at this place, and the colonel called the lieutenant and lancers, and said to them: "The road to Santa Fe is now as free to you as it is to myself; say to my friend General Armijo, I shall soon meet him, and I hope it will be as friends. I come here as the friend of the whole Mexican people, and not as their enemy. My Government considers New Mexico a part of the United States, and I intend to extend her laws over it. All who obey me, and do not resist, I will respect, and make secure in their property, their persons, and their religion. All who take up arms against me, I will treat as enemies."

A great deal more was said, but the conversations which followed with other people were so much more significant, that I will not repeat what passed. At parting, the lieutenant embraced the colonel, Captain Turner, and myself; this was the first man hug that I ever encountered, and if God spares me, it shall be the last.

The country to-day was a rolling, almost mountainous prairie; the grass on the hills beginning to show a little. The soil was good enough, apparently, but vegetation was little or nothing, from the want of rain. As we emerged from the hills into the valley of the Vegas, our eyes saluted, for the first time, with waving corn. The stream was full, and the little drains, by which the fields were irrigated, full to the brim. The dry soil seemed to drink it with the avidity of our thirsty horses.

The village, at a short distance, looked like an extensive brick-kiln; On approaching it, its outline presented a square, with some arrangements for defense. Into this square they are sometimes compelled to retreat with all their stock, to avoid the attacks of the Eutaws and Navajos, who pounce upon them, and carry off their women, children and cattle. But a few days since, they made a descent upon the town, and carried off 120 sheep, and other stock. As Captain Cook passed through the town some ten days since, a murder had just been committed on these helpless people. Our camp extended for a mile down the valley. On one side was the stream, and on the other the corn-fields, with no fence or hedge interposing. What a tantalizing prospect for our hungry and jaded nags.

The water was free, but the colonel posted a chain of sentinels to protect the corn, and gave strict orders that it should not be disturbed. Captain Turner was sent to the village to inform the alcalde that the colonel wished to see him and the head men of the town. In a short time, down came the Alcalde, two captains of militia, with numerous servants, prancing and careering their little nags into camp.—The colonel stated to them that he was ordered by his government to take possession of the country, and annex it to the United States – to extend over it the protection of her troops. He hoped to effect this object peaceably; but if need be, he had the power, and would do it forcibly. That he had no doubt of his ability to do it peaceably, if the people of the country could be bought within the sound of his voice, and made to understand the advantages they would derive, in the protection of their lives and property from the savages, and in the just administration of the laws. That he desired the alcalde to assemble all his people in the laza, where he would address them at 8 o’clock the next morning.

All went smoothly, except with one of the captains of the militia, who was very surly, and said he always understood the Arkansas was the boundary of the United States, and soon after rode off abruptly, leaving the party. The old alcalde was very confidential, begged the colonel, in a whisper, to allow no trespass on the corn. The colonel pointed to him his chain of sentinels. The old man hen pulled out a bottle of vile Taos whiskey, and requested us to drink with him. The dose was bitter, but taken with passable grace.

August 15th.- Twelve o’clock last night the colonel (General Kearney) was awakened up, and informed that six hundred men had collected at the posts of the Vegos, two miles distant, and were to oppose his march. In the morning, ordered were given to prepare to meet the enemy. At seven the army moved and just as we made the road leading through the town, Major Swords, of the 3d, Mr. Dupat joined us from Fort Leavenworth, and presented Colonel Kearney with is commission as brigadier general in the army of the United States. At eight o’clock precisely, the general was in the public square, where he was met by the alcalde and people, many of whom were on horseback, (for these people live on horseback.) The General pointed to the top of one of their houses, which are all of one story high, and flat roofed; and suggested to the alcalde, that if he would go to that place he and his staff would follow, and from that point, where all could hear and see him, he would say to them what he had to say.

This was a wise precaution. He was thus enabled to speak so that all could hear and see, and we were placed out of reach of difficulty, of which there might have been some danger, as we were pressed closely in a dense mass of people, the disposition of none of which we then knew.

The colonel (now Brig. Gen’l Kearney) then addressed the multitude, nearly as follows:

"Mr. Alcalde and the people of New Mexico: I have come amongst you by the orders of my government, to take possession of your country, and extend over it the laws of the United States. We come among you as friends, not as enemies; we come to you as protectors, not conquerors; we come among you for your benefit, not for your injury.

Henceforth I absolve you of all allegiance to the Mexican government, and from all obedience to Gen. Armijo. He is no longer your governor, [great sensation,] I am your governor.

I shall not expect you to take up arms and follow me, to fight your own people, who may be in arms against me; but I tell you that those who remain peaceably at home, attending their crops and herds, shall be protected by me in their property, their persons, and their religion; and not a pepper or an onion shall be disturbed or taken by my troops, without pay, or without the consent of the owner.-But listen! He who is found in arms against me, I will hang.

From the Mexican government you have never received any protection. The Apaches and the Navajo come down from the mountains and carry off your sheep and your women whenever they please.—My government will correct al this. They will keep off the Indians, protect you in your persons and property, and I repeat again, will protect you in your religion. I know you are all good Catholics, and that some of your priests have told you all sorts of stories; that we would pollute your women, and brand them upon the cheek as you do your mules upon the hip. It is false. My government respects your religion as much as the protestant religion, and allows each man to worship his Creator as his heart tells him best. Her laws protect the Catholic as well as the Protestant, the weak as well as the strong, the poor as well as the rich. I am not a Catholic myself; I was not brought up in that faith; but at least one-third of my army are Catholics. And I respect a good Catholic as much as a good Protestant.—There goes my army! You see but a small part of it. There are many more behind. Resistance is useless.

Mr. Alcalde, and you two captains of militia, the laws of my country require that all men who hold office under it, shall take the oath of allegiance. I do not wish for the present, until things get settled, to disturb your mode of government. If you are prepared to take the oath of allegiance, I shall continue you in office and support your authority."

This was a bitter pill, but swallowed, the discontented captain looking close down to his toes. The general remarked to him, in hearing all of the people: "Captain look me in the face, while you repeat the oath of office." The hint was understood; the oath administered, the general pronounced the alcalde and two captains still in office, and I called upon all the citizens to obey the alcalde, &c. The people grinned, and exchanged looks of satisfaction; but seemed not to have the boldness to express what they evidently felt, that their burdens if not relieved, were at least shifted to some ungalled part of the body.

We descended by the same rickety ladder by which we climbed to the top of the houses, mounted our horses, and rode briskly forward to encounter our 600 Mexicans in the gorge of the mountains, two miles distant. The sun shone with dazzling brightness, the guidons and colors of each squadron, regiment, and battalion were, for the first time, unfurled.

The drooping horses seemed to take pluck from the gay array, the trumpeters sounded "to horse"with unusual spirit, and the hills multiplied and reechoed the call. All looked like a gala day; and as we approached the gorge where the fun was expected, the general broke into a brisk trot, then into a full gallop, preceded by a squadron of horse. He kept close to their heels. The gorge was passed, but no 600 Mexicans were there! One by one the guidons were furled, the men looked disappointed, and a few minutes found us dragging our "slow length along" with the usual indifference to envoy subject except that of overcoming space.

Two miles farther brought us to another pass as formidable as the first; and the entire intermediate country was broken, and covered with a dense growth of pine, pinon, and cedar. The mountains now begin to rise to the height of a thousand feet above the road.

Nine miles brought us to Selcolate, where we met the alcalue and people in the cool and spacious apartments of the forum, where a repetition of the drama was again enacted. This was graced by the presence of women, with their bare ankles and slippered feet. –Marched ten miles further to Vernal springs; halted at the upper spring, and observed for time and latitude about 500 feet south of the upper spring.

August 16th—Marched to San Miguel, where the general assembled the people, and gave them much the same harangue as at the Vegos; but in swearing the old alcalde there was great difficulty. His honor hesitated, faltered, looked at the priest, who held down his head and refused to respond to his enquiring looks. But it had to go down: the general was pertinacious.

As we were ascending the ladder, the priest—a famous man in this country; famous for his love of cards, women and wine—stopped the general to engage him in a discussion on the merits of the question of invasion. He said a great deal that was exceedingly silly and out of place. The general told him so very sharply before all his people, Sinner as he is his hold upon his flock is firm and unyielding.

The repartee of the general floored him completely, and made some of his poor deluded flock look aghast. He had previously invited the general to his quarters. Being in our route we halted. The general told him that he and all his brotherhood were laboring under a great mistake with regard to the intentions of the American government in respect to his religion; that there was not the least intention of disturbing it, or any of its rights and privileges; but if he found any of them stirring up the people to rebellion, he would not let the priests robe stand between the offender and the rope. This, by the way, he mentioned in his speech to the people, while the priest was made to stand by him in full view of the mass below.

His reverence saw the sort of person he had to deal with, and disclaimed any mischievous intentions. This through, he displayed his Taos brandy, which we drank. The general cracked several jokes with him, and finally took leave, by a cordial embrace and a mutual assurance of friendship.

Reports now meet us at every step, that the people were rising, and that Armijo was collecting a formidable force to oppose our march, at the celebrated pass of the canon, fifteen miles from Santa Fe. About the middle of the day’s march, two Puebla Indians, previously sent to sound the chief men of that formidable tribe, were seen in the distance, at full speed, with arms and legs both thumping into the side of their mules, at every stride.—Something was now n the wind for certain.

The smartest and foremost of the two, dashed up to the general, his face radiant with joy, and exclaimed:--"They are in the canon, my brave! Pluck up your courage, and push them out." His extravagant delight at seeing the prospect of a fight, and the pleasure of communicating it, by and by subsided, and he then gave the general a pretty accurate idea of Armijo’s force and his position. He further told him that the Pueblas were with the army there, by Armijo’s orders; that they came voluntarily, and he might rely on their assurance that at first fire, every Puebla would throw down his rifle, his bow, arrows, and sling, and come over to him, (General Kearney).

The general told him that that was all very well; but that he should like to see, that night, some of the head chiefs, and he wished him to go back and bring them out. The brave little fellow at once assented, but his comrade refused, from fear that Armijo would catch and hang him.

The road passed over to-day was good, but the face of the country exceedingly rugged and broken; covered with pinon and cedar. To the left, at one or two miles distant, towers a wall nearly perpendicular, 20 feet high, apparently level on the top, and showing, as near as I could judge, from the road, an immense stratum of red sandstone, capped by puddingstone and limestone. The road was red with disintegrated sandstone. We turned from the road to the creek where there were a few ranchos to encamp, at which place we passed an uncomfortable night; the water being hard to reach and the grazing very bad.

August 17th.—The picket-guard, stationed on the road, captured the son of Salazar, who, it is said, is to play the part in this country that Zraalcaraguay[?] did in Spain. The son was at San Miguel yesterday, and heard from a concealed place, the general's bar rangue. It is supposed, at this time, he was explaining the position, strength &c. of our army, to report it to his father.

A rumor has reached camp that 4,000 Mexicans assembled in the canon, have quarreled among themselves; that Armijo, taking advantage of the dissensions, fled with dragoons and artillery to the south. He was long suspected of wishing an excuse to fly. It was known he was averse to a battle, but some of his people threatened his life if he failed to fight. He has been-for some days- more in fear of his own people than the American army. He sees what they have failed to see, -the hopelessness of resistance. Every assurance has been given him by the general, if he quietly surrendered, he would protect him in his person and property; but it is quite evident he fears the penalty of his long misgovernment.

As we approached the ruins of the ancient town of Pecos, a large fat fellow came towards us at full swing, and exceeding his hand to the general, congratulated him on the arrival of himself and army. He said, with a roar of laughter:—"Armijo and his troops have all gone to hell, and the canon is all clear!"—This was the alcalde of the settlement, two miles up the Pecos from the ruins, where we encamped—15 miles from our last camp, and 2 miles from the road.

Pecos, once a fortified town, is built on a promontory of rock, something in the shape of a fort. Here burned, until within the last seven years, the eternal fire of Montezuma; and the remains of the architecture exhibit, in a pointed manner, the engraftment of the Catholic Church upon the crest religion of the country. At the end of the short spire forming the [ . . . ] of the promontory, are the remains of the stuffa, with all its parts distinct; at the other, are the remains of the Catholic church. Both showing the distinctive marks and emblems particular to the two religions. The tires from the stuffa burned and sent and incense through the same alters from which was preached the religion of Christ. Two religions so utterly different in theory, were here, as in all Mexico, blended in harmonious practice, until, about a century since, the town was sacked by the Nava-hoe band of Indians.

Amidst all the havoc of plundering the city the faithful Aztek managed to keep his fire going in the stuffa, and it was continued until a few years since, the band became almost extinct. Their devotions rapidly diminished their numbers, until they became so few as to be unable to keep going their immense stuffa, forty feet in diameter, when they abandoned the place, and joined a tribe of the original Montezuma race, over the mountains, about sixty miles south. There to this day; it is said, they keep their fire; which has never yet been extinguished.

The labor and watchfulness, and the exposure to heat required, is fast diminishing this regiment of the Montezuma race; and a few years will see the end of this interesting people.

The sketches will give a much more accurate description than can be written of the remains of the modern church, with its crosses, its cells, in dark mysterious corners and niches, where many a maid signed out her confessions. The architecture of the present day in New Mexico; that of the Aztek part of the ruins presents many peculiarities worthy of notice.

Both are constructed of the same materials: the walls of sun dried brick, the rafters of well hewn timber, which could never have been hewn by the miserable axes now used by the Mexicans, which resemble, in shape, and size, the wedges used by our farmers for splitting rails. The corners and drops of the architecture, in the modern church, are elaborately carved with a knife.

To-night we found excellent grass on the Rio Pecos, abreast of the ruins. Here is situated the modern village of Pecos, with a very inconsiderable population. To-night there is a fandango, a mile and a half from camp; but as anxious as I am to see this dance, the threatening appearance of rain deterred me from going.

August 18.—We are this morning 29 miles from Santa Fe. Reliable information from four or five different sources, reached camp yesterday, and the day before that dissensions had arisen in Armijo's camp, and that his army was dispersed, and himself fled to the south, carrying with him his artillery and 100 dragoons. Not a hostile rifle or arrow was now between the army and Santa Fe, the capital of New Mexico; and the general determined to make the march in one day, and raise the New horses and mules were ordered for the artillery, and everything was braced up for a forced march. The distance was not great, but the road was bad, and the horses on their last legs.

A small detachment was sent ahead at day break, and at six the army followed. Four or five miles from old Pecos from old Pecos the road leads into a canon, with hills on each side, from 1,000 – 2,000 feet above the road, and in all cases within cannon, and in many cases, point blank musket shot, which continues until within 12 or 15 miles of Santa Fe.

The scenery is wild, but the geological formation is much the same as before described, until you begin to fall towards the Del Norte, when the primitive rocks, granite, &c., are densely crowded wherever the rock affords a crevice. Fifteen miles from Santa Fe, we came upon the position deserted by Armijo. The topographical sketch will give a much more accurate idea of it than a written description. It is a gate way, which, in the hands of a skilled enemy and 100 resolute men, would be perfectly impregnable.

Had the position been defended with any decency, the general would have turned it by a road which branches to the south, six miles from Pecos, by the way of Gulisteo.

Armijo's arrangements for defense were very defective. His abattis was placed behind the gorge, some 100 yards, by which it is evident he intended that the gorge should be passed before his fires were opened. This done, his batteries would have been carried without difficulty.

Before we reached the canon, the noon halt was made, in a valley covered with the native potato. It was in full bloom. The fruit was not quite so large as a wren's egg. As we approached the town, a few straggling Mexicans came out, all opening their eyes wide, in search for the general, who, with his staff, was clad so plainly, that they passed us. Another officer and myself were sent down to explore the by road, for a short distance, by which, Armijo fled,—On our return to the main road we saw two Mexicans, one the acting Secretary of State, in search of the general. They had allowed him to pass unobserved. When we pointed the way they broke off in full run, their hands and feet keeping time to the pace of their nags. We followed, in a sharp trot, and, as we though, at a respectable distance. Our astonishment was great, to find as they wound through the ravine, and through the open well-grown pine tree forest, that they did not leave us perceptibly." Certainly they are in full run, and as certainly, we are only in a trot," we both exclaimed. I supposed we were under some delusion, and turned to my servant to see the pace at which he was going—and, said he, "them Mexican horses make a mighty great doing to no purpose." That was the fact. With their large cruel bitts, they harass their horses into a gait which enables them to gallop very long without losing sight of the starting place.

The acting secretary brought a letter from the lieutenant governor, informing the general of Armijo's flight, and of his readiness to receive him in Santa Fe, and extend to him the hospitalities of the city. He was quite a youth, and dressed in the hasion of the Americans.

Here, all persons from the United States are called Americanos, and the name is extended to no other race on the continent.

To-day's march was very tedious and vexatious.—Wishing to enter Santa Fe in an imposing form, frequent halts were made to allow the artillery to come up. Their horses were on their last legs; and during the day, mule after mule was placed before the guns, until scarcely a horse was left.

The head of the column arrived in sight of the town about three:-it was six before the van came up. Vigil, the lieutenant governor, and twenty or thirty of the people of the town, received us at the Palace. The general addressed them in a speech little different in substance, but much in manner, which was conversational, as at the Vegas and San Miguel. We were then asked to partake of wine and brandy, of domestic manufacture. It was from the Passo del Norte. We were too thirsty to judge of its merits. Anything liquid and cool was palatable. During the repast, and as the sun was setting, the United States flag was hoisted on the palace, and a salute of thirteen guns fired from the artillery that was left on an eminence overlooking the town.

The ceremony ended; the general and his staff were invited to supper at Capt.
Hortises, a Mexican gentleman, once in the army. The supper was served very much after the manner of a French dinner, one dish succeeding another, in endless succession. A bottle of good wine from the Passo del Norte, and a loaf of bread were placed near each plate. We had been from five in the morning without eating, and endless as were the dishes, more endless still were our appetites.

We returned to the palace, where we found Mr. Thurston, an American with an invitation to another supper, at the celebrated Madame Tula’s. This is a lady who has amassed a large fortune here and at Chihuahua, by gambling and other accomplishments. A few of us went down. We found the lady a little passe, but by far the most vivacious and intelligent Mexican we had yet seen. I wished to make observations; and, after gratifying my curiosity by a survey of her spacious and well-furnished halls, I returned to my quarters where I found my people all so much fagged, that I determined to follow their example and go to bed. The room assigned to me was very close and disagreeable, and I had my blankets moved to the plaza, where I slept till the sun was high in the heavens, and the horses, mules, and men, had been trampling around about me some hours.

August 19th.—Received an order to make a reconnaissance of the town, and select a site for a fort, assisted by Lieut. Gilmer of the engineers. This occupied me diligently on the 19th and 20th, and on the 21st the general was furnished with the map, a copy of which is sent to the adjutant general, and another to the topographical bureau.

The site selected, and marked on the maps, is within 600 yards of the heart of the town, and is 60 to one hundred feet above it. The contour of the ground is unfavorable for the trace of a regular work; but being the only point which commands the entire town, and which is itself commanded by no other, we did not hesitate to recommend it. The recommendation was approved by the general, who viewed it in person. On the 22d we submitted a complete plan of the work, which was also approved, and a copy of which will hereafter be forwarded to the department. It is computed for a garrison of 280 men. Its regular shape is the natural consequence of the ground; and, estimating its merits, due considerations must be given to the objects in erecting it. It is to be a magazine of ammunition, and a citadel in case of extremities, into which a few troops can retreat, and hold at bay, until help arrives, a large number of opposing force.

But the chief which is imposing position will doubtless achieve is the moral effect over a feeble and distracted race, who are now, since our capture of their artillery, without a single gun. Their own guns will be chiefly used to garrison the fort; and with them every house in Santa Fe could be leveled on the least appearance of revolt. On the 23d the work was commenced with a small force, and on the 27th, the requisition being complied with, 1 set to work 100 laborers, detailed from the soldiers of the army, and on the 31st thirty one Mexican brick masons were added, which will form the permanent force until the work is completed.

It is being determined to send an express to the states, on the 25th instant, I recommended to project and place my maps of the route of the army of the west, that the government might have at once the benefit of my labors. This was a bold undertaking—to compass in a few days the work of months. My astronomical observations were brought up from day to day as we progressed on the march, without which the undertaking would have been impracticable. We all worked day and night, and with the assistance of several gentlemen of the volunteers I succeeded in accomplishing the undertaking, not, however, in a very satisfactory way, as the accompanying letter to General Kearney, forwarded by him with the express, will show. Should this journal ever appear, that letter will form part of it, and explain what I have stated here more fully. I am now preparing, at more ease and with more care, another trave of my maps, which, together with my additional observations for the position of Santa Fe, the lunar observations at Bent’s Fort, which confirm, in the most satisfactory manner, my chronometric determinations, and the latitude of each camp and place of note, will be forwarded direct to the bureau by an express which left here on the 5th or 6th of September.

Events at the same place now begin to crowd upon each other in quick succession; but my duties keep me so constantly occupied in my office and in the field, they will not be chronicled in regular order, or in much detail.

On the morning of the 19th the general assembled all the people at the palace, and addressed them in about the same language as at Vegas; the principal difference being, that he notified all those who were dissatisfied with the new order of things, they had full liberty to quit the country without molestation. The next morning the chiefs and head men of the Puebla Indians in to give their adhesion, and to express their great satisfaction of his arrival. This large and formidable band are amongst the best and most peaceable citizens of New Mexico. They, early after the conquest, embraced the forms of religion and like manners and customs of their then more civilized masters- the Spaniards. Their interview was long and interesting. They expressed what was a tradition with them that the white man would come from the far east, and release them from the bonds and shackles which the Spaniards have imposed, not in the name, but in a worse form than slavery.

They, and the numerous half-breeds, in whose veins flow their blood, are our fast friends now and forever. Three hundred years of oppression and injustice have failed to extinguish in this race the recollection that they were once the peaceable and inoffensive masters of the country. The day of retribution has now come, and they have their revenge.

The same afternoon, just as twilight had closed, the vicar of the department, a huge lump of fat, who had fled with Armijo, came puffing into town, and soon presented himself to the general. The interview was amusing. His holiness was accompanied by two young priests; one of whom showed the highest state of alarm and agitation. The vicar assured the general he had been persuaded to run off by the women of his family. The general told him, sharply, he thought it would have been much more in keeping with his holy office to stand by his flock, and not desert them in the hour of trouble, than listen to the unreasonable fears of two women. He then told the general that at another time he would give him the real reason for running away on the approach of the American army.]

A message was received the same night from Armijo, asking on what terms he would be received by the general, but this turned out only to be a ruse, on his part, to gain time in his flight to the south. It is now quite certain he had in the canon with him 4,000 men, tolerably armed, and six pieces of artillery. Had he been any sort of a general, he would have been able to give us infinite trouble. A priest arrived last night (the 29th) and gave the certain intelligence, that at the moment of Armijo’s flight, Ogarte, a colonel of the regular service, was on his march this side of the Passo del Norte, with 500 men to support him; that he would have been enabled to rouse the whole southern district, which is by far the most wealthiest and most populous.

Mr. McGriffin, an American, says that the night Armijo’s messenger returned from Gen. Kearney with the news that the latter had refused to stop, but was still advancing, he (Armijo) was thrown into the greatest trepidation; that he sent for him, (Mr. McGriffin,) embraced him, and asked him for God’s sake to go out and use his influence with General Kearney, to stop him. When Mr. McGriffin told him that was impossible, he gave away to the most uncontrollable despair.

In the course of the week, various deputations have come in from Taos, giving their allegiances, and asking for protection from the Indians. That portion is the best disposed to war is the United States. You can tell a Taos man at once by the cordiality of his salutation.

A band of Navahoes, naked, thin, and devilish looking, dropped in on the general while I was present. He told them to tell their chiefs and people that he was aware that they had, for a long time, subsisted by plundering the Mexicans, that hereafter, if they committed these acts he would hang the offenders by the neck until they were dead.—He also sent a message, that he had some presents to give them, which he would distribute in a few days.

Various rumors reached us from the south that troops are marching on Santa Fe, and that the people are rising, &c. To quiet them, the general has determined on an expedition down the river, 150 miles, to start on Wednesday, 1st of September.—The order is already out to prepare to march for California no time to lose.

September 30th – To-day we went to church, in great state. The governor’s seat, a large well stuffed chair, covered with crimson, was occupied by the general. The house was crowded with an attentive audience, of men and women; but not a word was uttered from the pulpit by the priest, who kept his back to the audience, the whole time uttering prayers. The band—the identical one used at the fandango—played the same tunes as at the dance, without intermission. Except the governor’s, and one row of benches, there were no seats in the church. Each woman dropped on her knees, on the bare floor, as she entered; and only changed this position for that on her seat, at long intervals, announced by the tinkle of a small bell.

The interior of the church is decorated with some fifty crosses, a great number of the most miserable paintings, and wax figures and looking glasses, trimmed with pieces of tinsel. The priest who was a very grave, respectable looking person, of fair complexion, commenced the services by sprinkling holy water over the congregation. When abreast of the general, he extended his silver waterspout, and gave him a handful.

Though not a word was uttered, the whole service was grave and impressive; and I thought it was the very religion for the people present; and much more decent and worthy of God’s temple, than many of the ranting, howling discourses we have at home.

All appeared to have just left work to come to church. There was no fine dressing or personal display, that will not be seen on weekdays. Indeed, on returning from church we found all the stores open, and the market women selling their melon and plums, as usual.

The fruit of this place—muskmelons, apples, and plums—is very indifferent, and would scarcely be eaten in the states. To this I must except the apricot, which grows in perfection.

Leaving the narrow valley of the Santa Fe, which various from a thousand feet to a mile or two in width, you reach barren hills, utterly incapable, from soil and climate, of producing anything.

The valley is entirely cultivated by irrigation, and is, as you will see on the sketch, now covered with corn.

The population of Santa Fe if from 2,000 to 4,000; and they are, it is said, the poorest people of any town in the province.

The houses are of mud bricks, in the Spanish style, generally of one story and built on a square. The interior of the square is an open court, and the principal rooms open into it. They are forbidding in appearance, from the outside, but once in, and nothing can exceed their comfort and convenience. The thick walls make them cool in the summer, and they say, warm in the winter.

The better class of people are all provided with excellent beds, and have furniture, and have furniture; but the lower class, who are in fact but serfs, are very destitute, and sleep chiefly on skins untanned.

The women here, as in all other parts of the world, appear to be much before the men in refinement, intelligence, and knowledge of useful arts. The better class dress like American women, except they wear, instead of a bonnet, a scarf over the head. This they wear asleep or awake, in the house, or out.

He dress of the lower class of women, is a simple petticoat, with arms and shoulders bare, except what might be covered by the reboso.

The men who have means to do so, dress after our fashion; but by far the greater number, when they dress at all wear leather breeches, tight round the hips, and open from the knee down; and shirt and blanket takes the place of our coat and vest.

The city is dependant on the distant hills for wood, and at all hours of the day may be seen jackasses coming laden with wood, which is sold at 2 bits, or 25 cents per load. They are the most diminutive little creatures, and generally mounted from behind, after the fashion of a leap frog. It is the only animal that can subsist in this barren region with out the greatest expense. Our horses are all sent to distance, 12, 15, and 20 miles to grass.

Grain was very high when we first entered the town, selling freely ay $5 and $6 the fanegan (140 pounds.) As our wagons draw near, and the crops of wheat are being gathered, it is generally falling to four dollars the fanegan.

Milk sells at six cents the quart. Eggs, too, for the same sum; sugar 35 cents per pound, and coffee 75 cents. The Sugar made in the country is principally made from the cornstalk.

A great reduction must now take place in the price of dry goods and groceries—20 per cent, at least, for this was about the rate of duty charged by Armijo, which is now, of course, taken off. He collected annually some 50,000 or 60,000 dollars, principally, indeed entirely, on goods imported over land from the wagon load, without regard to the contents of the wagon.
Mr. Alvarez, our respectable consul here, informed me, that the impression from the United States, through New Mexico, varied very much; but that he thought they would average about a half million nearly, and no more. Many of the wagons go on to Chihuahua without breaking their loads.

New Mexico contains, according to the last census made a few years ago, 100,000 inhabitants. It is divided into three departments—the northern, the middle, and the southeastern. These are again subdivided into counties, and the counties into towns. —The lower, or southern, is comparably the richest, containing 48,000 inhabitants, many of whom are rich, in the possession of farms, stocks, and gold dust.

The statistics and resources of this whole country I will defer entering into until my return from the south.

This country, although poor and barren, unless the gold mines should be more extensively developed, is of great interest to the United States, and all important for her to possess. The road from here to Fort Leavenworth presents no obstacle for a railway, and if it continues as good to the Pacific, will be the route over which the U. States will pass immense quantities of merchandise into what will, at one day become the rich and populous state of Sonora, Durango, and Southern California.

As a military possession, it is important and necessary. Its mountain fortresses have long been the retreating place of the warlike parties of the Indians and robbers that sally out to intercept our caravans, moving on the different line of travel to the Pacific.

Another event of the day I must not omit to mention—the ball given at the palace by the general on Thursday night. It was well attended by all the principal people in town, Madam Tula included, and kept up to a late hour. The American cotillion was danced once or twice, but soon gave way to the rocha, the boleso, and the Italian. Every variety of figure was introduced in the dance; but the waltz was the basis of all, except the boleso which, as danced here resembles our Negro jig. My friend Lieut. Cribbon, of the artillery, has noted some of the music, which may be that of the time of the conquest. I send a few of the airs, some of which are pretty, and when I get back to Washington, hope to find them in vogue.

August 31st—Lieutenant Warner arrived to-day, with the wagon train of ordinance stores; but the general cannot yet relieve him from the duty. To-morrow a small expedition goes to Taos; but Lieutenant Peck being sick, I have not an officer to send with it.

To-day, pretty well authenticated accounts have arrived that Armijo, having met Ugarie advancing up the Del Norte with 500 regulars and several pieces of artillery, returned with, and is now rallying his forces in the lower country to the amount of four or five thousand; and it is said that numbers are joining him from the upper towns. In consequence, the general has strengthened the army with which is to meet him, with all his disposable force.

We march day after to-morrow; and I shall turn over the construction of the fort to Lieutenant Gilmer, and leave Lieut. Peck to assist him, as he is still unable to ride.

NNR 71.140 October 31, 1846 Gen. Stephen Watts Kearney’s proclamation organizing territorial government in New Mexico

The most of the papers we find regard the following as a hoax. The Union is silent on the subject:--

Another Proclamation from Gen. Kearney

From the New York Express.

The Pittsburg American has a letter from Santa Fe, dated September 12, enclosing another proclamation by General Kearney, summoning the citizens of New Mexico to hold an election on the 25th of October, to elect a delegate to the Congress of the United States, and members of a Territorial Legislature, the latter to assemble in Santa Fe on the second Monday of December next. The Senate to consist of 13 and the House of 35 members. Two candidates for delegates to Congress announced, Don Manuel Linosa, Secretary of the Territory, and Mr. Magoffin, a merchant of Santa Fe connected with the house of P. Harmony & Nephews, of New York. It is supposed two or three other candidates would take the field. (The first we have seen of this proclamation is in the Cleveland Herald.)

"The proclamation called on the alcades and all other magistrates to superintend the polls' count the ballots, make returns, and preserve order; and commands all officers, soldiers, and followers of the army to abstain from all interference in said elections, and to be vigilant in securing the peaceable and undisturbed enjoyment of the good citizens of the Territory in the exercise of their valuable privileges authorized by this proclamation."

NRR 71.144 October 31, 1846 Gen. Pedro Ampudia's evacuation of Monterey, occupation by American forces

EVACUATION OF MONTEREY

Monterey, Mexico, Sept. 29, 1846

Gentlemen-We are at length in quiet possession of this place, the last division of Ampudia's army having marched out yesterday morning. The 1st division marched our on the 26th, the 2d on the 27th, and the balance on the 28th. I saw the two last and was able to form a tolerable good idea of the number of men in them. There could not have been fewer than 2500 in each division, of regular soldiers, well armed and equipped. Add to these some two thousand horsemen who left the city in small parties, during the four days flight, and at least 5000 citizens of the town who took up arms in its defense, and you have a pretty strong force for the defense of a place which nature and art have combined to render as strong as any in the world.

How such an army thus situated, could ever allow itself to be conquered by a force of less than 7000 men, will always appear strange to me. The cowardice of Ampudia is now established beyond a doubt. So careful was he of his person, that it is said he never once left his house when any firing was going on.

I felt perfectly satisfied, when I saw the Mexican troops pass out of town, with the arrangements which Gen. Taylor had made with them. To have taken all these men prisoners would have been useless. Their arms we did not want; their horses were worthless with a few exceptions, and it would have been very expensive and troublesome to feed and guard so many men. And moreover, it would have cost many a valuable life to have carried the city at the point of the bayonet.

I rode out with the head of the column day before yesterday, when their second division left town. That scene alone would almost have remunerated one for the long journey to Monterey. At the head of the column rode the commander of the division, with his staff, accompanied by Maj. Scott, of the 5th infantry, with his Adjutant (Lieut. Deas) and Lieuts. Hanson, Robinson, and McLaws. Col. Peyton rode by the side of the chief, and received a very affectionate embrace from him as we turned out to let the column march on, when the head had reached Palace Hill.

And now was presented a scene that I can never forget. Two regiments of infantry led off with colors flying, drums beating, and trumpeters blowing with all their might. The fifers made all the noise they could.—The men were all well armed, and the whole division seemed to be well appointed, with the exception of shoes, in lieu of which, most of the men wore sandals. Three pieces of artillery were in the center of the column, one six, one nine, and one twelve pounder. The line, marching four abreast about one mile.

The army was accompanied by a great many females; officers wives on horseback, their faces muffled, and with hats on; soldiers wives mounted on donkeys or on foot, some of them carrying burdens that I would scarcely think of packing upon mules; young women with short petticoats, and hats, tripping lightly along; young girls trudging along with their little valuables in their arms.

Yesterday morning the last division was drawn out in the plaza next to the Cathedral—that is, all the plaza could hold—and Captain Miles, who is stationed there with his regiment, (7th infantry,) drew up his command and saluted the regiments as they passed him.
The 1st division is encamped in the grove, three miles east of town—one of the loveliest spots in the world, shaded by large pecan and live oak trees. This grove seems to be the only woodland in the region, and is resorted to by the citizens of Monterey, as a place for holding pic-nic parties. The 3d, a volunteer division, is also encamped in the grove. Gen. Worth's division occupies the town. The citizens are beginning to return in great numbers, and appear to feel glad that the Mexican army has left them.

NNR 71.144-10/31/1846 Gen. Stephen Watts Keran'y excursion south and return to Santa Fe

Santa Fe. -Latest- An express arrived at Fort Leavenworth on the evening of the 17th October, with intelligence from Santa Fe to the 17th ult. Brig. General Kearney had returned from the south, after a very successful tour. The inhabitants all hailed the stars and stripes with joy, and none expressed dissatisfaction but the rich. The middle and lower classes looked upon General K. as their deliverer. Orders had been issued to have the dragoons and 100 of Fischer's command, in readiness to march to California by the 25th September, at which time the Mormons were expected to arrive. --Gen. Kearney will command this expedition in person.

NNR 71.144-10/31/1846 Col. Canales at San Fernando

CANALES- We learn that this notorious Mexican colonel was at San Fernando at last accounts. He is supposed to have commanded the men who cut off Dr. Alsbury and party. He will be likely to keep on the Mexican side of the lines hereafter. One of Gen. Patterson's orders is aimed at just such scamps as he.

NNR 71.144-10/31/1846 Military and Naval Movement

Military and Naval Movement. - U. States steamship Massachusetts went to sea on Monday, from New York, with troops for our army in Mexico, which she will land at Brazos. They have been enlisted for the 4th, 5th, 6th, and 8th infantry, and are under orders of officers most of whom were engaged at Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma.

NNR 70.337 Aug 1, 1846 Gen. Mariano Paredes y Arillaga requests permission, which is granted, to place himself in command of the Army in the North, arrangements with regard to other Mexican commanders

Paredes Elected President. Shortly after the meeting of the Mexican congress, that body proceeded to organize the executive power, by a decree that it should be deposited provisionally in a magistrate elected by a plurality of the votes of congress, and that a vice president should be elected at the same time to act in the absence of the president. This decree was passed on the 10th of June, and on the 12th the election was held. Gen. Paredes was elected president, receiving 58 out of 83 votes. Ben. Bravo received 13 votes, and Gen. Herrera 7 votes. Gen. Bravo was then elected vice president, receiving 48 out of 82 votes. The highest opposing candidate was D. Luis G. Cuevas, who received 17 votes.
Gen. Paredes took the oaths of office on the 13th as provisional president, and at the same time pronounced another discourse, in the most notable passage of which he expresses his confidence that congress will grant all the supplies and make every effort necessary to defend the national cause. He reviews at length the wrongs which Mexico has endured at the hands of the United States, and concludes with desiring permission to assume of Senor Bustamente, who was ill, Dr. D. Louis Gonzaga Gordoa presided over congress. He replied to the president in substance, that every question of domestic policy shrunk into insignificance compared with the invasion of the country on the Rio Bravo; that the Mexican who should think of aught else than the injustice and treachery with which their soil was trampled, and the necessity of avenging their outraged honor, had no right to claim a share in their patriotic devotion.

On the 18th permission was granted to Paredes to place himself at the head of troops, and proceed to join the army of the North. Gonzalez Arevalo was to leave the capital on the 19th in command of the advance of the forces of Paredes. Gen. Mejia was in the actual command of the army of the North, Arista having been ordered to Mexico, and Ampudia to remain at San Luis Potosi. [A paper of the 27th ult. says that Gen. Arevalo, instead of proceeding to the frontier, had marched for Guadalajara to put down the insurrection.]

Gen. Bravo left Vera Cruz for the city of Mexico on the 24th, to discharge the functions of president in the absence of Paredes

NRR 70.337-338 Aug 1, 1846 consideration by the Mexican Congress of a declaration of war against the United States

Declaration of War Proposed. The committee of congress upon foreign relations and upon war made a joint report upon the 16th upon that part of the message of Paredes relating to the United States. The reports recommends the passage of a bill declaring Mexico to be in a state of war with the United States. We do not find that the bill had actually been passed. Bocanegra and Valencia were among the members of this committee. After a short report upon the circumstances of the case, the committee proposed the following:

Project DE LA Loi. The extraordinary national congress of the Mexican republic considering:

That the republic of the United States of America, with notorious violation of all right, has instigated and protected openly and perseveringly the insurrection of the colonists of Texas against the nation which had admitted them upon its territory and generously shielded them with the protection of its laws:

That is has incorporated the same territory of Texas into in union by an act of its congress, notwithstanding it has always belonged by undisputed right to the Mexican nation, has been recognized as such by the United States themselves, as appears by the boundary treaties of 1832 and 1835:

That is has not maintained the solemn assurances and reservations in regard to the rights of the Mexican republic, which by means of its agents it had made conformity with whose treaties:

That is has also invaded the department of Tamaulipas, introducing an army upon the left bank of the Rio Bravo, giving occasion and origin to the battles of the 8th and 9th of May of the present year:

That in time of profound peace, and during established relations of amity, between the two countries, it has invaded by land and sea that territories of the Cali:

That it has blockaded the ports of Matamoros, Vera Cruz, and Tampico of Tamaulipas, opening its fire upon the defenses of the latter:

That it has authorized a levy of troops against Mexico:

That it has declared war against the republic under the pretext that the said states had been invaded, when in fact they made the invasion:
And lastly, considering that the nationality of the Mexicans is seriously compromised by the power and the spirit of usurpation, flagrantly manifested by the neighboring nation of the United States.

NNR 70.341-342 Aug 1, 1846 letter from "The Corporal" with the Army of Occupation at Matamoros

"THE CORPORAL," whose exceedingly lively and well written articles, communicated to the New Orleans Bee, keep the public well posted up as to the affairs on the Rio Grande, writes from

Matamoros, July 4th, 1846

I was in conversation with Mr. De Grey, who has returned here from Chihuahua, near two hours this morning. He says that he left San Antonio with others about two months ago with good on a trading expedition to Chihuahua, and proceeded on the route unmolested until he had reached Santa Clova, where they were stopped by the guad stationed on the river and their goods taken from them, in the name of the revenue laws of Mexico. Mr. De G. then left his party and traveled down the east bank of the Rio Grande, for a few days, when he crossed over and went to Saltillo, where he was advised of the bloody battle of the 9th, by its citizens, who stated to him that they would never go against the Americans again, and that it was a generally expressed thing at every place they had heard of. He says he was stopped by Arista, who was at his rancho, near Monterey, for two days, and although the general had quit the Mexican army forever, he still thought it his duty to detain and would likely have kept him had he not managed to escape and get into Monterey. This place he found dull and "heavy" and not one Mexican soldier in it--the people damning Paredes and the government, saying the soldiers had eaten them out of everything and then left them for the Americans to prey upon, whom they were looking for with much anxiety. They told him at this place that there was much eagerness displayed by the inhabitants of Coahuila and the upper part of Tamaulipas before the news of the fight reached them, but all operations in military affairs ceased after it, and patriotism was sunk. The remnant of the army--not 500--have gone to Lenaes, and were in a pitiful condition, and lessening the number daily by desertion. They had recruited a little whilst there, and fortified several points, but the citizens said it was labor thrown away. He heard that 600 men volunteered at Monclova, and were "eager for the fray;" but the startling news from the Rio Grande gave them a lick back; they mutinied, and 500 of them left sans ceremony. They had been made to believe that our pockets were lined with gold. (How they would have been so sucked had they got into the pockets of some folks I wot of.) He saw General Cannales near Reynosa, who told him that he commanded but 125 men at the time. Carabajal, his cher ami, gave De Grey, a passport to protect him from the band.

I am happy to inform you that the present swell in the river has had the good effect of clearing a channel at the mouth, by washing away the sand, and leaving it open for vessels of 5 or 6 feet water. The vessels at the mouth have gone out and several steamers have come in laden with military stores.

Several rows have occurred in this place during the last few days, which have compelled General Taylor to resume strict measures again. Several Mexicans have been killed and others wounded. Those of our men who engage in these broils are bad men--who come to town and remain here about during the day, in connection with some rangers of similar character, but I am proud to say, for the honor of the service, they are few in number.

There are, and have been for ten days, a set of mountebanks here performing on the tight rope and cutting "fantastic tricks before high heaven." About half an hour before the commencement of their performances they mount each a mustang, and proceed by a base drum and charionets, parade through the principle streets--dressed in their performing costumes, and followed by all the juveniles of the town. They are natives, and style themselves, "Compania del Norte." I have not had the courage to visit them.

NNR 70.342 Aug 1, 1846 visit of British naval officers to Gen. Zachary Taylor
"Curiosity runs high" to know the object of a visit of two British naval officers to General Taylor, who arrived here in a vessel of war from Tampico. Communication being cut off, they sent their dispatches by mail to their consul at Matamoros, to be laid by him before the consul general. Nous verrons.

Appearances indicate a move of the army into the interior as soon as the waters subside.

Report says Gen. Paredes has sent a proclamation to the people of Matamoros, calling upon them to treat our regulars with every kindness and consideration, because of the unparalleled kindness and attention to the wounded, as well as prisoners and citizens. He takes occasion to score the Texans, &c. If this be true, it argues more favorable than otherwise.

NRR 70.343 August 1, 1846, Court of Inquiry, charges against General Gaines, Library for the Army of Occupation, Volunteers

The Court of Inquiry ordered to assemble at Fortress Monroe, (Old Point), for the investigation of the charges against General Gaines, met on the 21st, and organized for the transaction of business. - The Court sat with closed doors of course. All the members had not arrived. Gen. Gaines was, upon his arrival at Fortress Monroe, received by Col. Walbach, commandant, and saluted with 13 guns, together with the honors due to his high rank.

A LIBRARY FOR THE ARMY OF OCCUPATION. - Presuming, probably, that the army would have leisure for study, the following publishers in New York have contributed a very excellent library for the army on the Rio Grande: - Harper & Brothers; Burgess, Stringer & Co.; Wiley & Putnam; Saxton & Miles; Mark H. Newman; W. Taylor & Co.; J. & G.A. Langley; Baker & Seribner; M.W. Dodd; Darius Mead; J.S. Redfield; Fowler & Wells; C.S. Francis & Co.; Wood & Son, and Stanford & Swords. The idea was suggested by the Rev. Mr. Marshall, of Vicksburgh, Miss., at present in New York on a visit.

The government is buying mules in Tennessee, at $100 apiece.

Lieut. DEAS, who, it was reported at the time, had been attracted by some Mexican damsel, on the banks of the Rio Grande, opposite Fort Brown, but who in reality had swam the river in search of the lamented Col. Cross, and was captured by the enemy, has been restored to his company.

DEserters. - The two Sergeants who deserted from Capt. Deas's company of Alabama volunteers on the Rio Grande, were arrested in Mobile, and were about to be sent back to be tried by a military court, when a writ of habeas corpus was taken out for their detention, and the examination of their case before a civil court. After hearing the case, the judge decided that they should be returned to the camp for trial by court martial. From this decision an appeal was taken to the court of appeals, where the matter now lies.

DEATH OF C. J. McNULTY. - Capt. Hicks, of the New Era, arrived yesterday from New Orleans, reports the death of C. J. McNulty, on his way to the seat of war. He died just below Memphis. He was a private in the Knox county volunteers, and formerly well known as the clerk of the house of representatives.

GEORGIA VOLUNTEERS. - Two men were drowned - Farrar and McNier - in the Alabama river, while on their way to Mobile. They jumped overboard from the steamer in a fright.

The Mobile papers gives the particulars of an affair, on the wharf in that city, connected with a corps of volunteers from Georgia. Some of the men undertook to torment some negroes fishing at the wharf. Two were knocked into the river and one of them drowned. Excitement followed, and the troops were for hurrying off the boat on which they were embarked - but the mayor ordered their detention, and three men were arrested and taken before the mayor. Two were, after examination, discharged, and the third sent to prison to answer for his crime.

SOUTH CAROLINA VOLUNTEERS. - The secretary of war has informed the governor of S. Carolina that there is no necessity at present for calling the regiment of that
EXPEDITION AGAINST CHIHUAHUA. - The company of U. States dragoons that have for some time been at Austin, Texas, left there on the 16th June, for San Antonio.

Capt. R. M. Snell, of the Texan volunteers, has arrived at Galveston for the purpose of raising three or four companies of foot, for what service is not stated.

THE SANTA FE EXPEDITION. - Col. Price's regiment. A letter from Lexington, Mo., dated the 2d, says - "Col. Price has been informed by Col. Kearney, that his regiment will be received, provided he raises eight hundred infantry - more cavalry not being wanted in the expedition. Col. Price, it is said, objects to this arrangement, and a doubt exists whether he will be able to succeed in raising the number of men." There can be no doubt that Col. Kearney has more mounted men with him than is necessary for the expedition, and we are surprised at the opposition which Col. Price makes, to the new service with which Col. Kearney desires to invest him. He ought not to hesitate about obeying Col. Kearney's requisition, more especially as it may conduce to the safety of the expedition, and to the promptness with which his men may be brought into the field.

NNR 70.343 August 1, 1846 Full Complement of NY Volunteers

New York Volunteers. We learn that the full complement of seven regiments of volunteers required from this state, for service in the war against Mexico, has already been obtained, and all the line officers commissioned. It is expected that the field officers will also receive their commissions in the course of twelve or fourteen days, when the whole force will be complete, awaiting orders from the war department. An excess, nearly sufficient for another regiment, we understand, has been reported to the adjutant general's office.

NNR 70.343 Aug 1, 1846 account of traders, emigrants, and soldiers setting out for Santa Fe, Oregon, and California

Trade to Sante Fe, California, and Oregon.

Dr. J. Gregg, the author of "Commerce of the Prairies," in a letter to the editors of the Boonslick (Missouri) Times, gives the following important statements.
Independence, June 30th, 1846.

The traders having left this place in detached parties, as each proprietor finished his preliminary arrangements and got his goods and chattles, freight and cattle ready for starting, it is difficult to form a correct estimate of their numbers or quantity, unless one had taken the pains of stationing himself upon the borders at the opening of the navigation, in the spring, and counted them when passing. I have, however, by minute and frequent inquiries ascertained that there are "en masse" upon the Santa Fe trail, 216 wagons.

Still behind to start during the summer, principally belonging to Mexicans, say, Small carriages, buggies, &c., 150 " 50" 416 --having on board, as near as I can estimate it, an amount of merchandise, costing a fraction over one million of dollars, which in more than treble that of any previous season.

These vehicles, of various sorts, are accompanied by people as various -- compromising traders and wagoners, loungers, on and connoisseur travelers, loafers and loungers, amounting to about one thousand men.

The Oregon and California emigration, (much the larger part of which is for the latter country,) amounts to, men, women, and children, about two thousand persons, and in all probability, I think, at least 400 wagons of all descriptions.

Then, there is our army, the number of which is quite uncertain, although, including dragoons and volunteers, infantry, and cavalry, it will, from present indications, amount to about three thousand men accompanied by two hundred and fifty wagons.

Thus, we have about six thousand souls, with one thousand wagons, moving westward, across the great prairies, during the present summer, from this part of our frontier, How many may put off from other portions of our western border, I know no more than you; but report says that a large number of troops will leave Arkansas next month for our southwestern frontier and Mexico.

Your Friend,
Josiah Gregg.

NNR 70.344 Aug 1, 1846 mustering of the New York regiment destined for California, complaints of favoritism to Col. John D. Stevenson

The expedition to the Pacific. -- The regiment under the command of Col. Stenvenson, destined for California, was mustered and inspected at the New York arsenal yard on the 21st ult. It is said they intend to encamp on Bedloe's Island, and pass the time previous to their departure in active drill.

The Mechanics' Journal says. -- "Very just complaints are made of the favoritism of the administration in allowing John D. Stevenson to raise a regiment for immediate service, while volunteers are enrolled in New York and waiting to be ordered into survive, waiting without pay, and even without any provision for their maintenance. A son of Mr. Marcy is to be paymaster of this regiment, for the administration has long since assumed the right of appointing the officers of the militia, though in direct defiance of the constitution, which reserves that right to the states respectively. Sir Robert Peel, with the immense patronage in his power, made it a rule never to appoint a relative to office. With all the admiration which this administration exhibits for British examples, this is a precedent which there appears no disposition to follow."

NNR 70.352 August 1, 1846, Steamer Princeton detached for Pensacola

THE PRINCETON, U.S. STEAMER, which has been exceedingly useful in maintaining the blockade of Vera Cruz, performing what no other vessel in the navy was as capable of doing, has suddenly been detached by Commodore CONNER, in order to bring despatches, with which she arrived at Pensacola, on the 20th, in five days from Vera Cruz. The despatches are said to be from our Pacific squadron. Of their purport nothing has transpired.

NNR 70.352 August 1, 1846, "ARMY OF OCCUPATION."

Our latest dates from the Rio Grande left the army still waiting for means of transportation and for supplies to enable them to progress. Gen. Taylor is now camped with four regiments, (Colonels Walton's, Davie's, Dankin's and Mark's,) with the Alabamians, under Capt. Desha, at Buena Vista, on the borders of a lake, seventeen miles northwest of Matamoros. The health of the volunteers here, with Gen. Taylor, had much improved, owing to the fine air they enjoyed and splendid encamping grounds they occupied.

The roads were perfectly impassable for wheeled vehicles, owing to the swampy soil, ocasioned by the immense falls of rain which had recently taken place. - The steamer Mercer arrived at the mouth of the Rio Grande, all safe, on the 17th inst.
There were no signs of Mexican soldiery in the vicinity of Camargo.

Capt. Walker had returned from his expedition to Monterey, and delivered a report which is said to be an exceedingly interesting one of the state of the country through which he passed, halting places, &c. &c. - There is no probability of an opposition being made to the advance of the American troops between Camargo and Monterey, and from what could be collected, the Mexican force concentrated at the latter point, is extremely insignificant. Nothing regarding the reported approach of Paredes, with the army of reserve, of an authentic nature has been ascertained at headquarters, although ?? are out in some numbers for that purpose. Everything, however, seems to announce that the possession of Monterey will be fiercely disputed, as it is by nature and art, one of the most powerful strongholds in Mexico. The inhabitants and soldiers are daily employed in improving its defences.

Our informant states that it was reported by the Rangers that they had penetrated to the precipitous cliffs that overhang Monterey, when a trooper, a very adventurous soldier, named Cummins, reached a point overhanging the Bishop's Palace, which commanded a view of the whole city. The utmost activity seemed to prevail among the Mexicans, who were busily employed in repairing the old fortifications and erecting new ones. - The number of troops was not ascertained, but from the movements observable, it was evident they were preparing every means of defence.

The crops it is feared, are almost irreparably injured. The cotton harvest is annihilated; as for the corn much will be saved, although greatly deteriorated.

The Mexican peasantry are employed very diligently in cutting wood and piling it on the banks of the river, for the steamboats. They receive $2.50 a cord. It is musket wood, and burns very well. Gen. Taylor put it to them, whether they would cut it and get paid, or oblige him to have it cut by his own men, when they would lose the price of labor. Wood, however, he added, must be had.

Business is very brisk at Matamoros. Fine weather had again assumed a permanent aspect; the waters were every where falling, and the whole of the military were joyfully preparing for the opening campaign.

NNR 70.352 Aug 1, 1846 mounted riflemen and Mormon infantry for California

"Army of the West"

We find the above designation fully assumed in an official order from Col. Kearney, 1st U. S. dragoons, dated "Headquarters, Army of the West, Fort Leavenworth, June 19th, 1846," directed to Capt. Allen, of said regiment, which together with Capt.
Allen's "circular to the Mormons," dated "Camp of the Mormons, Mount Pisgah, June 26th," are published in the St. Louis Republican, of the 24th, as taken from the Nauvoo Eagle, of the 17th June. The overture to the Mormons in the orders and circular are very comprehensive. Gen. Kearny distinctly point to California as his place of destination, and that he stipulates for the discharge of the Mormons from service in that country. He asks for five companies of infantry. The Mormons are eager to embrace the overtire. The Republican adds: "We learn from the same source that Gen. Kearny in consideration of their having placed five hundred men at the disposal of the government, has emigrating Mormons, and that they shall have the use of "any of the Indian lands they may think proper to select,"until they are ready to cross the mountains. The Mormons have, in accordance with this arrangement, selected Grand Island, on the Platt river, for their temporary residence. It is a large tract and has a salt spring upon it. There they will winter, and collect the entire Mormon population of the west, preparatory to their march to California next spring. They propose to push forward from this point as rapidly as possible, and, after reaching in, to send back from five hundred to one thousand wagons, for the purpose of helping along those who may yet be in Illinois, Iowa, or Missouri. This is to be done with all possible expedition. Grand Island is stated to be between one hundred and two hundred miles west of Council Bluffs. At the last dates the requisition of Gen. Kearny was rapidly filling up; and on the 17th, the United States officers gave the Mormons a splendid fete or ball, which is said to have been a fine affair."

A letter from an officer date --Camp at Cotton Wood, July 10th, published in the National Intelligencer, of the 30th, states that the detachment crossed Kansas on the 2d, and were 180 miles from Fort Leavenworth, without meeting with any accident. They had no intelligence as yet from the detachment sent under Captain Moore to overtake the Santa Fe expedition.

The companies of Mormon infantry and Col. Price's regiment of mounted Missourians, are expected to join general Kearny at Bent's Ford, at which place he halts for them to come up. Including these he will have about 3 200 men with which to invade Mexico and Santa Fe.

Expenses of the War. The St. Louis Republican of a recent date has the following:

"It is only by ascertaining the actual cost of particular items that the expenses of the war with Mexico can be estimated. The government agents, a few days since, purchased five hundred barrels mess pork for the "use of the army of the West." This pork is to be transported to Santa Fe. It cost $10 per barrel. Three or hour years ago supplies were needed for an expedition on the same route, and contracts were made with Bent & St. Vrain, for transportation. They were paid 8 cents per lb., from Independence to Bent's Fort. The government, of course, paid the transportation to Independence. It is alleged that the contract to which we have alluded was a losing concern, and that no one will undertake it for less than ten cents per pound. A barrel of pork will average 320 pounds. The cost of its transportation from Fort Leavenworth, to which point all public stores are shipped to Bent's Fort, will then be thirty-two dollars. But this is not all. It has there to be wagoned to Santa Fe, and it is a very moderate calculation to say that the additional cost, with the transportation from St. Louis to Fort Leavenworth, will increase the cost to $40 per barrel. Add the original cost and it makes the actual expense of the barrel of pork, on its delivery at Santa Fe, fifty dollars. In other words, the government pays $25,00 for the 500 barrels of pork.

NNR 70.368 August 8, 1846, move toward Monterey anticipated

"It is now understood that we will move towards Monteray, a beatiful town at the head of the San Juan (river), about two hundred miles distant. I think it is probable that in two weeks more the mounted force, viz. the Texas mounted riflemen and the United States dragoons will be on their march thither. If we can get the needful transportation, we will overrun and occupy, before the end of summer, all that part of Mexico lying on this side of the Auahuae mountains. This I imagine will be the end of our operations in this direction. If the war continues, the main blow must be stricken through Vera Cruz. The means of reaching that point by water are always abundant, and we are taken at once into the heart of the enemy. where every blow will count. To approach the city of Mexico by Monteray will require immense transportation of provisions and forage, over an uninhabited desert of a thousand miles, with roads through mountains and defiles. We hear but little of the enemy. The rumor is, and has been for some weeks, that they are fortifying the pass this side of Monteray. It is said to be a strong place. Yet we will pass it, if we try."

NNR 70.368 August 8, 1846, CAMP, ON THE BATTLE-FIELD

MAY 10TH, 1846.

SIR, - In compliance with your request, I have the honor to report that, in the deployment of the 4th Infantry, I found myself in command of companies B, D, and K, on the left of the road as we entered, and having been ordered to cross to the right abd advance, did so. After crossing the pond, I had with me Lieuts. Hays and Woods and about twenty men of different regiments, mostly however, of the 4th. Upon deploying my men on the crest of the hill, I discovered one of the enemy’s pieces about fifty yards in my front which was defended by about 150 Infantry. I charged and took the piece and attempted to spike it, but not being able to do so, took it back to a place of safety. - The enemy had a breast-work in my rear, and opened a heavy fire on me, with about ten men, I dislodged him and drove him across the road. Too much credit cannot be given to Lieuts. Hays and Wooda, of the 4th. They were among the very first to reach the piece, and to them belongs the credit of its capture. - Whilst I was engaged in driving the enemy from his breastwork, these officers, with their men, repulsed a party that charged them in order to recapture the piece. I cannot refrain from calling your attention to Sergeant Major Maloney and Corporal Farrall, who behaved with remarkable coolness and gallantry. - Everybody did his duty nobly, as becomes American soldiers.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant.
ROBERT C. BUCHANAN, Capt. 4th Infantry

To Maj. G. W. ALLEN, Command’g 4th Inf’y.

LIEUT. BLAKE. A letter from Gen. Worth, dated New Orleans, May 18, 1846, says. -
You will probably by mail, hear of the loss of that gallant ornament and devoted member of your corps, my warmly cherished friend, Blake. The manner adds poignancy to our sorrows. Had he fallen in the conflict, in which by all accounts, he ead especially distinguished himself, regrets would have been turned into envy.
After the battle, on casting aside his weapons, one of his pistols accidently discharged, and gave him a mortal wound. Knowing and valuing him as I did, you will readily conceive how I deplore his loss, both as a gallant and true hearted friend, and accomplished comrade. He has left no better soldier behind."

"Our troops hav ebehaved with great intrepidity. - Every man has done his duty. My own gallant regiment speaks for itself in the list of the killed and wounded - verified by the colors of the crack Mexican regiment, that of Tobasco. Would to God I could have been with them; but a sad fate ordered otherwise. There is time yet; it is but the beginning of the end. I sail to-morrow, and, with God's blessing will be in line by the 21st.
(Lieut. Blake served with Gen. Worth throughout his operations in Florida.)

THE MORTALLY WOUNDED. The Surgeon General of the Army on the Rio Grande has sent to the editor of the Washington Union a list of the private soldiers who were follows:

James Manning, Thomas Cantwell, - Martin, - Eichler, Owen Hawkins, James Morgan, William B. Fuller, John Forsyth, Matthew Niddy, Charles Marsland, George Chisholm, Stockley, - Albertson, - Shermaher, Weigart Horace, - Francis, - Anthony, - Fisher, - Mullen, - Hunt, - Hart, - Wallace, - Farrell, - Lewis, - Murray, - Waldron, - Patton, - Haddock.

The names of the men who were killed outright, or who did not come under the observation of the surgeons, have not been reported to the Surgeon General's Office.

A number of fine artillery companies arrived at the Brazos before the departure of the Empresario. Gen. Smith, with the 3d and 4th regiments U.S. Infantry, had proceeded to Camargo. Brig. Gen. Hamer was to be left in command at Matamoros, with a regiment of volunteers and a supply of artillery to garrison the ports. Gov.
Henderson, at the last accounts, was lying dangerously ill at Matamoros, little hope was entertained of his recovery.

NRR 70.372, August 15, 1846, War with Mexico, Volunteers, Navy

The brig Empresario, the steamer New York, and the schooner Nutwe, all reached New Orleans on the 1st from Galveston and the seat of war - bringing a number of volunteers that had been discharged under orders from government. Among the passengers by the New York are Col. Morgan, Capt. Holton, and Lieut. Alvord, of the U.S. States army; Col. Narks, Adj. Hunter, Lieut. Harris, of the Andrew Jackson regiment, Louisiana volunteers; Col. Dakin, Maj. McCull, Capts. Fowles and Clark, and Lieut. Mace, of Dakins regiment; and Col. Walton, Lieut. Col. Forre, Maj. Breedlove, and Dr. Wilson, of the Washington.

The Empresario brought back Capt. Desha's company of Alabama volunteers, who have been ordered to New Orleans, to be mustered out of the service, in compliance with the instructions of the war department. Six additional companies of Alabama volunteers and the St. Louis Legion are to be disbanded. The regiment of Cols. Peyton and Featherston are not recognized by the department as attached to the service. Not a single company, and very few of the men had accepted the alternative offered to them by the department, of enlisting for twelve months.

A number of fine artillery companies arrived at the Brazos before the departure of the Empresario. Gen. Smith, with the 3d and 4th regiments U. S. Infantry, had proceeded to Camargo. Brig. Gen. Hamer was to be left in command at Matamoros, with a regiment of volunteers and a supply of artillery to garrison the ports. Gov. Henderson, at the last accounts, was lying dangerously ill at Matamoros, little hope was entertained of his recovery.

The propeller Massachusetts arrived at the Brazos on the 26th ult. The brig Crusoe struck on Brazos bar in going over, and upon making the landing she unfortunately sunk. The clerk of the New York reports that he saw on the 29th the bark Lazan, hence for Brazos Santiago, a shore ten miles to the east of the Brazos. The troops on board were all saved. - Her cargo consisted of government stores which were all saved; the vessel was a total loss.

Nothing was known of the movements of the Mexican forces. Letters from the city of Mexico stated that Paredes was to leave the capital to join the army on the 29th ult.

INCIDENTS OF THE BATTLE FIELD.

The Maryland Line. A letter from Point Isabel on the 2d inst., says: "There were four gentlemen from Baltimore in the battle of Palo Alto: the gallant and ill-fated Ringgold, who fell at the close of a long fight, in which he did incalculable damage to the enemy; Capt. Magruder, who, when the Mexican army charged upon the square of the artillery battalion, then unsupported by any other battalion, seized a musket which had fallen from the hands of a man killed near him, and fighting with the soldiers in the ranks, assisted in repelling the charge; Lieut. Randolph Ridgely, who, commanding two pieces, dashed to the assistance of the fifth infantry in the square, when charged by the Mexican Red Lancers, and in the most gallant manner assisted that regiment in repulsing it; and lastly, Mr. Lloyd Tilganan, a gentleman amateur, who graduated at West Point and resigned; but who, upon this occasion, reconnoitered the enemy's whole line before the battle, and, as a volunteer aid to Gen. Taylor, exposed his person every where, and was always in the hottest part of the field."

THE VETERAN OF NAPOLEON. As Churchill's battalion of artillery were advancing to take their position in the second line of battalion on the 8th, a private in the 4th regiment was come up to, who lay upon the battle field with both his legs shot off. He was one of the first that fell after the cannonade commenced, and was a veteran in Napoleon's wars. After having escaped in the terrible conflicts of Austrelitz and Wagnam, and in the retreat from Moscow, and the battle of Waterloo, he lived to fall on the Palo Alto, by a cannon shot from a Mexican battery. As his fellow soldiers passed him and noticed at every pulsation of his heart, that the blood flowed from his wounds, they stopped an instant to sympathise with him, the noble hearted fellow, as his eyes were glazing in death, waved them on, and with his last breath, said, "Go comrades, I have only got what a soldier enlists for."
A private, on the 9th, who had followed Lieut. Dobbins through the thickest of the fight, raised his musket at a Mexican, and would have blown him through if the poor fellow had not most petiously cried out amigo, amigo, at the same time dropping his weapon; the private did the same and advanced towards the Mexican to take him prisoner, the Mexican then perfidiously raised his piece and instantly killed the generous American. This so enraged Lieut. Dobbins, that he drew his bowie knife and at a bound reached the coward and literally split his head in twain.

NNR 70.373 Aug 15, 1846 notice of the departure of Maj. E. Kirby for the war

Major E. Kirby. Among the distinguished officers of the army that embarked on board the steamship Alabama, on Saturday evening bound for the seat of war, we noticed Major E. Kirby, of the regular army. Major Kirby, has rendered his country much service in his time, having served in the last war, and in the Black Hawk and Florida campaigns. He belongs to the Cincinnatus school of soldiers; for when his country needs not his services in the field, he may be found tilling the soil on his farm near Brownsville, Jefferson county, N.Y., formerly the residence of his distinguished father-in-law, the late Major Ge. Jacob Brown. It was the good fortune of the writer of this to meet Major K. last September, at the exhibition of the New York State Agriculture Society, at Utica, and well could he descant upon the beauties of a Burham, a Decon, and a Hereford. Major K. has gone out as paymaster general, and took with him $100,000 for the pay of soldiers—and it may be safely ventured that he is shipper of Mexican dollars to Mexico. [N. Orleans Tropic.

NNR 70.373 Aug 15, 1846 Account of the Heroine of Fort Brown

THE HEROINE OF FORT BROWN. The N. Orleans Picayune has a letter from Matamoros which furnishes some interesting particulars respecting the heroine of Fort Brown, who is generally known in the army of the south as "The Great Western." - The writer says: -

"She was first brought to the notice of the public in a few remarks by Lieut. Bragg, at the collation given by the army to the Louisiana delegation at Gen. Arista's headquarters in Matamoros. He mentioned her gallant conduct and noble bearing during the whole of the bombardment. A few of the incidents of the life of this extraordinary woman, which I have been able to pick up in camp, will be read with some interest; they prove that the sex has not been unrepresented in the soul-stirring and bloody scenes on the Rio Grande.

The Great Western belong to a class known and recognized in the organization of the army as "Laundresses," three of whom are allowed to draw rations in each company, and are required to wash for the soldiers thereof, at a price regulated by a council of officers. She arrived at Corpus Christi last autumn with the 7th infantry, to one of the companies of which her husband was attached. Up to the time the army marched for the Rio Grande, she performed all her appropriate duties, and in addition, kept a "mess" for the young officers of the regiment.

When the army took up its line of march for the Rio Grande, the women, with a few rare exceptions, were left behind to come by sea. A very few procured ponies and followed their husbands on their tedious and arduous march. Not so with "The Great Western." Her husband was sent by water, whether on duty or for disability I am unable to learn; but she, true to her character, declaring that "the boys" (young officers of her mess) "must have somebody to take care of them," purchased a mule and a cart, packed her luggage, cooking utensils, and supplies, mounted behind her donkey, with whip in hand, and displayed upon the whole route qualities and attainments which the best teamster in the train might have envied. During the whole journey she kept up the "mess," a relief from the burdens of which is the greatest boon to an officer on the march. The brigade to which she was attached arrived upon the banks of the Sal Colorado as Gen. Taylor was preparing to cross with the dragoons and the 1st brigade of infantry. The Mexicans upon the opposite bank were making great demonstrations by blowing bugles, &c., &c. After calmly surveying the scene from her cart, she remarked, with great coolness and determination, that "if the general would give her a good strong pair of tongs, who would wade that river, and whip every scoundrel that dare show himself!" It may be imagined that the men were not backward in crossing after that.
When Gen. Taylor marched to Point Isabel with his army, on the 1st May, the 7th infantry, and of course, The Great Western, remained to garrison Fort Brown. How that noble regiment and the two companies of artillery left in this work sustained themselves, is already known, but nothing will more gratify them than to have justice done their gallant heroine, of whom they speak in the warmest terms. She, with all the other women left behind, some eight or ten, moved into the fort, where her mess was soon in operation, the position of her tent and fire being near the centre of the fort. The enemy's fire opened on the 3d, just as she was commencing her arrangements for the "boys" breakfast. Every security that could possibly be provided was offered to the women, to whom the gallant soldier always gives his first attention. The magazines were the only "bomb proofs" in the fort, and as the government had sent no ammunition to fill them, the next most inflammable material - the women - found perfect security in them. These women, however, be it said to the honor of the sex, were not idle. - Most nobly did they ply the needle in preparing sand bags out of the officers' and soldiers' tents, wherewith to strengthen the work, and protect the artillerymen when serving their guns. The Great Western, true to herself again, declined participating in this protection of sewing, and continued her labors at the fire, in the open air. From the firing of the first gun all hands were at their posts, Lowd's and Bragg's artillery speaking in tones of thunder the indignation they felt at being thus saluted on a bright May morning.

When the hour arrived for breakfast, but few expected the luxury which awaited them. The mess was as well attended to as if nothing but a morning drill with blank cartridges had come off, and in addition a large supply of delicious hot coffee was awaiting the thirsty, who had but to call and partake, without distinction of rank. To some of the artillerymen, who were unable to leave their guns, the beverage was carried by this 'ministering angel,' and, as may readily be believed, no belle of Orleans, as much as she might be admired and beloved, ever met a more gracious reception. The fire of the artillery was kept up almost incessantly until dinner hour - a soldier's dinner hour is 1 o'clock - when the good and generous woman again provided for those who were almost utterly exhausted and worn out, a delicious dish of bean soup - this bean soup is declared by the Mexicans to be the foundation of that invincible spirit which they have seen so strikingly displayed by the Yankee soldiers. This she distributed again, without money and without price. Thus did she continue to discharge her duties during the seven days that the enemy kept up an incessant cannonade and bombardment. She was ever to be found at her post; her meals were always ready at the hour, "and always of the best the market afforded."

When the despatches were made up for General Taylor on the evening of the 4th, a number of officers and others had written to their friends at Point Isabel, and among them "The Great Western" had found time to communicate with her husband; and I have frequently heard it said by those who saw her letter, for it was loudly called for and made public, that her description, if not the most accurate, was certainly the most graphic which was given of the events of the 3d and 4th May. She expressed her full confidence in the ability of the garrison to sustain itself, and only regretted the absence of her husband. To supply his place, however, I am told that she applied, early in the action, for a musket and ammunition, which she received and put in a secure place, expressing her determination to have full satisfaction whenever the enemy should dare approach within range of her piece. This they never did, and our heroine must rest contented with the reflection that she nobly performed her own duty and will long be remembered by the besieged garrison of Fort Brown.

She is probably as celebrated for her personal appearance as she is for her deeds. With an erect and majestic carriage, she glories in a height - six feet - which fully entitles her to a place in the grenadier, any soldier of which might well envy her athletic but graceful form. But her reputation, the dearest of all things to a woman, is what she prides herself on. With virtue as a basis, and such heroic conduct to build with, she never need fear the necessity of exercising her extraordinary physical ability in defence of that reputation. But if attacked, the gallant defenders of Fort Brown will, I doubt not, be found pressing forward in her defence, and woe be to the dastard who receives a discharge of artillery from such gunners."

The Offer To Negotiate For Peace

President Polk's overtures to Mexico, to send or to receive a minister plenipotentiary with powers to settle the existing controversy and terminate the war, will not only meet the cordial approbation of the people of this country, but will also elicit the plaudits of all the Christian powers. This proposition of the president, it will be observed, was not at all dependant upon the success of his application to congress for the two millions of dollars which he asked that body for, with a view to aid him in the negotiation. The letter from the secretary of state, Mr. Buchanan, to the Mexican minister of foreign relations, proposing negotiation, was dated the 27th of July, 1846, and was winging its way towards "the Halls of the Montasumas," a full week before the president, in confidential message to the senate, apprised that body of his having any such design. The confidential message was sent to the senate on the 4th of August--informing that body of the step he had taken, and asking money to aid him in negotiation a peace.--That the Mexican government will be constrained to accept this overture of our governments under which they are laboring, will now be added beyond doubt--the earnest advice of the British legation, and the offer of that governments to mediate for a peace between the United States and Mexico. England might have been disposed to promote a dispute between Mexico and the United States, very naturally, so long as she had a quarrel of her own with the latter, which there was a probability would terminate in war, but having now settled all disputes of her own, she has such obvious interests to sub serve by a restoration of peace in Mexico--her commerce and her capitalists have so much to loose by Mexico being blockaded, invaded, overrun, and dismembered, that there can be no doubt of the sincerity of their interposition.

To the influence of the British diplomatic agents at Mexico, it is probable will soon be added that of a new French minister, with whom a frigate was about to proceed to the gulf with, when the last steamer left Europe. No potentate of Europe is more anxious to maintain a general peace amongst the Christian powers, that Louis Philippe. The continuance of a war between the United States and Mexico, would soon embrace other powers in the conflict.

Subsequently to the nomination of the above, which was on Saturday, a list of names for brevet appointments was received from Gen. Taylor, containing the following in addition to the above. Capt. J.B. Scott, 4th artillery.
Captain Lewis N. Morris, 3d infantry.
Lieutenant Colonel J. Garland, 4th infantry.

Lieutenant F.N. Page, 7th infantry.
Captain A. Lowe, 2d artillery.
Lieutenant B. Bragg, 3d artillery.
Captian D. S. Miles 7th infantry.

Colonel Twiggs, who is on General Taylor’s list, having recently (since the battles of the 8th and 9th of May) been appointed a brigadier general in the army, his name for brevet of that grade was not included in the list submitted to the Senate. About twenty more officers were presented as deserving brevets, if it should not be deemed proper to extend the number beyond the first class, but this was not done. As the list now is, it is believed to be large beyond any former precedent.

NNR 70.386 Aug. 22, 1846 General Gains, Court of Inquiry, Col. Thornton acquitted

General Gains— The Military Court of Inquiry, at old Point, concluded their task, and on the 11th ist., sealed and despatched their verdict to the war department. The conducing part of the gallant old general’s defence occupies four columns of the Norfolk Beacon.
NRR 70.386 Aug. 22, 1846 Capt. Thornton's defense

The trial of Capt. Thornton, 2d dragoons, on the charges preferred against him by the commanding general, for the loss of his squadron of dragoons, captured on the 25th April last, terminated on Wednesday. It is a long established custom, we believe, in both the army and navy, to bring to trial the commander of an expedition, whenever unfortunate; and this however, unfortunate to individuals, appears but just to the accused and the country--truth is vindicated, and the community learns whether her interests are committed to safe hands. Capt. Thornton was assisted, in the management of his case, by Capt. Barbour, 3d infantry, and Lieut. Bragg, 3d artillery; and at 10 o'clock, on Wednesday, his written defence was made to the court by Mr. Bragg.

Several members of the court, veterans who had stormed the breach, could not restrain a tear of sympathy--and many a moist eye was to be seen in the large audience which attended to hear the vindication of this gallant and universally popular officer.

We regret that we are not able to lay before our readers the whole of the admirable defense of the gallant captain. He commenced by stating that a long established principle of his profession, and a stern sense of duty on the part of his accusers, had brought him before the court in his present position. Success, he was aware, was, with military men, often the best of merit: yet he hoped to be able to show, even if he were not successful in his expedition, his failure was not owing to the omission of necessary precaution.

On the night of the 24th of April, with a command of three commissioned officers and fifty rank and file, he was ordered to reconnoitre a country some 27 miles in extent, and to bring information, whether the enemy had crossed the Rio Bravo, his numbers, and his position; and he had also further vested orders from the commanding general, to ascertain, if possible, whether he had crossed his artillery, and to report by the next day at 12 o'clock. He referred to the testimony of Capt. Hardee and Lieut. Cane, for the manner in which he executed these instruction. He regretted that he could not lay before the court the testimony of Lieut. Mason, but regarded his loss as nothing, compared with that of the friends and relations of the gallant young officer, who fell as he had lived, in the discharge of his duty.

From the recapitulation of the testimony of Capt. Hardee and Lieut. Cane, in the defense, it appears that every precaution was used to guard against surprise--that an advance guard was thrown out, that flanks were impassible for the most part, from the nature of the country it being a perfect defile, admitting at times a single horseman with difficulty, that when Captain Thornton halted his squadron to rest his men and horses, which was extremely necessary, a sentinel was placed at both ends of the road, so that no one could approach without his knowledge. About daylight next morning the command proceeded toward the river, and to the constant inquiries made of every one that was met, "whether the enemy had crossed," the reply was "he had," but all spoke from rumor--this Capt. Thornton believed to be unreliable authority upon which he could not base a report, and he referred as an evidence of this, to the numerous false rumors with which the American camp had abounded for a month previous. Captain T. alluded to the suspicious confidelity; and subsequent events, he thought, proved to lead him into a position from which retreat was impossible. Subsequent information upon which he could rely, satisfied him that his return to camp had been cut off, that the enemy was in his rear with a force of 500 cavalry and a party of Indians. Upon the receipt of this information, he redoubled his precautions--he increased his advance guard and placed it under the command of Lieut. Mason, with minute instructions to keep ahead and be vigilant, but not to fire upon the enemy unless forced to do so. From this time, Captain Thornton proceeded without a guide, Chapito having deserted him. Captain Thornton here argued, and we think conclusively proved that an attempt to return would have been more disastrous than his move forward; he also contended that a "rear guard," with such a small force, owl have been untactical, and, in his opinion, unnecessary; and, further, that it was not prescribed. The rear was assigned to Captain Hardee, and he never left it without being ordered back by Capt. Thornton. He went on further to state, that if the command had obeyed his instructions, they would not have entered the field in which they were afterwards captured; but, he... remarked, "no precaution from myself, or any one else, could have altered the result, our fate was sealed long before entering the field."

Captain Thornton, here summoned up the facts of the case, as shown by the testimony, from which it appeared that he had too responsible and somewhat variant duties to perform, that of commander of the squadron, and reconnoitering officer. For a guide, a Mexican of doubtful fidelity; a country of twenty seven miles in extent, with which he was totally unacquainted, and fifteen hours, and eight of them in the night, to perform this duty in. In the opinion of his officers, his rear could have been gained by day without his being able to know it. Spies were upon his actions from the time of his leaving the army, until his capture. Ordered to keep an attitude of peace, until the first blow should be struck. The following portion of this manly and soldier like defense, struck us so forcibly, that we believe that we can repeat it verbatim. "It was my misfortune," said Captain Thornton, "to secure that first blow, upon my devoted head, but it had to be secured, and why not by me?" Captain Thornton, here contended, that the information he obtained was important; that by means of his capture Gen. Taylor was able to understand his real position, that he was no longer on debated ground, and as an evidence of this, referred to the immediate call for reinforcements, the industry in the completion of Fort Brown and the march to Point Isabel for provisions. But for the loss of his squadron probably, the thanks of a grateful people would not now be showered upon the heroes of the battles of the Rio Grande, but instead, the tears of widows and orphans might have been met with the usual indifference, by the national legislature. Capt. Thornton, reminded, that to prevent this he would be willing again to hide in his bosom, the only bleeding heart amid the rejoicings of a victorious army. -- Capt. Thornton, here remarked if he neglected any of the usual precautions, it was from want of knowledge, and begged the court to acquit him of (?) and to find a verdict, if necessary, against him in incapacity. He then referred to his services in Florida, and thought the manner in which he discharged his duties there, well known to some of the court would enable him to defy such an imputation. Capt. Thornton concluded by saying, that his honor and military reputation, were in the hands of the ocuts that the country had found her's safe in their hands, and with confidence he submitted his to them.

NNR 70.386 Aug 22, 1846 account of the Kentucky mounted regiment

Volunteer Army. -- The Kentucky mounted men left Memphis about the 21st July. The Tennessee regiment left there on the 26th July, both en route for Mexico. The former are designated as,--

"The Hunters of Kentucky." -- The Calvary regiment of Col. Humphrey Marshall, mustering 100 strong, are represented as a body of martial men. They are generally athletic young men, riding splendid horses, and their picturesque dress imparts to them a romantic appearance. The hat particularly is very fanciful. It is a drab beaver with a broad brim, ornamented with several gold stars, and looped up with gold lace in the three cornered fashion of the Revolution. They all wear their beards unshorn(t) with boots over the legs of their trousers, reaching above the knee, armed with huge spurs on the head and faced with red morocco.

NNR 70.386 Aug 22, 1846 distrust of the members of the California expedition of the government's promises

The California Volunteers. The U. States Gazette says--It appears that the volunteers of California, who are at present encamped on Governor Island, are not quite as willing to go further than they have gone--at least upon the faith of the promise which the government has made to them. It was the general impression that after the term of their enlistment expired, they were to receive grants of land in California, as a reward for their services. Of course, this intention implied that California was to be made an integral part of the union

NNR 70.400 Aug 22, 1846 "Army of Occupation."

We have nothing from General Taylor's corps, to report this week. The discharge of Louisiana and Alabama volunteers, and their return home, occupies the southern papers for the time being, --and much dissatisfaction is expressed on all hands.

The difficulties with which this whole system of volunteer forces is surrounded, can hardly be appreciated by those that have not had an opportunity of observing how it works, and how it will not work. The embarrassment which government would have to encounter in the instances of these very men, was distinctly foreshadowed in remarks which we submitted at the time they were being embodied. The secretary of war is now heavily censured, and the treasury of the Union severely taxed, --the gallant troops that waited for nothing but to ascertain that the army of the nation was surrounded with difficulties, and threatened with destruction, to induce them to seize their arms and report to the scene of danger, after spending just sufficient time to completely organize, discipline, and fit them for action--no a day too much for that--are now discharged, without having seen an enemy.

The secretary of war had difficulties to encounter, take what course he would. To discharge those forces must have been unpleasant to him. But the organization of the army was imperative. The twelve months volunteers were crowding toward Gen. Taylor' lines, already incommodeed with more troops than he had the means of transporting or of provisioning, in an enemy's country, beyond the margin of navigation. Other officers, proud of their distinction, lead these new levies. It will take as long, at least, to organize, discipline, and fit these forces for efficient service in the field, as was expended upon the volunteers now discharged.

Gen. Taylor at the last dates, was urging on the supplies towards Camargo as expeditiously as he had it in his power. the roads had been impassable, and by the river, he had as yet and inadequate supply of light draught steamers to get his troops and munitions to that place.

The following are the latest we have from the Rio Grande.

"Camargo, (Mexico) July 23--We are furnishing transportation for the army, and securing supplies of forage on the route to Monterey. We have contracted for 1,000 to 2,000 mules,"(another letter fixes it positively at (1,500) "with the packing equipment's complete; and these, with the 500 wagons expected here, will be ample for the marching columns. A large portion of the 19,000 men of this corps d'armes will be left at the different depots and entrepots, from Brazos Santiago to China, about 60 miles from this place on the route to Monterey.

"The troops are now fast arriving here in our steamboats; and the General will, in all probability, move forward from here about the middle of the next month,--(August). Now comes the commencement of those operations which will require all the capacity, skill, and energy of our General to accomplish. The great difficulties of an army invading Mexico begin here. So far, everything has favored Gen. Taylor, and he has acquired not only a most enviable reputation, but his good fortune has become a proverb. I hope, of course, for his further success; but in order to secure it, the most careful combinations of every kind, preparatory to the march, are absolutely necessary. Too much haste may prove as great and evil as a faulty tardiness. It takes time for the requisite arrangements for the transportation required for so many men, suddenly collected here. Meantime, the General is impatient of the least delay, and the officers of our department are incessantly occupied in preparations.

NNR 70.400 Aug. 22, 1846 Yellow Fever.

The British steamer Vesuvius, reached Bermuda on the 11the inst., having twenty-seven cases of yellow fever on board, besides losing ten of her crew with the disease, on her passage from Vera Cruz. The captain reports that the fever had broken out on board the American squadron and the British frigate Endymion, off Vera Cruz.

NNR 70.400 Aug 22, 1846 additional regiment of volunteers for Santa Fe organized, artillery expected

Expedition against Santa Fe. The last accounts we have from Fort Leavenworth are up to the 9th inst. Seven companies had arrived at the fort, and three more were expected, to complete the regiment. The seven companies had voted for field officers, and Sterling Price, ex-member of Congress had been elected Colonel of the regiment, by the unanimous vote of the companies present. The companies to arrive could not, of course, although privileged to vote, change the result. The St.
Louis Republican states that the election of Col. P. was forced upon the regiment by an unmistakable imitation that it would be disbanded if he was not chosed. A private in one of the companies named Allen was elected Lieut. Colonel over D.D.
Mitchell, Esq., of St Louis, the person designated by President Polk for the office, by a majority of 90 votes. Four of the companies were to leave the fort, on their line of march, on the 10th inst.; the others were to follow as soon after as they could be furnished with transportation for provisions, &c.

Four companies, composing a separate battalion of artillery, were also daily expected at the fort.

Lieut. Col. Allen, of the U.S. Army, in command of the five hundred Mormon volunteers, was still at the fort. There was much bad feeling between this corps and the other volunteers. Liet. Colonel A. and his command were to take up the line of march on the 12th inst.

Still later accounts from Fort Leavenworth are up to the 11th inst. About one thousand more Mormons had arrived at the fort, in hopes of being mustered into the United States service. Two of the additional companies of volunteers had arrived at the fort, and Colonel Price's regiment marched out on the 10th inst.

Congress in Mexico

NNR 70.401 Aug 29, 1846 Indian threat to Chihuahua, approach of the vanguard of the American Army

Chihuahua, July 7. Our enemies on the East are the four tribes of Camanches, with their allies, the Cahiguas and others; on the North, the Apachas, subdivided into nine tribes, more numerous in population than the Camanches. On the same side also, are the Anglo-Americans, rocked in the cradle of the Indian whom he abhors, and nurtured with the blood and sweat of the negro whom he despises.
NNR 70.401 Aug 29, 1846 movements of Mexican troops for San Luis Potosi

Mexico, July 21. The Diario del Gobierno says --“Two brigades completely equipped, have already left this capital for San Luis Potosi and in a short time the Provisional President (Paredes) will depart with the remainder of the army of reserve.

NNR 70.401 Aug 29, 1846 Mexican arrangements to use the interior resources of Mexico to sustain the war with the United States

Thus the nation will see that the government has not made use of the extraordinary powers conferred upon it by congress for providing means to carry on the war. Our unjust invaders, who in the delirium of their ambition, have proclaimed that out want of resources would make us slaves without a conflict, will find that the Mexican nation has great resources in the interior, and that they will be sufficient in any event—for the administrative order and moral power of the government increase them. The government of the United States, with little reflection, will perceive that the war which it wages against us, is not to be terminated by a conquest of our country, but by honorable propositions of peace.

NNR 70.401 Aug 29, 1846 departure of Mexican troops from the capital

July 22. Left the capital for the interior, the 2d brigade, of 1,200 men, of all arms, with seven pieces of artillery, 500 horse, 400 mules, with ammunition and warlike stores. The 1st brigade had left on the 18th, in the direction of Matamoros, under command of Gen. Garcia Conde.

NNR 70.401 Aug 29, 1846 Assassinations by the insurgents of Guadalajara, dismay over the deplorable state of Mexico

The insurgents of Guadalajara by a surprise assassinated the troops of General Arevalo; but the papers state nothing positive as to the fate of the General himself. (The commander of the steamer says he was killed. Letters from Mexico also state that he lost his life.)

NNR 70.401 Aug 29, 1846 American troops reported leaving Camargo for Monterey

Mexico July 28. An express has just arrived, announcing that the United States troops to the number of 8,000 men have left Camargo on their way to Monterey. Last night the secretaries of departments withdrew, and to-day at 1 o’clock P.M. Gen. Bravo took possession of the presidency.

NNR 70.401 Aug 29, 1846 Gen. Nicolas Bravo assumes the presidency of Mexico, resignation of the ministers

Letters of Marque. A decree has been issued by the Supreme Government, in respect to cruises which may be made by privateers against the commerce of the U. States.
On the 28th, the Vice President, Gen. Bravo, assumed the reins of government in the Mexican capital. It was stated that the Paredes ministry continued in the exercise of its functions until that day. Gen. Bravo was about to appoint a new ministry.

NR 70.401 Aug 29, 1846 Mexican Army assembles at San Luis Potosi

According to the statements of the Mexican Diario Official, the army assembled at San Luis Potosi, numbered 10,000 men, and when this force and that under Gen. Azpeitia consisting of two regiments of infantry, a squadron of lancers, and a section of engineers with three 12 pounders, numbering in all 2,000 men, which was to leave the capital on the 24th, would join Mejia, the army in the field would number from 12,000 to 15,000 men. But 1,500 men were left to garrison the capital. Mejia who succeeded Arista in the command of the army on the frontier, reports on the 9th that he was about to march for Monterey with his column.

NR 70.401 Aug 29, 1846 steamer Princeton dispatched express for Pensacola

It is a remarkable coincidence, that just as the steamer Princeton was demonstrated to be of all the vessels of the squadron the most efficient in blockading the port of Vera Cruz, and was performing prodiges in that service, all at once she was detached by Commodore Conner, and arrives at Pensacola with important despatches for our government. The British steamer Dee must have left for Vera Cruz very speedily after the Princeton. The messenger dispatched by President Polk with instructions to Commodore Conner respecting the propositions to the Mexican government to send a minister to negotiate for peace, if he has good luck, will reach Vera Cruz about the same time that Santa Anna calculated to arrive there. We say if he has good luck, for the N. Orleans Picayune furnishes rather an unfavorable account of his progress.

NR 70.401 Aug 29, 1846 progress of the messenger bearing President James Knox Polk's overtures to Mexico

The messenger dispatched by President Polk with instructions to Commodore Conner respecting the propositions to the Mexican government to send a minister to negotiate for peace, if he has good luck, will reach Vera Cruz about the same time that Santa Anna calculated to arrive there. We say if he has good luck, for the N. Orleans Picayune furnishes rather an unfavorable account of his progress. That paper says--

"We stated in the Picayune a few days since that a bearer of dispatches for Com. Conner had arrived at Pensacola, and that the Wolcott, revenue cutter, Capt. Fatio, had received orders to proceed to the Gulf with him. She went to sea on Monday last but the captain fearing the approach of a storm, put back and Mr. Habersham, U. S. navy, the bearer of the dispatches, proceeded at once to this city, where he arrived yesterday. He will proceed to the Brazos to-day, and from thence proceed in one of the revenue cutters at that point to Vera Cruz."
There was a report widely circulated some time since, that Mr. Slidell, a connection of the late minister to Mexico, had been dispatched to the Island of Cuba by our government, and it was inferred that his object was to ascertain the views of the illustrious Mexican exiles there, in relation to affairs between Mexico and the United States. The Washington Union promptly and emphatically contradicted the insinuation at the time.

But to return to the news from Mexico, furnished by this arrival of the Dee, at Havana. The following are the prominent items:

Letters of Marque. A decree has been issued by the Supreme Government, in respect to cruises which may be made by privateers against the commerce of the U. States.

Camargo. --As the army of occupation has commenced its advance upon the interior of Mexico, by pursuing the Rio Grande up as high as Camargo, both by land and water, and as this will be the place where a permanent depot will be established, and from which the advancing army will leave the Rio Grande when it takes up its general march upon Monterey, it will naturally hold a conspicuous place in the estimation of the American people. The Matamoros "Flag" furnishes the following: Camargo is situated immediately upon the banks of the San Juan river, three miles from its junction with the Rio Grande. It is a small rudely constructed village, with some few stone building, many built of mud bricks dried in the sun, some constructed by driving stakes into the ground, and then plastering them with much, and others formed of cane and plastered in like manner. The number of inhabitants will not exceed two thousand; but as the Mexican government has never thought her population worthy of enumeration, no possible statement can be made of the population of any of their towns. The late extraordinary rise of the Rio Grande has caused the San Juan to back up and literally inundate Camargo, to the great damage of houses and property; also to the sacrifice of several lives.

Camargo may be considered the head of navigation, as above here the bed of the river is so filled up with rocks that its navigation higher up has never been attempted. The road upon leaving Camargo and crossing the San Juan, becomes higher and less obstructed by swamp grounds, and it then becomes an important inquiry what other obstacles may present themselves in the distance between this place and Monterey, which is 210 miles. The road passes through a level country, thickly set with a small underwood, the largest timber being ebony and the mesquite, neither of which grow to the height of more than 12 or 15 feet, and 12 or 14 inches in diameter. So dense is this undergrowth, armies of 10,000 men each might march for half a day within a mile of each other without the vicinity of one to the other being unknown.

Monterey. -- The literal meaning of Monterey is the king's woods; but to those who have been raised in a heavily timbered country, it would seem more appropriate to call it a grove of brush. It is a common saying with Texans who have traveled through the forest that "it's so d--d which you can't shove a bowie knife through it." And what may appear somewhat singular, every bush and shrub is armed with thorns curved in the shape of fish-hooks, and the hold they take upon the clothes and skin of travelers is not easily shaken off, as the jackets of the soldiery will testify to before they reach Monterey.

The whole distance is well watered from August until March, plenty of wood, reasonable pasture, many herds of cattle, numerous flocks of sheep and goats, now and then a small village-- which all have the appearance of decay. Scattered along the road are miserable huts, singularly picturesque from their original construction, not quite equal to rail-pen stables built in the backwoods of Arkansas and Texas for scrub ponies. Yet nature, in her mighty formations, has formed some positions on this road, which, if taken advantage of by a skilful and daring enemy, would prove a second Thermopylae to those might have the temerity to tread these formidable passes. The American army will no doubt look ahead before entering these dangerous and shady pavilions. The mazes of the labyrinth are beautifully pictured out by meandering paths and conflicting cross-roads, leading to some farmer's hut, some watering place, or the wily lure of some Mexican bandit.

Caiderete.--When within fifteen leagues of Monterey the village of Caiderete presents itself, enjoying the most lovely situation, standing upon a perfectly level plain, surrounded with green groves, presenting everlasting summer; the fields blesses with natural fertility. The beholder involuntarily exclaims, Why should a Mexican toil or labor?

NNR 70.402 Aug 29, 1846 difficulty over supplying Gen. Steven Watts Kearny's expedition to Santa Fe, reports of alarm in New Mexico

Provisions must of necessity also be vary hard to get, and unless some other means of securing them be found out than such as was anticipated previous to their departure, they will be in a very bad way this winter. It was pretty certainly known before they left, that there would not be even a show of fight on the part of the Mexicans, unless a very small force was sent along at first, for the assertion of the governor was made, and word sent to General Kearney by our informants to that effect; and he further says that if a respectable force comes upon him, he shall immediately abandon the country, and remove south of the Rio del Norte.

NNR 70.402 Aug 29, 1846 engineer corps at West Point being readied for Mexico

VOLUNTEERS.

West Point. An extra exertion is making at West Point to get the Engineer Corps ready to start for Mexico. Out of 67 men and 20 are from Philadelphia, and chiefly mechanics, fine fellows, "and to the marrow bone." The officers have been assigned, Capt. Swift and Lieuts. Smith and McClellan. As fast as the recruits are perfect in the infantry drill, they are put into another squad and drilled as engineers, in which they are fast learning the rudiments.

The rubber "ponton"train has been tried, and succeeds well. Two of the boats sustained 67 men, two horses, and two pieces ordnance, and the corps think they can bridge the river at West Point in an hour and a half strong enough to take a whole army over. All at West Point betokens that strict discipline that has given us such a gallant set of officers that will give as an effective army, with such good material as we have in our volunteers.

NNR 70.402 Aug 29, 1846 disorder among the New York troops gather for the California expedition

"It is said that the recruits for California now encamped on Governor's Island, are not behaving with the propriety which is becoming. It is said that the "regulars"were called out upon a day or two since."
The Ohio State Journal publishes the following letter from one of the Ohio volunteers in the army in Mexico:

Dear Brother:

Be not the least surprised if you should see me in Cincinnati in the course of six weeks. When I volunteered it was to fight, and not to be idle for a year. But I now find the regulars are to be able to defend any post of danger. Gen. Taylor says that one regular is worth five volunteers, and that he only wants volunteers for a standby. It would seem that we are kept merely to do the drudgery; and such is the case.

We had quite an affair a short time since. Colonel Mitchell as commandant of this post, ordered a volunteer from Baltimore to bring him something. The volunteer paid no attention to his order. Our colonel then commanded him a second time to perform the service. The volunteer turned upon his heel, and replied that "he would see him d--d first." I was close by doing duty, when Col. M. ordered me and five other cadets to arrest the Baltimorean. He immediately placed himself in a defensive position, and drew a knife, swearing at the same time that he would cut the first man that dared to come near him. Lieut. Col. Weller then approached and ordered us to "stand back"when all party got to fighting. So you see we have had one fight at least.

Our whole regiment and the Baltimore regiment were then all ordered out. But as we had but sic men on the ground, and as the colonel's tent was about two miles from our encampment, out colonel was disarmed and carried to the ground by a superior number of stout fellows, where they laid him down. Two of them were about to stab him, when I backed by our boys, jumped into the melee and released our commander from the ruffians. By this time the field was full of soldiers and the Baltimoreans left. I presume the case will undergo investigation.

Affectionately your brother,

A. Moss

Illinois Volunteers. Gen. Wool, accompanied by his aides, and a large portion of the Illinois volunteers, reached New Orleans on the 23d ultimo. These troops, it is stated, are destined for San Antonio de Bexar.

Troops for Chihuahua. Light company B, of the 4th regiment of U.S. artillery, under the command of Capt. J.M. Washington on the 18th ultimo. Capt. This force, it is stated, constitutes an independent command, which will be under Gen. Butler. It is to strike into the province of Chihuahua, between Santa Fe and Gen. Taylor's position; and it will no doubt interrupt the retreat of the forces which will fall back from General Kearney at Santa Fe. It will take the Santa Fe route to Mexico, and there cooperate with General Taylor. Its route is through the most healthy and richest parts of Northern Mexico.

NNR 70.403 Aug 29, 1846 Col. Churchill departs New Orleans for Texas

Col. Churchill, Inspector General, has left New Orleans for Texas. This indefatigable and veteran officer has, within the last six months, traveled over twelve thousand miles, inspected last spring on and near the Gulf of Mexico and in Florida, mustered into service all the volunteers in Indiana and Illinois and now goes to join Gen. Wool as chief of his staff, on the march to Chihuahua, in Mexico. The good wishes and the prayers of his numerous friends and the country attend him.

NNR 70.403 Aug 29, 1846 complaint about the manner of buying and treating wagons for the Army

Wagons for the Army. New Orleans dates of August 7, says -- "A large ship from Philadelphia brought a cargo of these wagons, which were landed some time since, and after laying exposed to out tropical sun on the Levee for eight or ten days, splitting and cracking, with their wheels and springs, the same ship is chartered to reload them for the Rio Grande, at a freight double that from Philadelphia--at least doubt what it ought to be from thence, though I think it probable there, as well as here, the government pay at least double what individuals would. It is really enough to disgust any bosy to see the manner the whole affair is being conducted; and the way they are going on, the treasury, even after issuing the ten-millions of treasury notes, will be bankrupt before congress again meets."

"FACTS."

"General Gaines learned at New Orleans, about the 1st May, 1846, that a Mexican army, of superior force to the army under General Taylor was advancing to invade Texas, and that actual war was impending. He was informed officially from General Taylor of his situation, and what auxiliary force of volunteers he had called from the states, viz: four regiments from Louisiana, and four regiments from Texas and he was requesting by General Taylor to aid the governor of Louisiana in equipping and forwarding the troops of that state."

"On the receipt of this information, Gen. Gaines wrote to the governors of Mississippi, Alabama, Tennessee, Kentucky, and Missouri, advising them to anticipate a call from the president of the U. States for volunteers, and to make preparations to raise the troops. It was not, however, in form, a requisition on them to send forward troops before they were called for by the president.

"On the 3d May, General Gaines sent an officer to Mobile to raise volunteers for Taylor's army. On the 4th, one company was raised and embarked for New Orleans. The whole volunteer force to be raised at Mobile, Gen. Gaines limited by order of May 6, no to exceed two regiments of twenty companies.

"About the 4th May, the governor of Missouri, being at New Orleans, tendered to General Gaines a regiment, which offer General Gaines accepted.

"On the 8th May, General Gaines authorized Col. Crane, commanding at Pensacola, whence General Gaines had withdrawn the garrison of regulars to send to Texas, to muster into the service one or more volunteer companies; also, informing Col. Crane that he had requested the governor of Alabama to send there two volunteer companies; making three or more companies called out, or authorized to be called out, for the protection of Pensacola.

"On the 9th May, he authorized A. M. Dunn to raise a company of 100 men to guard the arsenal at Baton Rouge.

"On the 12th May, he authorized A. Rust to raise a regiment of mounted gunmen- from five to ten companies; each company to number from 60 to 100 men; thereby authorizing the levy of 300, or 500, or 600, or 1,000 men.

"May 16th. He authorized I. S. Gilbert to raise a regiment of mounted gunmen- five or ten companies; each company to be 60 to 100 men- amounting to 300,500,600, or 1,000 men.

"May 20. He authorized E. Fetherston, W. M. Fulton, W. S. Hays, J. R. Creecy, and E. L. Tracy, to raise each one regiment of ten companies, each 60 to 100 men. The whole amounting to 1,500, 2,500, 3,000, or 5,000.

"May 22d. He accepted the offer of the governor of Mississippi to furnish 2,000 volunteers- including the regiment to be raised by P.B. Starke.

"May 31st. He issued orders to complete the muster of two regiments of volunteers from Alabama- only three companies having been at this time raised on his previous requisitions.

"In the latter part of May, General Gaines raised and mustered into service Gally's battalion of light artillery- three companies- 286 strong. The precise date of this levy does not appear in any document before the court, and it is not remembered by the witness, examined to this point- Gen. Gaines assistant Adjutant General.

"The court find further, that in consequence of General Gains' communication to the governor of Kentucky, about the 1st or 4th of May, representing the situation of General Taylor's army, the governor raised and sent forward a regiment from Louisville; which on its arrival at New Orleans, about the latter part of the month, General Gaines accepted and mustered into the service of the United States.

"The foregoing statement shows all the troops raised or called for by General Gaines. It appears, however, that the only troops actually raised and brought into service by him on these calls, were the St. Louis Legion, of Missouri, the Louisville Legion, of Kentucky, Peyton's and Featherston's regiments of Louisiana volunteers, and Gally's battalion of light artillery, and three companies of Alabama volunteers, raised at Mobile.

"The court find further, that when General Gaines was relieved from command of the Western Division, and ordered to repair to Washington City, and in execution of said order, had arrived at Mobile on the 12th June, he was then and there informed by the governor of Alabama that much disorder prevailed among the regiments of volunteers assembled at that point by the president of the United States; for which reason the governor applied to General Gaines to receive into the service of the U. States, for the proper government of those volunteers, Brigadier Gen. Smith, whom the governor had commissioned to command them, and his staff. Whereupon Gen. Gaines did receive and muster into service:

Walter Smith, as Brigadier General. Thomas Caey, Assistant Adjutant General.
William P. Brown, Brigade Quartermaster.
Henry K. Zettyplace, Paymaster.
Charles B. Sandford, Aid-de-camp.
Richard Lee Feam, Brigade Surgeon.

"The order of General Gaines published in this case, directed that it should remain in force till final instructions should be received from the proper authorities at Washington; and further directed Gen. Smith to organize the volunteers, and as soon as the said organization should be completed, to proceed with them without delay to the seat of war.

"The appointment by General Gaines of certain volunteers and others to staff offices, as shown in the official documents sent as evidence to the court, not being stated in the order appointing the court, as one of the matters into which it is directed to inquire, it is not considered in this statement of facts, nor in the opinion of the court. The facts and circumstances, however, are set forth in the evidence for the information of the department of war.

"In regard to issues of public stores by order of Gen. Gaines, the court find that he ordered the issue of ordinance and ordnance stores to arm and equip all the volunteers called out by him; also, when necessary, for those called out by Gen. Taylor; also, that he ordered the quartermaster's supplies; also, he ordered the commissaries to furnish subsistence to all volunteers arriving at the general rendezvous for muster, and to issue to them previous to the muster.

"The court also find an issue by order of General Gaines of two pieces of field artillery, and twenty five rounds of ammunition to two private gentlemen and planters in the parish of West Baton Rouge, for the protection of the parish against the slave population, on condition of the return of the guns when called for.

"In regard to orders by General Gaines to staff officers to issue or pay public money, the court find only two such payments indicated in the documentary evidence. 1st. He ordered that quartermaster to pay $2,500 to Major Gally's battalion for commutation in advance of clothing; and 21. He ordered the ordinance officer to pay accounts contracted by Maj. Hally for ammunition for his batteries, amounting to $1467()]. 50. Both of which sums and accounts were paid accordingly. And further, the court find that he ordered the quartermaster's department to pay in advance to all volunteers' commutation of six month's clothing. That any payments were made under this order does not appear by any evidence sent to this court.

"And upon the foregoing findings of the facts in the case, the courts submitted the following

"It is contended by General Gaines that he acted in accordance with his instructions from the war department. The court find that these instructions were as follows:
"1st. August 28th, 1845. The secretary of war wrote to General Gaines: 'It cannot be necessary to apprise you that the authority to make a requisition upon the governors of the respective states for the militia thereof, to be employed in the service of the United States, is vested only in the president, and limited in its exercise to two or three specified cases. The emergency which would tolerate or excuse the assumption of this authority by a military officer in command at a distance from the seat of government, in anticipation of the president's action, must be one indicating great and imminent peril to the country--a peril so great and so imminent as to leave no reasonable doubt that the president, with a full knowledge of all the circumstances of the case, would have felt it his duty to resort to such aid. The assumption of this authority by an officer so situation, should be under circumstances which would be sure to command his subsequent ratification of it."

"2d. On the 13th September, 1845, the secretary of war wrote to General Gaines: 'You misunderstand your position in regard to the commanding general in Texas. His command is wholly independent of you; the orders and instructions for his conduct emanate only from the government here; and you are directed to abstain from all interference with him.'"

"3d. And again, on the 30th September, 1845: 'The power which you have exercised could only be resorted to in cases of extreme public peril. An error of judgment, with such motives as the president has with pleasure conceded to have governed your conduct in this case, cannot be regarded as a crime, or an offence subjecting the officer to trial."

"The court find further instructions to General Gaines from the office of the adjutant general, of date May 18, 1846, from which the following is extracted:

'The volunteer force called into the service from Louisiana and Alabama, &c., and which you have previously reported, meets the approval of the department.'"

"In the opinion of the court this approval ratifies the call and orders of General Gaines to raise two regiments at Mobile, and three of more companies at Pensacola.

"The court also deem it unnecessary to consider the case of the St. Louis Legion received into service by General Gaines; as he was informed from the adjutant general's office, May 22d, that 'the said regiment had been accepted, and would be regarded as a portion of the force called out by the president.'"

"In regard to the Louisville Legion, it appears from the statement of General Gaines, and testimony of Lieut Calhoun, to have been raised without a direct call from General Gaines; though accepted by him into service before he had received special authority from the war department. It was, however, subsequently accepted by the department--by instructions to General Gaines of May 28th--in which instructions, however, written on the supposition that he called on the governor for the troops, he is informed of the disapproval of the department, and then the call was without authority of law.

"The court cannot find that General Gaines, at the time he received this legion into service, (about the last of May) had authority to do so under his instructions. But as the regiment was already sent forward he felt himself, on its arrival at New Orleans, under the necessity to receive it, and to trust to the subsequent ratification of the department.

"In regard to the other calls made by General Gaines, before the 17th May to raise troops for Taylor's army, the court are of opinion, that, under the previous instructions of the war department, and in the situation of Taylor's army, and upon ascertaining the slow progress of the enrolment of the Louisiana volunteers, and upon ascertaining further that General Taylor could not receive more than a small portion of the force which he had called from Texas--that under these circumstances General Gaines was justified in endeavoring to supply Gen. Taylor to the amount of auxiliary force could not be obtained from the states to which General Taylor had applied, then General Gaines was justified in applying to the other states. The court do not extend this approval to the requisitions for mounted gun- men. The four regiments of this description of force, amounting to 4,000 men, which he authorized to be raised before the 17th May, destined to march overland to the army, however useful Gen. Gaines may have considered them for the future operation of the way, not being required or intended for the immediate emergency, were not authorized by his instructions or by law.

"It is proper in this connection to bring to the favorable native of the war department the prompt recall, by Gen Gaines, of all his requisitions for mounted gun-men on receiving orders to that effect; and that the government incurred no expense on account of these calls.

"For the calls made by General Gaines for volunteers, after the 16th May when he knew of the victories of Taylor, the court cannot find any necessity at the time, any authority in his instructions, or any warrant of law. These calls authorized the levy of 7,000 men, besides Gally's battalion of artillery. It does not appear, however, that any, except the artillery, were raised before the calls were countermanded.

"Two of the requisitions made by Gen. Gaines for volunteers appear to the court to be of a special character, viz: to raise a garrison of volunteers for Forts Jackson and St. Philip, and for the arsenal at Baton Rouge. As the government had withdrawn the garrison from the arsenal, and had not seen fit to garrison the forts, the court are of opinion, that General Gaines ought to have felt himself specially restrained from raising volunteer garrisons without authority.

"In regard to the authorities given by General Gaines to certain individuals to raise troops, it appears to have been his motive to avail himself, under what he felt as the pressure of the emergency, of the supposed influence of these individuals. In Louisiana, where troops were actually raised under such powers, it was with the sanction and concurrence of the governor of the state, who commissioned the officers and organized the troops according to the state laws. It does not appear in any case to have been the intention of General Gaines to act independently of the state authorities.

"In General Gaines' proceedings at Mobile, on 12th May, [June,] in mustering into service General Smith, and his staff, after he was relieved from his command, and instructed by the war department, to 'cease his independent action in these matters, and to confine himself to carrying out the orders and views of the president, so far as they might be communicated to him from that department--the court are of opinion that he transcended his authority, and violated his orders, particularly in appointing such a staff officer as an inspector general, after the recent and emphatic instruction to him by the secretary of war, that 'such appointments would not be recognized or confirmed, and that the president himself had no authority under existing laws to make such appointments."

"yet the court are satisfied that Gen. Gaines had not the intention to act in defiance or in disregard of his instructions. He though that the disorganized state of the volunteers assembled at Mobile made it a matter of very urgent importance that a commander should be appointed over them. He acted, too, at the special application of the governor of the state; and the court, therefore, recommend his conduct to the favorable construction of the president.

"the issue of rations to volunteers before muster is not provided in the regulations of laws. But the court present to the consideration of the department, the necessity of the case, when the volunteers had arrived at the rendezvous, and were absolutely without means of subsistence.

"Such issues, as of the two pieces of field artillery and ammunition to planters of Baton Rouge parish are not provided for by the regulations of the army. But under the circumstances, being required for the security of the parish, and issued to responsible persons, on condition of their safe return whenever demanded, the court are of opinion that is ought to be approved.

"In the absence of certain official information on the subject, the court suppose it to be the practice of the government to make advances to the militia called into service, in commutation of clothing; and that the orders of General Gaines on this subject did not introduce a new practice. Of the correctness of the particular account of $2,500, which General Gaines ordered to be paid to Gally's battalion, the court have not the means of judging, and therefore leave it as an account to be settled, according to law and regulations in the auditing offices of the treasury.

"The court cannot approve General Gaines' order to Captain Whitley to pay Major Gally's bill of $1,467 50, for ammunition, as it does not appear that whatever ammunition was required might not have been furnished from Baton Rouge arsenal, or otherwise procured by the ordnance officer.

"The court have not considered, as connected with the issues of stores and payments of funds before mentioned, whether the persons or troops to whom, or on account of whom, the issues and payments were made, were legally in the service of the United States, inasmuch as the act of congress of the last session has since provided for the settlement of such accounts. Of the lawful authority of General Gaines to raise the troops, the have expressed their opinion in the several cases.

"Having now reported their finding and opinion, the court recommend to the favorable consideration of the president the good and patriotic motives, and the public seal, by which, as the court believe, Gen. Gaines was actuated in all these transactions, and therefore they recommend that no further proceedings be had in this case."

II. The proceedings of the court of inquiry in the foregoing case having been duly submitted, the following are the orders thereon--

War department, August 18, 1846

The proceedings of the court of inquiry in the foregoing case have been laid before the president, and carefully examined.

It is seen that the court have found that several of the acts of Brevet Major General Gaines "were not authorized by his instructions or by law; and that he has violated orders,"

That for the calls made by him "for volunteers after the 16th of May, when he knew of the victories of [General] Taylor, the court cannot find any necessity at the time-- and authority in his instructions, or any warrant of law."

That in mustering into service at Mobile certain general and staff officers, after he was relieved from his command by instructions from the war department, "the court are of opinion that he transcended his authority, and violated his orders."

The president views with deep regret the exercise of this assumed authority on the part of the late commander of the western division; and while he is disposed to give every consideration to the circumstances which may tend to qualify or mitigate his conduct he can see nothing in them which would justify him for withholding the expression of his decided disapprobation of the irregular and unauthorized proceedings of that officer. But in consideration of the recommendation of the court and concurring with them in their opinion of the "good and patriotic motives and the public zeal by which he was actuated," the president directs that further proceedings in the case of Brevet Major General Gaines be dispensed with.

The president cannot dismiss the case without inviting the serious attention of the army to the grave subject which has been presented for his consideration and decision. The officers belonging to the military service zeal, gallantry, and skill have long been established. The country duly appreciates their value, but unremitting care should be taken to abstain from any act which may tend to impair their high character. And what so likely to derogate from this as the assumption of important executive or ministerial authority by a military commander, or the disregard of his orders?

The exercise of authority not possessed nor delegated--the non observance of instructions, or the expenditure of the public treasure, not warranted by law nor justified by imperious necessity, cannot be disregarded. A just responsibility of all in authority makes it a public duty of imperative obligation to observe and strictly enforce the law and the rules of the service.

By order of the President,

W.L. Marcy
Secretary of War.

III. The court of inquiry, of which Brevet Brigadier General H. Brady is president, is hereby dissolved.

By order,

R. Jones, Adjutant General.

The Santa Fe Expedition. -- An express from Gen. Kearney reached Fort Leavenworth on the 14th instant. The general with several companies United States dragoons, the 1st regiment Missouri volunteers under Col. Domphan, and Major Clarke's battalion of volunteer artillery left Bents' Fort for Santa Fe, on the 1st of August, all in fine health and spirits. They had information that so far from a resistance, the Mexicans were anxious for the arrival of the Americans. The ladies of Santa Fe were making extensive preparations for a fandango dance and other sports to welcome their reception, and some of them expressed a desire to accompany the expedition to California. Captain Moore, United States dragoons, had captured three spies, sent by the Mexicans to look out. They were taken to camp, and there told to examine every thing and make what enquiries they please, and were then dismissed. Gen. Kearney would remain at Santa Fe till Colonel Price's regiment arrived, and then proceed to California.

Col. Allen with 500 Mexican infantry was progressing rapidly and would probably reach Bents' Fort before Col. Price's mounted men. A great member of traders and a large quantity of goods were met on their way out.

NNR 70.416 Aug 29, 1846 unsuccessful attack on Alvarado

A demonstration, by order of Com. Conner, was made against Alvarado, on the 8th inst., in which the Mississippi participated. The difficulty of passing the bar and the appearances of an approaching storm, induced a signal to haul off, after some shots had been exchanged, without injury on our side.

NNR 70.416 Aug 29, 1846 chartering of ships for the California expedition, charges of malfeasance by Thomas Jefferson Sutherland against Col. John D. Stevenson in connection with outfitting the California expedition

The California Expedition. -- We learn that Col. Stanton has chartered the ships Susan Drew, T.H. Perkins, and Loo Choo, to convey the California expedition to their place of destination. These vessels are all of the best class of ships and of about 700 tons custom house measure--well ventilated and admiraly calculated for transports.

We are please to learn, that while millions of dollars have been squandered in extravagant charter parties at the south, these vessels have all been taken up at what would be considered reasonable terms if engaged by individuals. The gross amount paid to the three ships is only $65,000. Those who are acquainted with Col. Stanton will not be surprised at this, while the public will of course be prepared to learn that certain friends of the administration were anxious to do the work for double the sum!

For ourselves we have never believed that this expedition would sail under the command of J.D. Stevenson; and warrant for such an opinion, may be found in the well known Glentworth affair. A man who has ever found it necessary to be an alias, should never be entrusted with a military command or made the associate and companion of gentlemen. How Governor Marcy can justify it to his conscience and the country for having recommended Stevenson for this highly important command, we can not conjecture.

We have now lying on our table a paper, signed Thos. Jefferson Sutherland making many grave charges against Stevenson which he pledges to prove before a court of enquiry if an opportunity be afforded him. Of course we know nothing of their truth; but whether true or false, the government will not be held excused by the people, if the expedition be permitted to sail under the command of Stevenson without an investigation into these charges.

We copy the following iron this paper, which has been handed us by Sutherland who is himself a captain of volunteers.

4th. That he has purposed a fraud upon the members of his regiment by procuring a large quantity of clothing, not American in its fashion nor suited to the climate of California, which he designs to compel his men to purchase from him at prices far above the real value; his son-in-law being the pretended contractor.

5th. That he reported company rolls to the governor of this state as complete according to the requisitions of the war department, when in fact the companies did not contain the men professed to have been enrolled, and thus procured commissions for favorites to the exclusion of competent men and good officers who had reported perfect rolls of companies, whose ranks were filled with respectable men.

6th. That he has used his influence to exclude from the corps of officers of his regiment all men of capacity and experience, and those who would be most likely to be directed by a nice regard for the interest and honor of their country, and to constitute it a body of weak, or very young and unexperienced men, who must needs be his suppliant underlyings.

7th. That he has publicly declared that if he was sent out by the government in a convoy, he would run away from the naval commander; and that after he had landed in California he would no longer obey the President of the United States nor any other authority of the government.

8th. That he has practiced duplicity on the President, the Governor, and other persons in office in this state, unbecoming an officer and a soldier.

These are grave charges which concur not me alone, but the whole country, and they are now declared with the fullest sense and understanding that I endorse their truth with the commission which I myself hold, and a time and imprisonment on an indictment for libel, if the charges should prove to be such- and with this I am content.

NNR 70.416 Aug 29, 1846 Gen. Zachary Taylor leaves Matamoros for Camargo

Gen. Taylor left Matamoros on the 5th August, in the steamer Whiteville, for Camargo, accompanied by about one half the Texan regiment of infantry and a few regulars.

NNR 70.416 Aug 29, 1846 order barring spirituous liquors from Matamoros

"General Order, No. 94. No spirituous liquors will be permitted to enter the river or the city of Matamoros for the purposes of barter or traffic on the account of any person whatever, whether sutler in the army or private dealers. Any liquors found in violation of this order will be confiscated and sent to the quartermaster in N. Orleans to be sold—half of the proceeds for the benefit of the informant, the other half to be applied to the support of the hospital department.

The commanding general issues this order under the sanction of the general government, and calls upon all officers to give their aid in executing its provisions. The quartermaster's department and Col. Clark will take the necessary measures to have it communicated to the persons interested, particularly to the dealers in Matamoros, and the masters of all public transports or other vessels in the river. Any steamboat captains or other hired persons that are found violating it, will be at once dismissed from the service."

We judge from the numerous articles in the Matamoros papers, that the above order has occasioned no little excitement. How far it is possible to evade its provisions, is the question. "Spirituous liquors?" says the sutler, and the government wines and malt liquors they insist are included in the prohibition.

NNR 70.416 Aug 29, 1846 probability of reaching Monterey in September

By the close of September this column will reach Monterey, where the chances of a battle are sufficiently uncertain to make it a matter of daily doubt and speculation. The very air is rife with rumors. It is said that Wool is now in command; if so, and he continues there, it is a guarantee of hard knocks. [RCG]

NNR 70.416 Aug 29, 1846 health of the army

The health of the regular army is represented to be good. The volunteers are suffering considerably, mainly from indiscretions, to which want of strict discipline renders them liable. [RCG]

NNR 70.416 Aug 29, 1846 Col. Archibald Yell's letter about the lack of equipment for Arkansas volunteers

LETTER FROM COL. YELL, OF THE ARKANSAS VOLUNTEERS.

MY DEAR SIR: I have only a moment to write to you. We reached this place on yesterday at 11 o'clock A.M. and by 10 P.M. we crossed the river, and will take up the line of march for San Antonio. I regret that we have been disappointed in receiving our public arms and camp equipage. There has been inexcusable negligence somewhere, and I shall make the report to the proper department; and if that negligence should be continued, and we reach San Antonio without finding our arms, I shall make a final and direct report of the case to the secretary of war, and in he does not correct such inattention he will deserve to be removed from his present position. I hope, however, all will yet be satisfactorily explained, and that we shall be furnished on our arrival at our point of destination.

I am pleased to say that our troops are remarkably healthy yet, and in good spirits. They will, when an opportunity offers, give a good account of themselves.--

In haste, yours, A. YELL

Santa Fe, Sept. 13, 1846

Messrs. Editors: On the 2d instant, General Kearney, with about eight hundred men, left this town on an excursion south. We went to a village called Tonie, about one hundred miles distant. We struck the Rio Grande twenty seven miles from this place, at a village called San Domingo, inhabited by the Puebla Indians. Our reception at this village was quite a grand affair; the principal men and braves met us six miles from the town, and escorted us in; the braves were mounted on their best horses, and dressed in the most gaudy apparel, and armed and equipped in the same manner as when they go out for the purpose of fighting. When the general passed the head of their columns, they fired off their guns, and then one file on each side of our companies proceeded to the rear, and then wheeled and came down to close our line at the top of the speed of their horses, yelling and going through all the maneuvers of a regular charge; they met again at the head of our columns, fired at each other with their pistols, made passes with their lances, and then filed off, and returned to the head of our companies. This was repeated several times, to the great admiration and astonishment to all who witnessed it. I have never seen better horsemen anywhere, and from what I could discover, I should take them to be formidable in battle, if properly armed. They are fine looking men, and much superior in every respect to the Mexican population. They have a very fine village, most splendid vineyards, and appear to be much more comfortable, in every respect than the Mexicans. When we got into the village, we were invited to the priest’s house, where a most sumptuous repast was set out consisting of the best grapes I ever saw, melons, apples, cakes, and with liquor sufficient to wash them down.

There is at this town quite an extensive church, to which is attached the priest’s house, where he keeps his wives, or concubines. The priest at this place has four-two of them are quite good looking. After our repast, the general made a speech to the citizens, who appeared quite well pleased. They then escorted us out of town, and we went on our way rejoicing, with full stomachs, and every man with just liquor enough in him to make him feel patriotic. This was the only Indian village we visited.

After we left San Domingo, we passed through villages every eight or ten miles, until we reached the village of Tonie. Most of them, however, were quite small and the inhabitants, with exception of two or three men in each, are a poor miserable set.

The only villages on the Rio Grande, that we visited worthy of note, are San Domingo, San Phillippe, Albuquerque, and Tonie. Albuquerque was the residence of Armijo. We halted a short time at the place, going and returning. Gen, Kearney called on the late governor’s wife, and passed an hour or two, as he told me, very pleasantly. She is said to be an intelligent woman, and deported herself with much propriety. Her husband, (Armijo,) it is said, has gone to the Passo, and it is supposed will continue on to the city of Mexico. The people near the town of Tonie, and the inhabitants of the different villages, have heard of our intended visit, and the general so arranged our marches as to bring us to this town the evening before the anniversary of our patron Saint – a great day with the inhabitants of that region of the country; and I assure you it was a great day not only with them, but to all who were present. There was an immense concourse of people, men, women, and children, Mexicans, Indians, and White folks. They had prepared fire-works, which were gotten up in a very good style, the town was illuminated, they had a theatre- that is, a play in the open yard, which appeared to be well received by the inhabitants. They also had a fandango, which was not only crowded, nut jammed and crowded to overflowing. The beauty and fashion were there, and, to my astonishment, I found some of the women quite handsome. During the day there was mass said, and the Virgin Mary was paraded down the streets followed by the principal men of the town, and also Gen. Kearney and his staff, with lighted candles in their hands.

The priest at Tonie joined in the waltz, and appeared as jovial and as much disposed to participate in all the amusements as anyone else. The country south of this place, (Santa Fe,) along the Rio Grande, is much better than any portion of the province I have yet visited; yet in my judgment, no Missourian would ever think of locating anywhere here for the purpose of cultivating the soil. The province has been overrated, and our government has been grossly imposed upon and deceived, as to its resources, commerce, &c. I have not seen anything since my arrival here that would excite the least desire for me to reside here. To sum up the whole in a few words, the Mexicans are physically, mentally, and morally, an inferior and “low flung” race.

Yesterday an order was read, assigning the five companies of dragoons for the California expedition; there has not as yet been any place designated for my winter quarters; it is however believed that my company will be attached to Maj. Clark’s battalion, and stationed at this place. I hope such may be the case, unless I can induce the general to let me go south, to the Passo del Norte. I saw the general last night, and requested that he would not assign me to Doniphan’s command—he said he would not.

I have found the officers of the army very agreeable companions, and thus far, all has gone on very well.—Our mail will not leave before next Thursday. Should anything occur before the departure of the mail, I will write you again.

September 15, 1846.—Since writing the foregoing, an order was made, assigning my company to do duty with Maj. Clark’s battalion, and stationing us at this place for the winter. The five companies of dragoons, will, it is said, march on the 25th instant for California. We have had no news in relation to Price’s regiment, nor of Captain Allen’s command of Mormons. We do not know how to account for the non-arrival of Price, nor the delay of Allen.[MJK]

NNR 71.145 November 7, 1846 the "Union" discredits the report that additional volunteers will be called for, remarks thereon

The Washington Union contradicts the report that additional volunteers have been called for. That paper of the 4th inst. says: "The moment 'new troops' are wanting, in addition to the regulars and the volunteers now in service, we presume they will be called for. When, it does not become us to say; still less to what point any of our troops may be sent—whether to Saltlillo, (to which the Inquirer undertakes to say Gen. Taylor has been ordered to advance,' without any discretion,) or to Tampico, or to Vera Cruz, and the castle of San Juan de Ulloa, as other essayists have urged, or to any other point of the compass. We avoid touching upon these points. It is not within our province. The impartial press will excuse us for saying that, even if any friend of the administration were to be acquainted with the plan of the campaign, or even to suspect it, it would scarcely be his duty to go to the house tops and proclaim it in the ears of our enemies." The Baltimore American, of yesterday, quoting the above, replies: “Not withstanding the strict reserve which the Union here professes, it did intimate some time ago, with distinctness enough that an expedition was contemplated against Tampico, and that the men to compose it were to be taken, a portion at least, from the Rio Grande.

With such a disclosure as this, and with the further knowledge that Gen. Taylor had peremptory order to terminate the armistice, with a view, as we are told, of a vigorous prosecution of the war, the public anxiety becomes naturally excited at the apprehension that Taylor’s support is to be withdrawn from his base line of operations at the very moment that he is directed to advance into the enemies country. It is not from a disposition to indulge in idle speculation that the newspapers in various parts of the country dwell upon this subject. Great fears are felt that the gallant army in Mexico, which has covered itself with glory, may, by some blunder of the administration, be left in jeopardy. We say that such fears are felt—and sensitively too. The country looks with anxiety towards Gen. Taylor, watching every step; and while it has great confidence in him and his brave soldiers it has not a great deal of confidence in the competency of the administration. This, we believe, is the chief secret of the extreme solicitude which possesses the public mind in reference to affairs in Mexico, and concerning the manifestations of which in the public prints the official paper gives indirect lectured on propriety. “A report has become very general, and was certainly authorized by the highest authority that the President had determined to call for additional volunteers. At the same time a report prevailed that a formidable diversion was to be made either upon Tampico or Vera Cruz. It is probable that the two reports were dependent upon each other. If an invasion of Mexico, at one of these ports was to be attempted, the call would be made, and not otherwise.

We refer to details from the several divisions of the army, for the latest intelligence from each.

The official reports and particulars of the late engagements, and list of the killed and wounded, have not reached Washington. [MJK]
Two companies of the U. S. army embarked from Charleston, S. C., on the 27th ult. in the ship South Carolina, for Pont Isabel. The following are the names of the officers--

Recruits. - The officers of the army were detached by Gen’l Taylor after the battles of the 8th and 9th May for recruits are now returning with the recruits they have obtained to join the army. A detachment of fifty German recruits, under the command of Lieut. H. Browne, embarked from N. York on the 29th ultimo in the brig Ellen and Clara, for Fort Brooke, Tampa bay, Florida. [SCM]

The company of ninety-five Sappers and Miners reached N. Orleans on the 24th ultimo in the ship Clinton, from New York. The ship John Holland, arrived at Brazos on the 17th with troops. The steamer Florida, with a number of the wounded soldiers from Monterey, had been aground on the bar off Brazos, but got off, and proceeded for New Orleans. Capt. Ruggles, in command of a detachment of the 5th infantry, about 175 men, accompanied by Lieuts. Tyler and Gibson, the latter in command of a detachment of artillery recruits, embarked from New York on the 30th ult., in the ship Corsair for Brazos Santiago. Capt. Ruggles was in the battles of Palo Alto and Reseca do le Palma. Wm. W. Tompkins, esq., formerly captain of the 2d dragoons, U. S. army, and who served in the Florida war until the close of the year 1838, is making vigorous efforts to organize in New York a corps of volunteers for the Mexican war [SCM]

Col. STEPHENSON.—Commander of the California expedition.— In the suit of Ellingwood vs. Jonathan D. Stephenson, colonel, &c. United States army, his honor said the motion to set aside the writ of ne exeat must be denied, and the motion to open the default, and the motion for an attachment against the colonel must be granted. [N.Y. Gaz & Times. [MJK]

At a public meeting held in Boston on Thursday evening, Charles Sumner, Esq., was nominated as an independent candidate for congress, in opposition to the regularly nominated whig candidate, Mr. Winthrop. Hon. C.F. Adams (son of the ex-president) presided, and such men as Dr. S. G. Howe, Dr. Channing, Dr. Bowditch, &c., who are opposed to the Mexican war, were concerned in the measure. They oppose Mr. Winthrop because he voted for supplies. Whig journals say the true whigs of Boston will be inspired by the result of this meeting to make extra exertions in favor of their candidate.—Four parties are in the field arrayed against them. [MJK]

The Commanding General has the satisfaction to congratulate the Army under his command upon another signal triumph over the Mexican forces.—Superior to us in numbers, strongly fortified, and with an immense preponderance or artillery, they have yet been driven from point to point until forced to sue for terms of capitulation. Such terms have been granted as were considered due to the gallant defense of the town and to the liberal policy of our own government.

The General begs to return his thanks to his commanders and to all his officers and men, both the regulars and the volunteer forces, for the skill, the courage and the perseverance with which they have overcome manifold difficulties, and finally achieved a victory shedding luster upon the American arms.

A great result has been obtained, but not without the loss of many gallant and accomplished officers and brave men. The Army and the country will deeply sympathise with the families and friends of those who have thus sealed their devotion with their lives.

By order of Maj. Gen. TAYLOR:

(Signed)

W.W.S. Bliss

71.152 November 7, 1846 letter about the cause for losses at Monterey, skepticism about the results of the armistice, notice of arrival of dispatches from Washington.

Another correspondent over the signature of L. writing from Matamoras, under the date of October 5t, says:— It is generally believed that our great loss was occasioned by a “fool hardy valor” pushing men up in the face of danger, when the exercise of a little military skill would have enabled our troops to have taken the enemy at great advantage. Our troops are as brave as any in the world, and our regulars act upon the principle—“No nice distinction a true soldier knows, But bid him go to h—I, to h—I he goes.” And under this military axiom would push through death and surrounding dangers-whenever ordered.—But it was wise to place our brave men to be sacrificed to the want of skill on the part of chefs de batallion or of division either? Certainly not; and the taking of Monterey and its consequences, have demonstrated if any demonstration were needed, that cool courage, skill, and tact do more, with less loss, than impetuous valor without arrangement-whose line of march is marked but by his own dead-however great was the goal at the final end of the bloody trail.

In relation to the armistice, and prospects of permanent peace, I place no confidence in the benefits to flow from the former, knowing, as I do, that before the fall of Monterey, the Mexican government had, with commendable foresight, called for a draft of 30,000 men, who will, I’m of opinion, be assembled at Saltillo, and fortify the mountain passes before the expiration of the stipulated two months; and as to peace, I conceive the time of its consummation with Mexico far distant. Heaven grant I may be mistaken. But it behooves our government to reinforce Gen. Taylor by at least fifteen or twenty thousand men; and if it consult the best interests of the nation, it will dispatch Gen. Scott immediately to the seat of war. His skill and judgment would give regularity and order, and insure a peace in the shortest possible time.

October 6th.—Last night a special messenger arrived from Washington, bearer of dispatches to General Taylor- we are ignorant of their import. If in consideration of overtures for peace from Mexico, distrust them, as Paredes is again getting up, and may be, before long, once more in the ascendancy; and as to Santa Anna, who but an idiot would trust him, even under the most solemn obligation. I tell you, that unless we send reinforcements here, the termination of the armistice will find General Taylor hemmed in Monterey-mark that! San Luis Potosi has pronounced against Santa Anna, and in favor of Paredes-this after the taking of Monterey. [MJK]

ARMY OF THE CENTRE

GEN. WOOL.

Letter from a correspondent of the Boston Courier, dated:

Army of Chihuahua,
San Antonio de Bexar, Oct. 2, 1846.

I avail myself of a short respite from my arduous duties to give you some little information in regard to the movement and operations of this division of the invading army. I arrived here on the 20th Sept. from La Baca, after a somewhat fatiguing journey. On the 26th ultimo the advance of this army left for Presidio Rio Grande, consisting of the following troops, viz: company B, 4th light artillery, under captain Washington; two company 2d dragoons, under brevet major Beall; three companies 6th infantry, and one company Kentucky volunteers, under major Bonneville, United States army; six companies Arkansas cavalry, under colonel Yell; four companies of Illinois volunteers, under captains Webb and Morgan; corps of pioneers, artificers, &c. under command of captain Lee, of the engineers U. States army; a train of one hundred and eighty wagons, loaded with subsistence, ammunition and quartermasters stores, boats and lumber, for making a flying bridge across the Rio Grande—the train under charge of captain O. Cross, assistant quartermaster United States army. The entire force under command of Col. Wm S. Harney, 2d dragoons, amounting to fourteen hundred effective men.

On the morning of the 29th ultimo, gen. Wool, with a portion of his staff, and escorted by two companies of the first dragoons, left here to overtake the advance.

Col. Churchill, inspector general is left in command of the rear division, to follow with the remainder of the forces as soon as sufficient number of wagons (now en route for this pace) shall arrive from La Baca. Major Thomas, chief of the quartermaster’s department, also remains for the purpose of hastening the forwarding of supplies, &c. and will be here in about five days, with col. Churchill and the remainder of the forces, to join gen. Wool at the Presidio, under command of col. J. J. Hardin, with a train of twenty four wagons and two pieces of cannon.

The wagons with supplies and stores, are rapidly arriving; one train of fifteen wagons came in on the 30th ultimo, and one to-day of the twenty one wagons.

It is almost impossible to imagine the difficulties encountered by the quartermasters department towards fitting out and preparing the “trains” for transporting supplies. In the first place the mules have to be broken to work in harness. There is a scarcity of teamsters, and inefficient wagon-masters are sent from New Orleans, where they are picked up and sent out upon their representing that they are first rate teamsters--the greater part of whom scarcely know how to harness a mule, not to speak of their driving a five mule team.

Too much praise cannot be awarded to Major. Thomas for his untiring exertions and unceasing vigilance in organizing the department, and protecting the interests of the service from the depredations of those who are constantly devising means to cheat the government. It was really amusing to see coming into La Baca with old wagons and broken down oxen to sell to the government, for which the most exorbitant prices were asked. Six hundred dollars has been asked for a wagon and five yolk of oxen, for which three hundred dollars might be a great price. Individuals must have an idea that the government must purchase from them at any price, and that government officers are bound to believe what they say, without examination. However, they found major Thomas an officer possessing too much practical knowledge to be taken in by them. Consequently he is abused in the newspapers in the most outrageous manner, and why? For the simple reason that they cannot deceive him and rob the government.  [MJK]

NRR 71.152-71.153 November 7, 1846 Gen. John Ellis Wool’s division advancing on Monclova, for Chihuahua, letters giving details, list of officers

The New Orleans Delta, of the 27th has the following:

THE ARMY OF CHIHUAHUA.

From major M. C. M. Hammond, U.S. army, who arrived a day or two since Port Lavaca and San Antonio, Texas, we obtain the following information:

One half of gen. Wool’s army left San Antonio for the Presidio on the Rio Grande on the 26th of September. The general went in person on the 29th. The remainder, consisting of sixteen companies of Illinois infantry and four companies of Arkansas cavalry, were under command col. Churchill, inspector general United States army. Between the 5th and 8th of October eight of these companies marched, commanded by Col. Hardin; and colonel Churchill was to have conducted the remainder on the 14th, leaving one or two companies in garrison at Bexar, to protect supplies and furnish escorts.

Gen. W. expected to reach Presidio in twelve days. He established a depot at that point, until it was ascertained whether steamers can ascend the Rio Grande to a position more suitable to his operations. His army will cross the river on a flying bridge, boats for which were constructed at San Antonio, under the direction of capt. Fraser, engineer, and were transported in wagons.

As soon as supplies are received to enable him to advance, gen. Wool will press on to Chihuahua, taking Santa Rosa and Monclova in his route. The former town is garrisoned with regular troops and said to be capable of strong resistance. This line of operations is longer than might be selected, but it has the advantage of turning the mountain passes—of abundance of water and some provisions—and runs within seventy or eighty miles of gen. Taylor’s when co-operation can be readily effected if necessary.

If it is found impossible to transport supplies by water to the Presidio or other point on the Rio Grande whence to furnish the army, it will be necessary to haul all their provisions from Port Lavaca by way of San Antonio, a distance to Chihuahua of nearly 800 miles, and through a country in a rainy seasons almost impassable for heavy wagons.
It will be seen that this enterprise is gigantic and its accomplishment will be an achievement more arduous and more creditable than a brilliant victory. The health of the troops had very much improved. The sick were left at Bexar under the care of Dr. Glen, U. States army.

The command consists of the following officers and troops:

STAFF

Captains Lee and Frazer, corps engineers.

Captain Hughes and Lieut. Sitgreaves and Franklin, topographical engineers.

Lieut. Kingsbury, ordinance corps.

Major Thomas, quartermaster; Captains Cross, Will, Chapman, and Chilton, assist quartermasters.

Dr. Hitchcock, medical director; Drs. Simpson, Levely, and several volunteer surgeons

1 company light artillery; 2 do. 1st dragoons; 2 do 2d dragoons; 1 regiment Arkansas Cavalry; 3 companies 6th regular infantry, 1 do. Kentucky infantry; 2 regiments Illinois infantry.

The Kentucky regiment of cavalry left Lavacca on the 13th inst. for Matamoras. About 40 of them had died, fifty to seventy had been discharged, and one hundred sick had been sent to Matamoras by water. At one time it was said that 300 men were on sick report. The Tennessee cavalry followed the Kentucky regiment on the 16th. [MJK]

NRR 71.153-11/7/1846 The Louisville Legion

An officer of the legion writes to the editor of the Louisville Courier:

-“The situation of the Louisville Legion was a very silent, but at the same time a very chafing one. We were obliged to stand the fire from a well directed battery of twelve pounders from the Castle, which were directed at the howitzer and mortar, before mentioned as being immediately in front. Their pieces were very troublesome. Their cavalry formed in front of the Castle frequently, for the purpose, it is supposed, of making an attack upon us, but a bomb thrown in their midst soon dispersed them. The Legion was formed in squares every hour or so for the purposes of receiving their expected attack on our battery. This is the reason why we were not actively engaged. Gen. Butler ordered us into the city at one time, but Major Munroe, who had charge of the pieces, remonstrated in the strongest terms, and said that the mortar battery would be taken by the Mexicans in half an hour after we left, and that the pieces we were protecting were then doing more damage to the enemy than we could possibly do in the city. Upon this, General Butler then countermanded the order.” [SCM]

NRR 71.153 November 7, 1846, Gen. William Orlando Butler’s letter detailing affair at Monterey

GENERAL BUTLER.

—The following letter from General Butler to a near relative near Louisville is from a Louisville newspaper:

Monterey, Sept. 25, 1846.

Monterey is ours, but not without a heavy loss, and my division has probably sustained more that one half of it. I am myself wounded, but not badly. I was struck by a musket all below the knee; it entered in front, grazed the bones without injuring them, ranged round through the flesh, and came out on the opposite side.

I became faint from loss of blood, and was compelled to leave the field after having been in it under a heavy fire of grape and musketry for three hours.—I have been required by my surgeon to keep perfectly still, ever since the battle.

I was in the act of leading the Ohio Regiment to storm two of the most formidable batteries un the town, flanked by a stone wall, ten feet high, with a deep ditch in front and covered by a strong musketry force in the rear, under complete shelter. There were two other batteries of grape shot discharged, that swept the ground continually.

Col. Mitchell, who commanded the regiment of Ohio volunteers, was wounded about the same time that I was, and we then prudently abandoned the enterprise, as we became convinced that our loss would have probably been at least one hundred more men, had we persevered.

I hope you will not think I acted rashly. I know that I am often rash where I involve myself alone, not so, however, when the fates of other are at stake.
THE KENTUCKY MOUNTED VOLUNTEERS.

Perhaps a more splendid or spirited regiment of men, officers, and horses never paraded in any country, then composed the Kentucky volunteers that repaired so promptly to the frontier — and were ordered to join the division of the army under general Wool. They had no sooner reached his headquarters, then they were ordered thence to Port Lavaca en route to Camargo, to join general Taylor. The following letter from an officer of the regiment is from the Observer and Reporter.

Camp near Port Lavaca, Texas Sept. 23, 1846.

Dear sir— the departure of the steam ship Galveston affords another opportunity to write to you, and more and more at large than I was able to do the other day. We are somewhat rested from the fatigue of our long and hard march. The equinoctial gales are in full blast, and the fresh breeze from the sea brings healing on its wings to the sick I our hospitals. I told you in my last, that Col. Marshall chafed much under the order of brig. gen. Wool directing him to repair with his regiment to this place. His reasons seemed sound at the time, and subsequent events verify their correctness. He said that a halt and quiet at a moment just preceding a change in seasons, when the sickness carried in the atmosphere would develop disease lurking in or passing through the system, because the indolence of a stationary camp would aid, where as continual action would enable the system to resist or ward off the attack of disease. He was anxious to press forward to Camargo without halting and to rest on the Rio Grande after the season changed, which they do generally after the equinoctial storms. Disease has increased in our camp alarmingly since our arrival here. Yesterday the surgeon reported 160 new cases in the hospital. Many of our boys look chap fallen at this sudden reverse of our condition, but the commander and the surgeon seem to recognize the change as one they had expected, and to fear no great degree of fear as a result. I have no doubt the letters from the regiment will be gloomy enough by this mail, but the writers don’t understand the diagnosis of our malady. We are sick of an order from a general who don’t know what he is about, and which brings death in its train that could have easily been avoided. Col. M. sent an express to gen. Taylor the other day, immediately arriving here, remonstrating against the order delaying him here, and predicting just what has occurred. He also spoke freely to officers on their way to gen. Wool’s camp, and wrote gen. Wool himself. General Wool sent down an order day before yesterday to Col. M. authorizing him to move forward to Camargo whenever he chose to do so. The troops expected that col. Marshall would be off directly, and he did make one “revolution,” as they say, but his train wanted repairs and on applications from the shops at Lavaca, he found them employed from gen. Wool’s train, and that the same mail which authorized him to proceed, imperatively directed the quartermaster to confide the shops exclusively to work on wagons destined for San Antonio de Bexar, which cut off all chance of a speedy departure, unless we go without a train. The col. did talk a little of cold meat, but he abandoned that notion, and now I suppose we may be considered as firmly aground. Indeed, the news by the Galveston that Mexico had rejected the overtures of our government for peace, on the ground that the Mexican congress alone had power over that notion, and now I suppose we may be considered as firmly aground. Indeed, the news by the Galveston that Mexico had rejected the overtures of our government for peace, on the ground that the Mexican congress alone had power over that object opens a new chance for a contest and seems to have produced a desire on the part of col. Marshall to recruit his men more effectively than he seemed disposed for when he thought there was a slim chance of getting there on time. I hope by the next letter I write to give you accounts of improving health in the regiment. You ought to see the boys. Their condition is a reproach to the government. They are barefooted, and some of them literally without breeches, many without hats and coats, but they stand up as proud as if they were dressed I imperial purple. The government is indebted to this regiment this day $75,000- it has received no pay whatever, and though paymasters pass and repass, it hath seen no signs of payment.—
Young men of education and intelligence, used to the luxuries of life, are by this neglect absolutely turned naked in a wild country, and exposed to the climate and suffering from the weather, without any care for their condition on the part of the government they serve. They would raise a row pretty quickly, but that they respect to highly the feelings of their own officers to place them in an awkward position, by drawing down on them the displeasure of the war department. We shall go to Camargo, and I think we shall leave here between the 1st and 5th of October. In the meantime we shall drill and be recruited. The distance to Camargo from our camp is 236 miles. Col. Marshall has already every creek, spring, pond, bayou, Ranche, sandy piece on the way, and I am indebted to his politeness for information as to the gross distance. He says he shall march it in 14 days. The arming of our regiment in two different ways attracted originally, some comment, and alarmed the pride of our commanding officer. He had a correspondence with the war department as to the meaning of this movement, but the secretary repelled the idea that any undue advantage was to be taken of the volunteer officers. The apprehensions of Col. Marshall are beginning to be realized. For instance, the advanced guard of Wool's division is made up of thus:

4 companies United States infantry – 1 company Kentucky infantry - Capt. Williams. 2 companies Illinois infantry – Hardin's regiment. 3 companies Illinois infantry – Sissell's regiment.

No volunteer colonel or lieutenant. Colonel obtains the command, but the command is conferred on brevet major Bonneville, of the regular army. He - a mere major by brevet - it to be placed in command of a full regiment, while superior officers who are volunteers are not noticed at all. He is forsooth to have ten companies under his charge, while Hardin and Bissell are reduced to seven or eight each by the operation! A similar operation is opening on our regiment.

Gen. Wool has ordered major John P. Gaines to detach C. M. Clay's and Pennington's companies from Marshall's regiment, one company from the Tennessee and one from the Arkansas cavalry, to form a battalion which he now says should be under Gaines's command. This robery of our regiment is to [?]ure to the benefit of Archie Yell, colonel of the Arkansas regiment who will have command of more than a regiment by the operation! I don't know what our col. Means to do with these orders. I see he is moody and clouded to-day, and not disposed to say much about it. He had a Mexican rider in camp to day and started him to Camargo. It is supposed he bears dispatches touching on this order to major gen. Wm. O. Butler. I see no preparations making for the departure of our companies, and should not be surprised if this business closes with our colonel in arrest, for if he determines to permit the separation of the regiment into minute detachments for the use and advantage of other officers, he will maintain his position at the cost of his commission. He has trouble ahead of him I fear, and it is suspected that there had been some intrigue, as the order designates the companies to be detached. By my next we shall have a development, of which I will apprise you.

NNR 71.153-71.154 November 7, 1846 letters of S.D. Allis about the assault on Monterey

The following letters are copied from the N. Orleans Picayune, and were written by S.D. Allis, who was formerly a clerk with the Picayune office, and was known as "the tall Yankee clerk." The letters were written for private perusal by his family, but on that account are the more full of those personal details which always interest and enlighten the reader:

- Monterey, Sept. 24, 1846

Uncle:- I once more have an opportunity to write you, and it would be difficult for me to express the sensations of pleasure I feel in being able to do so, after having participated in many hard fights with the enemy to get possession of this beautiful place. Yes, Monterey is ours. After four days' hard fighting the Mexicans have capitulated. I have heard and read of battles, but never had an idea what a battle was before. The whistling of bullets, grape and canister- 6, 12, and 18 pound balls - the roar of cannon and bursting of shells- have become as familiar and common to me during the fight as the alphabet. Our company has done honor to Louisiana, and our division, under Gen. Worth, all agree, has done its duty. I was with our company at the storming of three batteries, located on hills so high that you might call them mountains, and so steep that a slip of the foot would have thrown us hundreds of feet below. The Louisiana boys made the attack on the castle, and lay five hours by themselves within 200 yards of it, picking off those that exposed themselves, and all the time the enemy pouring in showers of musket balls and grape; but they flew over our heads. Finally they sallied forth and charged on us. The 7th infantry, in reserve all this time came up and rushed on the castle, and raised the stars and stripes. We fired on the Mexicans as they left the breastworks and the castle, and captured four pieces of artillery. Our division has done the work; although our loss is small, we have done more to conquer Monterey than the whole of the two divisions who made the attack of the front. I would give you a description of the fight on our side, but Haile and Kendall, who were there, can do it better than I can. I will say, however, that the first five shells thrown by the Mexicans in the rear, where we made the attack, fell almost in the midst of your company, and burst without doing any harm. This was the opening of this side of the town, on Monday, the 21st inst. Yesterday, three divisions of Mexican troops marched out of town, and to-day 3,000 more. The balance have four more days to leave in. There were troops enough here, had they been Americans to keep of 50,000 good men. Every house is a fort, and every resident, even the little boys, had muskets and fired them upon the rooftops; but we finally went from house to house until we had taken one half the city, when a flag of truce was sent in by General Ampudia, and the terms of surrender agreed upon. We are in a most splendid house, near the center of town; but will be removed to the Government barracks as soon as the Mexicans have all left. The two Nichols have behaved nobly during all the fights, indeed exposing themselves more than necessary. The old gentlemen may well be proud of such boys as they are. We are now anticipating a speedy return, for we think that affairs will soon be settled, and that this dose will be enough for the Mexicans. The taking possession of the big fort was an interesting ceremony. The Mexicans fired a salute and marched out – we fired one and marched in, then raised the star spangled banner and gave three cheers, while our band... played the appropriate air.—We marched in the tune of Yankee Doodle, but it would be hard to tell what tune was played by the Mexican band. Our company has had two killed and four wounded. Many of them have the marks of balls in their clothes and caps, and it would seem that a Divine Power had interfered to preserve the lives of our little band.

Monterey, Mexico Sept. 28, 1846

Dear Uncle:

I am sergeant to the guard to-night, and have concluded to write out a description of my own experience and what I saw at the storming of this place during the three days' hard fighting, for your amusement and for the benefit of those who left me here in particular—who tried to persuade me to go home, saying that we would never see a Mexican with a musket that would pull a trigger at us. You, who returned, don't you wish you had stayed here—that you had come along as far as Monterey and taken a hand in a battle that will be remembered as the United States remains a nation, and perhaps longer? To thrash these yellow skins in their own forts, cities, and their own mountains—to see the stars and stripes raised in triumph on the ramparts of their fortifications by the boys that can do it handsomely! Ah, pity you from the bottom of my heart! You came a long ways to get a fight and were disappointed.

I came a little further and was in a glorious one. It would have done you good to have seen what these long understandings of mine have been to me in climbing up the Mexican mountains. But I must commence more formally.

Saturday morning, Sept 19th.

—The 1st division under Gen. Twiggs took the head at daybreak, and soon ours (the 2d) one hour latter, and the third one soon after us. About 10 o'clock, we first heard the cannon of the Mexicans in this place, which had been fired at a body of Texas Rangers, who had been reconnoitering and trying to coax out the Mexican lancers, and, oh, with what pleasure did we here it rebound around the fort! Cheers rent the air for miles— the whole army. Exhausted as the men were, all appeared to double their speed, anxious to be brought to the scene of action. But it was not the intention of Gen. Taylor to bring us into action until Monday, so we came to a halt at the walnut springs, distant four miles from town, a beautiful place in a small valley and surrounded by large timber. The water is cold and delicious, and the springs afford water enough for 50,000 men, if they could all get to it. The body of water running out of one spring alone is at least a half barrel.

Sunday, Sept. 20th.

-Our division, under the command of Gen. Worth, and composed of the 5th and 7th infantry, eleven companies of artillery with muskets, the 8th infantry, the Louisiana volunteers and 150 rangers, and two batteries of four guns each, was ordered to march at 12 o'clock and take up a position in the rear of the city and co-operate with the army that made the attack in front. We opened our way around the town at a distance, through fields of corn, sugar cane, and pea fields, without being disturbed until sun down, when a few shots were exchanged at a distance between advance of the enemy and our own, but no harm was done. At dark we bivouacked for the night, which was quite cold, and no blankets or tents to cover us from the occasional showers of rain; at the point of rain we started again, but had not gone more than two miles before we found ourselves directly under a Mexican battery so high that it was out of reach of our cannon. They opened lively upon us with shell, the first fire of which appeared to be directed at our company, although they burst without doing the least harm. But the grand fandango soon commenced in front, the lancers and Texas Rangers aided by three regular companies, came to loggerheads, and had a pretty sharp skirmish, killing fifteen Mexicans and wounding several more. We had two wounded on our side, and the lancers too French leave. We soon saw that there were two more batteries in front beside the castle of Monterey, off to the left—indeed, it seemed as if the place could never be taken. We had not gone far before opened us with a 9 pounder, killing one captain and one private of the 8th infantry. We waited, under their fire, until our train had passed around the hill and up the valley out of reach of their fire, and we all soon followed them to make preparations for the attack. In the meantime, company was ordered to defend a pass in the mountains I our rear in case the enemy should advance in that direction.

About 12 o'clock, the enemy commenced firing down the second hill with muskets, and occasionally a load of grape and canister. From where I was I had a most splendid view of the fight as it proved to be, but thus far a one sided one, for not a single shot had been sent forth from below for nearly an hour after the first attack. Ah! There goes the volley of muskets; I can occasionally get a peep at our boys, who are climbing the mountain as fast as they can, keeping as much as possible under every nook, bush and rock. Volley after volley are exchanged on both sides, our boys gain the top and the Mexicans run off on the other side. The stars and stripes are raised with cheers, which are responded to in the valley below. It is now our turn. Another battery still further on, built of stone and on a very steep and high hill, is next to be stormed. “On the right fire, close intervals!” When we all ran in the double quicktime. The 5th infantry comprising about 200 men and Louisiana for the next. It was with good cheer that we marched onto the attack, our company so stationed as to be in advance. We had hardly reached the roof of the hill when down came a shower of grape and canister in the midst, but it appeared as if Mexican iron and copper was not made to kill Yankees. On we went through the showers of musket balls, and soon had climbed the mountain high enough to reach them with our musket balls. On we went, loading and forming as we advanced, until within fifty yards, when we rushed up as fast as our legs would carry us, driving the Mexican down the other side and taking a 9-pounder brass cannon, ready loaded with grape, but the load intended for us was turned lose on them.

The first hill taken was directly opposite the hill that opened on us in the morning with shell, and the hill taken by us directly in front of the castle, an ugly customer well fixed to kill Yankees, mounting four 9-pounders and two mortars. They soon opened on us with shell, which burst all around us without doing any harm. Dark soon put an end to all cannonading, and we lay down to rest anticipating hot work in the morning. Occasional showers of rain, and no blankets... with us, kept up awake during most of the night. About one hour before the day we heard muskets on the opposite hill, and soon after we heard the 8th infantry, which had not yet had a turn at the enemy, had climbed to the fort and made an attack. By sunrise they drove the Mexicans out, but they were smart enough to take the cannon with them this time and broke for the castle, we cannot climb its walls, nor can we batter it down. We may drive them out with shells, and kill all those who expose themselves, with out muskets. Perhaps we can coax them into a bit of a fight outside. But take it we must. At 7 o’clock, A.M. we were ordered across to the last place taken. In the course of an hour we found ourselves at the top of our last prize. We seated ourselves on the rocks to rest, while I took a glorious nap on an hour. I heard the alarm, that the enemy were advancing on us around the side of the mountain. Our company, the immortal “phoenix.” Was ordered out alone to hold them in check; but it was only a small body who were trying to coax us out under the guns of the first, and within reach of about 500 lancers who were at a halt about a half mile off.

Balls began to fly thick as we advance; every bush has a Mexican in it; they upon us from the castle; the lancers move off. We get under cover of nooks, bushes, and low places, and whenever we get a good shot at a fellow in or near the castle, cut loose. Volley after volley is fired at us, but we lay low and they shoot high. They are coming out of the castle, about 500 strong, to make an attack on us. One of out 12-pound howitzers has been hoisted on the hill in the rear, and the shells commence whizzing over our heads. Everyone tells, bursting on and in the castle. They advance on us; we are ordered to close at the right on the top of the hill, and fall back into a ravine one hundred yards distant. We did so in great order, firing several times as we retreated. The Mexicans came at us with a yell; the battle grew hot. The word charge was given when the regulars in reserve came to our aid, and on we rushed, sweeping them and the castle at the same time; and, as usual when we entered the door of the castle, which we had stove, they ran out at the other; but we chased them to the edge of the town, pouring in a deadly fire upon them. We do not know the number of dead on the Mexican side, but counted 21 in lot. We lost one noble fellow, as good and brave a spirit that ever moved in the army. We also had three wounded in this mornings fight. The day before our company lost one and had four others slightly wounded. Some have caps, some jackets, and others guns marked with balls. Of the Wednesdays fight and capture of the town, I will tell you when I see you again. This latter was a battle on the house tops.

Over 9000 Mexican regulars have already left town, and God only knows how many are in line to leave tomorrow. Including citizens who turned out to fight, they must have had two men to our one, and perhaps more.

I saw Haile several times during the fight, riding about quite indifferent to the balls which fell around him. Although he did not run into danger, he did not appear to try to avoid it when it visited him.

We are in a splendid house near the plaza, and have a plenty to eat; thousands of oranges, apples, and other fine fruit. I forgot to tell you that our brigade marched up to receive the big Mexican fort, with six guns, and raised the big American flag on it, fired salutes, marched out about 2,000 yellow skins, and gave cheers for the star spangled banner. Had 2,000 Americans been in this fort, half of Mexico could not have wiped us out of it. We took a mortar in town the next day after taking the castle, and fired one of our shells into the square from it, killing and wounding over thirty Mexicans. Most of the Mexican soldiers or half of them nearly are married men and have their wives with them. Between 800 and 1,000 went out with a division of 1800 soldiers yesterday. It looks bad to see the Mexican army marching off in this way, ready to give us a fight another time, but I believe Gen. T. acted wisely, and has saved a thousand lives which would have sacrificed in the taking of the rest of the fortifications and town. [MJK]

The following is an extract of a letter from Lieutenant Henry Little, of the U.S. Infantry, (son of the late Col. Peter Little, who so long represented the District in Congress.) The letter of Lieut. L. was written to his family in this city, of course not for publication, but as everything in relation to the brilliant affair at Monterey is of grossing interest, the letter has, at our request, been furnished to us, and from it we make the following extracts:

Monterey, (Mexico,) September 29th, 1846.

I wrote you a letter from our camp at Seralvo, and I believe I mentioned that it was pretty generally thought there would be no fighting here. After leaving Seralvo we took upon our line of march through the mountain passes, surrounded by some of the most beautiful scenery in the world. On encamping the second night, the mail reached us and brought me ----’s letter, dated I think in August, (for I destroyed it going into battle.) The next day we reached a town called Marin, which was deserted by a body of the enemy’s troops on the advance of ours. We remained there all day for the whole army to concentrate.—

From the belfry of the church we could see Monterey, about 22 miles distant. The rising and setting of the sun in the mountains exceeded anything I have ever seen, and by lovers of the beauties of nature, was indeed hailed with delight. One will no doubt read descriptions of our march in the papers from abler pens than mine, as several contributors to different newspapers accompany the march. On the second days march from Marin, and about 6 or 8 miles from here, our ears were saluted by the firing of artillery. It afterwards proved to be the town firing upon General Taylor with the advance guard, who were reconnoitering the place. This of course settled all doubts with regard to a fight. The town was evidently fortified, and strongly too. As proved on closer observation. The strength of the enemy’ forces could not of course be known, but supposed to be large or they would not make a stand. The army encamped that night about three mile from the town, on a little stream called the Walnut springs. The army had been previously divided into three divisions, the 1st under General Twiggs, the 2d under Gen. Worth, the 3rd under Gen. Butler. On Sunday the 20th inst. the 2d division consisting of the artillery battalion, 8th infantry, 5th and 7th infantry, one company of Louisiana volunteers, two battalions of light artillery, and some Texas Rangers marched out of camp to take position in the rear of the town, preparatory to storming the fortified hills and Bishop's palace the next morning. We marched until near night when very heavy rain commenced and drenched us all to the skin; soon after we halted for the night, and lay on the ground shivering with cold. I was fortunate enough to get my cloak, a brother officer and myself contrived to cover ourselves with it, and with a stone for a pillow, and the broad canopy of heaven over us, endeavored to get some rest. At daylight we again commenced our march and soon being in range of the enemy's guns, they commenced throwing round shot and shells at us, but for some time did no damage.—Soon the head of our column came up with a body of Mexican troops, consisting of lancers and infantry. After a slight resistance and some loss, they fled, and with some delay we still continued our march. The road was directly under fire, and they took pretty good advantage of it; their shot fell around us, and one officer (Captain McKeavet, 8th infantry) was killed and several men wounded. We were then moved out of reach of their fire and soon after two hills from which they had been firing at us were stormed and taken—thus ended the operations on our side of the town the first day. Our loss was very trifling indeed. On the other side of the town our loss was very great—some nine or ten officers of the regular army were killed and I do not know how many volunteers. A great number of wounded also.—The loss among the men was also very great; I have not heard the exact number.

That night I was on guard on the road leading into the town. It was as dark as a pitch, rained nearly all night; I was cold, hungry, fatigued, and wet through, not allowed to have a fire, and I thought I never spent so miserable a night in my life—not even my coat to cover me. The next day another hill and the Bishop's palace were taken, and the next day (Wednesday) the town was attacked; the streets were barricaded and fortified, the tops of the houses leading to the main plaza covered by their soldiers. The roofs of the houses are flat, with a wall of masonry around them, which makes a capital breast work.—And here we fought them, driving them from street to street and house to house—cannon on both sides were raking the streets with grape shot. We had nearly driven them into the main plaza when night came on. The next morning early the firing recommenced, but lasted a very short time, when the enemy sent in a white flag offering to surrender on certain conditions, After much consultation, lasting nearly all day, the terms of surrender were settled.

-------- I have ever been very brief in my account of the foregoing actions, as I know you will see a full account of them in the papers. It has been another glorious achievement of our arms, of which every American will feel proud. The Mexican soldiers have all gone, and my regiment is encamped in the grand plaza. We have pretty comfortable rooms assigned to us, and after so long living in the streets, I assure you I feel quite comfortable with a table, chair, and bed. I am told the Mexican forces amounted to about 8000 regular and 3000 irregular troops, with about 40 pieces of cannon of different sizes. This is indeed a most beautiful place, and some of the gardens almost come up to my idea of Eastern magnificence. They abound in delicious fruits, and we revel in oranges, pomegranates, grapes, &c. The view from on of the hills is one of the finest things I ever saw. The valley in which this town is built extends for nearly thirty of forty miles, and looks like a beautiful garden.

SIEGE OF MONTEREY.

The Baltimore Battalion

Extracts of letters of officers belonging to the battalion to our friends.

The following we take from the Patriot.

Camp near Monterey, September 25, 1846.

We arrived here on the 20th inst. and when within three miles of the city we were saluted by a brisk cannonading from the enemies batteries—they fired upon our advance guard and general staff. We of course countermarched, and encamped within sight of the city. On Sunday we went out, and returned with out doing anything, the enemy fired upon us—not a shot returned. Early on Monday the troops were assembled in battle array. I cannot picture the horrors of the day to your mind, and am thankful that al All—wise Providence has spared me the fate that many a noble has met with. Four officers belonging to the army fell near to me, among them Col. Watson, for whom a nation might mourn. He is no more.

In a desperate charge against one of the Mexican forts he fell mortally wounded. He handed his sword to lieut. Bowie, and died with a smile on his face, that indicated more than the tongue could tell. He died a brave and gallant soldier. The last words which he uttered were: "Men, your general leads you—who would not follow?" These were uttered seeing an officer pass who, it is presumed, he, in the expiring agony of death, took for gen. Taylor.

I deeply regret that Col. Watson was not spared to enjoy the victory with us. Poor fellow he is gone, and I hope his country will take care of his wife and children. It will be great loss to them. It was hot was the battle, that we were unable to take the body of our lamented colonel from the street, till nearly 48 hours had elapsed. We buried whim in a brick house within about 400 yards from where he made a charge with the battalion. A very singular circumstance occurred while the act was in the act of preparing the grave: a ball came and took his head off; and instead of burying one, we had to have another dirge for the poor soldier. Such is war.

We have lost a number of men, but nothing appears so horrible to me as those men who have their arms and legs taken off. I never before imagined what a battlefield was—never thought it like this.—We have some noble fellows in our battalion instead of being privates they should be generals. They charged three forts and succeeded in taking them, but many who were foremost are now numbered with the dead. We passed the forts on Monday and got into the city. I left my tent determined to surmount every obstacle. I knew we had eyes looking upon us that had jealousy in them, and we determined to lead the leaders.

You would not suppose that any one could live in this lane or street which we were fighting. Three batteries were constantly playing upon us. Muskets, rifles, and every weapon that could be brought to play was bearing upon us. The lanes became so dense with dead men and horses, that we had to tread upon them in passing. The Mexican lancers, not satisfied by seeing the poor fellows wounded upon the ground, must revenge themselves by thrusting their lances into their bodies. Many of the lancers, however, in turn were made to bite dust.

Every one thought I was killed. My horse was found with blood upon him and brought to camp, and finally they sent out to find me, when I discovered sergeant major Day holding my charger near the fort. I called out and told him to tie the horse to a bush and take care of himself, three forts all the time throwing grape shots at us. I finally managed to get charge of twenty three prisoners, which our men found had retreated from the fort to the tan yard. - Among them were three officers. You may be sure we had to run for it, regardless of the lives of the prisoners. All the forts opened upon us, and such a dodging of balls you've never heard of. I had often heard of getting out of the way of balls, but never believed it before. Every time while we were running to the camp with our prisoners, as we saw the flash of the old twelve-pounder, down all would go upon the road, get up again and run forward. At every flash the Mexicans would fall as flat as flounders.

It is thought that our enemy had some French artillerists among them, as they fired with great skill. Yesterday they fired at a single Texas Ranger, struck his horse and broke the poor man's leg, so that it had to be taken off this morning.

On Tuesday gen. Wool, I understand, wished a suspension of hostilities until he could bury the dead, which was actually refused by the Mexicans, although the truce asked for was only for two hours. It soon came our time to refuse. They wanted, as they said, to remove the women and children out of the city. This was refused. They were told, if they continued hostilities we would remove the men. - They, however, came to terms last night.

The slightest wound here, I might say is worse than a mortal one, for the wound is soon filled with worms, and in spite of all physicians can do, the wound cannot be kept clean of them. They abound in great abundance and of almost every imaginable species.

I am heartily tired of Mexico, and but for the duty I owe to my country, would be the bearer of this letter. You can get nothing without great difficulty.

Our fare has been exceedingly bad. The provisions which the government allows to soldiers are anything but good. Contracts are given to political men, and they put such trash upon our troops as Negroes would not eat it in the south— the pork is fat that lean is considered a great rarity; flour and crackers without worms, are so scarce. In fact the only thing relishable I am able to get is corn, occasionally. On the march through this country, I sometimes get a hold of an old hen, and it seemed old enough to be mother to the chickens that crowded in the days of Hamlet's father. I have just been informed that on of the Ohio men who received a wound in the arm, and which I bound up with my handkerchief during the battle, was stabbed by one of the infernal lancers while resting himself on the chaparral, whither he had gone to get out of the way of the shot.

The Mexicans have fought hard—very hard. No city could have been better forfeited than Monterey, and none but Americans have fought as we have. Nothing but the principle of "never give up" and our go-ahead business that makes us a people defying nations in quiet arms. From what I have seen from observation to day, there is no place so well calculated, in regard to power of defiance as this. In natural advantages I am confident, it has no equal. — Here the Spanish and French forces were separately defeated, and once the combined forces of the two nations.

You can tell Mr. Rodgers that Seth is well. We left William Hickman at Camargo with Dr. Miles and about thirty of our men. Hickman was not in the battle owing to his sickness. Tell Mr. Boyd that his son is well and makes a first rate soldier.

A lancer got after Henry Norris— he ran until he came to a fence, and then leveled his musket and dropped the gentleman from his horse. He was struck so hard that he never knew what hurt him. Mr. N. is a great boy. He says he was never more frightened and that he thought he was a "goner."

Please say to John Glenn, esp. that capt. Kenly is well and one of the foremost in the battle—that he was far ahead of his company in the charge.

A poor old soldier named Kelley, who says he is acquainted in Baltimore, has had his ankle broken by a cannon ball, and will probably lose the leg. Remember me to all your friends and believe me,

Yours.

Monterey 26th Sep., 1846

My dear sir: The American arms are once more victorious after one of the most glorious contests on record. The enemy fought us five days and surrendered yesterday The city of Monterey, with all its public buildings and records; its cathedral, armed to the dome; its plaza, a complete net work of masonry, in some places eight feet thick; its distilleries and tan yards, all turned into forts, and in our hands, impregnable; besides five regularly built forts of the strongest kind-all are ours- 42 pieces cannon, mortars, howitzers and 18-pounders; small arms and ammunition innumerable, together with a large number of prisoners are also ours. Monterey, the place where has heretofore been invulnerable- the spot where she once defeated the combined forces of Old Spain and France, 17,000 strong, has fallen into our hands. The regular and volunteer infantry fought like lions charging in several instances right up to the fort walls, six foot thick; jumping and wading the dykes and ditches; climbing the walls and shooting the cannonnories at their guns, without any support from artillery whatsoever. Such a thing was never heard of before. Our battalion charged upon the city with three forts pouring a continuous cross fire on us, while every roof, window, and door sent forth one uninterrupted stream of musket and rifle balls; bomb shell, 18, 24-pounders, grape, canister, and round shot of all sizes fell around us and passed over us in millions and many a gallant heart that beat high on the glorious 21 September [?] around and within the city of Monterey. Honored be their memory. The brave and chivalrous Col. Watson, after making two different charges on the city, after the 3d infantry regiment of regulars and flying artillery had retreated as ordered, on his return to the eastern section of the city, and while again charging on a fort, tannery, and distillery, fell mortally wounded with a musket ball through his neck and separating the jugular vein. He never spoke, but died in three minutes and lies buried in a grave with officers of the army, 40 feet from the upper fort. It was reported that our gallant captain, now Colonel Stewart had fallen early in the action, but I found him twice downtown in the thickest of the fight, while death was claiming many around him, ultimately leading and urging is own men and others (for we were all huddled together) to another charge, or directing and pointing out the best shelter a mud hole, hedge, fence, or sapling would afford. He made a gallant stand after we were ordered to retreat, killing with his own hand an officer and driving back, with a few more, a larger body of lancers who were charging among the volunteers.—He succeeds to the command of the battalion by seniority, and with, I may say, the universal approval of the officers and men, and Gov. Pratt would do great injustice to the son of an old defender, to a brave and cool officer and warm hearted gentleman, were he to entertain for moment the idea of commissioning any other person as colonel. Captain Boyd of the Chesapeake was also reported to have fallen early in action, but I saw him soon afterwards bravely leading his men up the cannon’s mouth, followed by volunteers from others regiments. Capt. Kenly, bore himself gallantly in the fight, also pressing into the very thickest of the fray; and capts. Pipers and Waters both behaved well. Capt. Bronaugh’s were on the guard and not in action. The 1st sergeant in Capt. Waters’ company, (Orderly Trescott, a man about 42 years of age,) and whose place is at my elbow in line, had his head blown about 40 feet in the air by a 12 pound shot. There are eight men in my mess. William P. Alexander, of them, has not been recognized since the action of the 21st. The lancers killed all the wounded and I fear he had been buried without being recognized.—Robert Caples, another, was mortally wounded, I fear in the groin- the ball was taken out of the back.

Malcolm Wilson, another, was wounded in the arm by musket ball. Three out of eight killed or wounded; besides, W. G. H. , another, was in the first fort taken all night, and R. W. R., another, after charging on the fort once and down town twice, was cut off, and taken prisoner, but succeeded, two hours after the Americans had retreated , by the aid of a Mexican officer, in making his escape, running the gauntlet of three batteries without receiving a scratch. After being forced into the little shelter which a small hole in an open field, raked by three forts, afforded, raising my head a few moments after, I found forty lancers with one hundred yards of my right, and 5 or 600 hundred between me and the American army. Knowing that their mode of warfare is to show no quarter, and cut the throats of the wounded, you may know I did not feel comfortable, and was glad to see Gold and Freburger, the only two of our company on the field. I feel grateful God that my life was spared in such hope less circumstances, and a general feeling of gratitude to the Almighty God of battles pervade our men. We had to run three miles in making the different charges. Poor Watson said to me a few moments before he fell, “Who will now dare say that American volunteers cannot be depended upon in any fight.” They were the last words I heard him utter, being separated from him when wounded. Albert Hart, our color sergeant, has lost an arm, and the flag staff of banner presented to the brave Stewart, by the ladies of Baltimore, through the Old Defenders, has a wound upon it, from the same ball. That flag was the first and only that floated gallantly in the breeze yesterday from the first fort taken from the enemy. Joseph Files has lost an arm, and William Lee was wounded slightly in the abdomen. I merely mention the killed and wounded within our company, knowing that you will see an official list. General Worth, with two brigades, was led around by a secret pass behind the town, (by a Mexican to save his neck,) and coming into Saltillo road, cut off the enemies supplies and utterly surprised him by a brisk cannonading and bombardment in his rear. Unfading laurels are due to Worth for his scientific, soldierlike and highly praiseworthy part in the bloody battle of Monterey. The fight commenced, on our part, Monday morning early and ended late Wednesday night. They had fired upon us, however, for three days before, with but little success. Our glorious little battalion has covered itself with honor and with the exception of a very few, who will be duly reported, every individual seemed to think the result depended on him. All in Captain Stewart’s company not here mentioned as wounded, escaped unhurt and are well. An armistice had taken place for eight weeks, and we hold this whole country as security for the expenses of the war. It is said the enemy were 14,000 strong at least, and our forces in the field were less than 6,000. I had forty odd wounded Mexicans placed under my charge by Col. Stewart night before last. Miserable objects of compassion some of them are, and they and the stench of the dead lying around the damp, the dirt, and the want of food for almost eighteen hours, almost overcame me. Monterey is the strongest place naturally I ever saw with the eye or in print. There is an open plain, three to four miles long or four or five miles wide in front, except a little range hills, about forty feet high, behind which the town lies. In the rear, and on the right and left, the mountains back right up to it, and rise several hundred feet high abruptly and almost perpendicularly, while the only pass is through a mountain gorge directly in its center. I was within ten feet of Gen. Taylor, in the town, on the 21st. He was as cool as a cucumber, and ordered us to pass into the city and break open the houses. God knows how any of us got out.

THE BALTIMORE BATTALION IN THE BATTLE OF MONTEREY

Letter from a Baltimorean commanding one of the companies of the Baltimore volunteers:
Monterey, Sept. 27, 1846.

I should like to give you a full account of the operations of our Army from the time we reached this town until it was forced to capitulate. On Monday last, the 21st, (after having been under arms a portion of the previous night exposed to a heavy rain,) at 7 o’clock, A.M., we marched for camp with two companies of the 1st Infantry, and after an hours hard marching, we issued from a cornfield directly in front of a battery, or rather fort, of some six or seven pieces of artillery, and crowded with infantry, which opened on us the moment the head of our column made its appearance. We were within point blank range, and I, for the first time, heard the whistling of shot. Our battalion was immediately formed in line of battle under this fire, and we were ordered to charge. Forward I went, cheering and waving my sword, and the men came after me gallantly. When within a hundred yards of the trenches I looked back to see who was following, being anxious to know the men. Judge of my astonishment when I beheld the four companies of regulars marching by a flank to the right. I saw Col. Watson shouting, but as to hearing a command, that was an impossibility, owing to the deafening roar of the cannon and musketry. I saw the head of our line changing its direction, and I knew at once that the point of attack had changed, and ran at the head of the company to intercept the head of the column. I reached just as Col. Watson was dismounting from his horse, which the next moment fell from a shot. The colonel cried to the men—“Shelter yourselves, men, the best way you can.” At this time the Battalion was scattered over a space of about an acre, and the men were lying down, the shot in most instances flying over our heads; but the guns were soon depressed, and the shot began to take effect.

I was lying close to Colonel Watson, alongside of a hedge, when he jumped up and cried out “Now’s that time boys, follow me.” I was up and after him in a second, my men following me. We were now in a street or lane with a few houses on either side, and within a hundred yards of three batteries which completely ranked, in addition to which two twelve pound guns were planted in the Castle on the right, and completely infiladed the whole distance we had to make. Add to this the thousand musketeers on the houses tops and in the barricades at the head of the street up which we advanced, and at every cross street, and you may form some idea of the deluge of balls poured on us. (Bear in mind that the four companies of regulars were now with us, the one intermingled with the other.) Onward we went, men and horses falling at every step. Sheers, shrieks, groans of words of command added to the din, whilst the roar of the guns was absolutely deafening.

We advanced up the street under this awful and fatal fire nearly two hundred yards, when we reached a cross street at the corner of which all who had succeeded in getting this far alive halted, ad if by mutual consent. I was shaking Col. Watson by the hand, whilst he was complimenting me, when a shower of grape, round and canister shot came from the corner above, and you may form some idea of the deluge of balls poured on us. (Bear in mind that the four companies of regulars were now with us, the one intermingled with the other.) Onward we went, men and horses falling at every step. Sheers, shrieks, groans of words of command added to the din, whilst the roar of the gen. was absolutely deafening.

I sat down on the ground with my back to the wall of a house. On my left two men torn nearly to pieces. One of them was lying flat on his back with his legs extending farther in the street than mine. Crash came another shower of grape, which tore one of his wounded legs nearly off. He reared up and shrieked and fell back a corpse. I never moved for I was satisfied that one place was as good as another. Directly opposite to me was a Brevet 2nd Lieut. Aisquith; on the right hand corner was Lieut. Bowie, also of my company; and close to me sat Colon Watson, and Adjut. Schaefer. In a few minutes I saw our color sergeant, Old Hart, come past with his right arm shattered (it has since been amputated) and in a few minutes came our Battalion Flag, borne by one of the other color guards, our glorious stars and stripes; and note this, that it was the first American flag in the city of Monterey-an honor which we know belong to our battalion.

When I saw the flag, notwithstanding the novelty of the scene around me, a thrill of pleasure shot through me and I felt as if I could die, for I had made up my mind to die, and no man there ever thought for a moment that he would get out alive, and most of them did not. The firing still continued without the slightest intermission whilst we remained at the memorable corner, which was perhaps for fifteen minutes. When we were ordered to charge up the street a slight hesitation was manifested by both regulars and volunteers, but the officers sprang to the front in double file, I being alongside of Colonel Watson.

We advanced, suppose, fifty yards when Col. Garland, of the Army, ordered us to retire. We still advanced, and he again ordered us to retire, adding this time, in good order. I now became separated from Col. Watson, and never saw him again. He took the left hand side of the street and I the right hand, and when I reached the open field where he had first ordered us to lay down, I was joined by Lieut. Aisquith, who, to my inquiry, answered that he had just left the Colonel, and supposed that he would soon be with you. Seeing no other officer around me, I rallied the Battalion (remember that the firing was just as hot and incessant now as it had been at the first) and led them down to make another attack on the fort, having made up my mind or take it or die in the attempt.

Imagine my surprise—a most agreeable one, I confess, to find the fort in our possession, it having been captured by the Mississippi and Tennessee regiments when it turned its fire on us as we charged into the town. I have not the slightest doubt that it was the charge made by the 1st infantry and our Battalion into the city which made the Mexicans retreat the Fort.

I was ordered to shelter my men from the fire, and await further orders, I took them in the ditch and then clambered over the ramparts to take a look at what was going on. My appearance was greeted with a dozen or so of musket balls, which accelerated greatly a retrograde movement, and I sat down quietly in 10 feet of dirt between me and the enemy’s shot. This was the first spot I had been in which I was out of fire for more than two hours, and I was nearly exhausted. One of my men now came up to me and reported the death of poor Col. Watson, whom he had seen fall from a musket shot through the neck.

As well as I can learn, the Colonel, in retiring from the city, inclined a good deal to the left, and became separated from the main body of the battalion; that in company with Lieut. Bowie, who remained with him, he met another column advancing to the attack, joined them with a few men he had with them, and fell a few minutes afterwards. He met with a gallant soldiers death—his face to the foe. His loss is deplored by all who knew his generosity of heart and chivalry of character. His loss to me, individually, is great, but to the battalion it is irreparable.—I know not how we will get along without him.—We have much, very much to contend against, and have ever since we left home. But of all this more anon.

We had been in the ditch for about a quarter of an hour whe Capt. Ridgely’s battery came up, also for shelter; but his appearance was the signal for the castle to open before us, which killed one of his horses on the very first shot, and wounded one of my men. We were now ordered to support Captain Bragg’s battery which had taken position to cut off the lancers who had sallied out to intercept what they thought was our retreat. We killed 5 or 6 of them, and the rest fled back to the city.

We were again ordered to the Fort to be ready for another attack on the city. Again the Castle opened on us and every shot told, and I never was s glad in my life as when I got into the old ditch. But it was a short lived gratification, for a regiment of Mexican Infantry were firing on Captain Webster’s battery, and their balls raked the whole fort, ditch and all. We were then ordered to join the Ohio, Kentucky and Tennessee troops which were forming on the plain for another attack on the city.

The attack was not made, although I was burning to have revenge, and from the time I last left the ditch until we were ordered back to the camp by General Twiggs, we were constantly under fire being in open view and fair range of the artillery in the gray castle. I was under first one General and then another, until I became completely worn out, as well as my command, which had remained so faithful with me. I returned to camp as night approached, wearied in body and mind, but thankful to God for preserving my life through the perils of the day.

Thus terminated, as far as our battalion was concerned, one of the longest bloodiest battles ever fought on this continent, and strange to say, our battalion only lost six killed and twenty wounded. I had about thirty-eight men of my company in the fight, and two were killed and three wounded; yet every one of those that escaped has told me he did not expect to live through the day, and most of them had, their clothes struck by balls.

I cannot realize that my loss was so small, so completely were my ranked raked by shot. Above, below, alongside, between legs and arms, everywhere the balls whistles and howled. The air seemed cut to pieces by the quantity the that the artillery hurled at us, and it would be childish to tell you how close they came to me, and what and how many escapes I had. Others will hereafter tell you of the first days fight at Monterey, and now I tell you that I was in that fight and exposed to shot for nine hours.

I have thus given you a hasty and ill digested account of my doings on the 21st. I could fill fifty pages if I were to give you a detail of the whole week’s work which resulted in the capture of this important town; but I will stop short, for my back aches now from writing this on my knees. Of my own company I cannot say enough. I love them. They stuck to me through every phase of fortune, and one of them, as he was dying, told me to write to his father and tell him, “he died like a true patriot.”

The following letter we copy from the Washington Union:

-Camp near Monterey 27th September, 1846.

To the editors of the Union:

You have, no doubt, had official information some days ago relating to the battles of the 21st, 22d, and 23d instant; and, without attempting to say anymore of the bloody conflict, I consider it due to Lieut. Taylor, or company B, under the command of Captain Piper, of the Baltimore volunteers to say that his conduct, during the three days fight, was brave and gallant, and that the is the gentlemen the recovered the dead body of our brave Lt. Col. Watson, under the heavy fire of the enemy. To-day General Twiggs met the officers of our battalion, and conferred the honor of colonel commanding the battalion on Capt. James E. Stewart, of Baltimore city it being due to him as the senior captain; as also a reward of merit for his conduct during the struggle. Gen. Twiggs also stated, in our presence, that the Baltimore Battalion through out had acted as brave and noble a part in three days’ struggle as any troops in the American army.

I am, dear sir, your very respectfully
K. Bronaugh, Capitan Comp. C.

List of Killed and Wounded.

A Washington correspondent of the Baltimore Sun furnishes the following extract of a letter from Captain Piper, of the Baltimore volunteers, to his brother Dr. Piper: “Col. Wm. H. Watson’s body was brought into camp by Lieut. Taylor, assisted by privates Hyde and Simpson, who risked their lives under a heavy cannonade to rescue it from where it fell.”

The loss in our battalion during the battle is six killed and fifteen wounded, as follows: “Company A—Captain Stewart’s—Joseph Files, wounded in the left arm, since amputated; Albert Hart, color sergeant, wounded in right arm, since amputated; Robert Caples, in the abdomen; William Lee, in the groin; Malcolm Wilson, in the left arm; and Wm. Alexander, in the leg.”

Company F—Capt. Boyd’s—George A. Herring, son of Henry Herring, Esq., of Baltimore killed; Henry Clifford, wounded in the left arm; William Kelly, in the right foot, slightly; George Pearson, of Co. F, died on Monday morning, having been sick for 10 to 12 days.”

The Sun says—

“The above is evidently a full and authentic list of the killed and wounded, for which we are much indebted. It will be seen there is no reference made to Company C, commanded by Capt. Bronaugh, which was on camp duty during the battle.” [SCM]

NNR 71.160 November 7, 1846 Col. John Charles Fremont’s affair in California

Col. Fremont—A letter from Monterey on the Pacific to the editor of the Alexandria Gazette contains the annexed notice of our interesting young countryman; Lieut. Col. Fremont. The letter is dated July 20:

“Col. Fremont’s party arrived here yesterday, having had some pretty hard fighting with the Mexicans and Indians. They number about two hundred, and are the most daring and hardy set of fellows I ever looked upon. They are splendid marksmen, and can plant a bullet in an enemy’s head with their horses at a full gallop. They never think of eating bread, but live upon meat all the time. They never sleep in a house built on the ground, but a blanket around them, their saddle for a pillow, and a rifle by their side. I should like to give you some more minute account of them, but time will not admit.” [MJK]

The Tennessee Volunteers

Camp near Monterey, Mexico, September 25, 1846Dear Sir: I have not time, as the express leaves very shortly, to write you a letter, but only to let you know that an attack was made by Gen Taylor’s army on Monterey on the 21st, which succeeded in part by taking one fortress and portion of the town on that day; and on the 22d and 23d, two other forts fell into our hands, and on the 24th Gen. Ampudia sent in a white flag proposing terms. A conference was held yesterday which resulted in an armistice for eight weeks, and an agreement that the Mexican general should march off his whole army with their arms and six pieces of artillery. The stores to be given up to the Americans, and to-day at 10 o’clock, the main fortress is to be delivered up. For all this Tennessee has suffered most severely—my regiment went early into action on the morning of the 21st September, and was ordered to sustain some regulars who were said to be attacking a fort at one end of the city. When I arrived with them within point blank musket shot of the fort, no regulars were visible— they had filed to the right and taken shelter behind houses, and had got into the outskirts of town, so that my command was left exposed to the most severe discharge of artillery and musketry that was ever poured upon a line of volunteers— They bore the fire with wonderful courage, and were brought to charge in a few minutes, and rushed upon the fort and took it at the point of bayonet. It was most gallantly done. The Mississippi regiment sustained my regiment most gallantly in the charge, and came into the fight like valiant soldiers. We passed through the fort and into the town, but other well fortified places put a stop to our progress, and we had to keep up the fight from behind wallfences and houses all day.

The fort which we took has been in our possession ever since. Two other efforts were abandoned by the enemy on the 22d, and taken possession of by our men. On the morning of the 21st September, I marched to the attack on Monterey with my regiment, numbering 379, including officers, non commissioned officers and privates; and my loss during the

Taylor has not been ordered to advance on San Luis Potosi, &c., reconcile to his remaining for the present where he is, impression that a peace is about to be effected

For some weeks past the public have been from time to time apprized by publications in the official journal, as well as from other sources of the highest authority, that the war was to be prosecuted with ore vigor and means of, "conquering a peace" speedily. With this view it was, that the instant information was received of the conclusion of an armistice, order were forwarded by express from Washington to General Taylor to terminate at once, to push on with the army under his command. The States, it was said, were to be called upon for the residue of the 50, 000 volunteers. Mexico was to be invaded at some point nearer to the capital than that prescribed as the route from the Rio Grande. Tampico was to be attacked by the squadron-the most imposing front was to be assumed in every direction, and effective, striking demonstrations given to Mexico, that nothing but a speedy peace could save her national existence.

Suddenly, however, if any confidence is to be placed in letters from Washington, a very different course has been concluded upon. The "Union," without contradicting that orders to terminate the armistice and advance with the army beyond Monterey, now indicated that general Taylor has discretionary powers in the premises and appears reconciled to his so exercising that discretion as to remain for the present where he is. The department of War, in reply to a tender of volunteers from Delaware, officially announces that no more volunteers are to be ordered out at present. Preparations for another descent upon the coast of Mexico would seem at least to be differed for the present.

There are various conjectures as to the cause of this sudden change. Some attributed it to a renewed prospect of negotiating with Santa Anna or the approaching Congress of Mexico, since they have been beaten out of Monterey, and have lost California. Others think it impossible that remonstrance's at an attempt to conquer and dismember Mexico, may have arrived from some of the powers of Europe, since the rejection of offers to mediate a peace. Others attribute the change to the ascertained expense of the war and the financial difficulties already experienced by the treasurer in providing funds- and others again refer it to the result of recent elections and that probability that an opposition majority will be elected to the next house of representatives. Quite possibly all these conjectures may be erroneous. [MJK]

NNR 71.164-71.165 November 14, 1846 letter on the campaign against Mexico

The following extract is quoted by the Monterey correspondent of the New Orleans Picayune as containing the views of an officer of rank and experience in the army of invasion; and with this we conclude for the present:

There never was a notion so much mistaken as ours in regard to that of Mexico. I mean in respect to its military resources. The people are warlike, and have an abundant supply of munitions of war. Our battles with them improve them as soldiers. Our invasion is held by them in abhorrence. And has united all classes in determined resistance them as soldiers. The States, it was said, were to be called upon for the residue of the 50, 000 volunteers. Mexico was to be invaded at some point nearer to the capital than that prescribed as the route from the Rio Grande. Tampico was to be attacked by the squadron-the most imposing front was to be assumed in every direction, and effective,

Move where we will, the mountains and passes afford every facility to carry it on successfully and most disastrously for us. Our army, as now situated, can now be compared o the French in Spain, when Joseph was driven out.” [MJK]

NNR 71.165 November 14, 1846 brisk trade at Matamoras, order of Gen. Patterson concerning persons trading on the Rio Grande

The Rio Grande is now quite low but its navigation is still good-in fact, it is much easier as the current is not more than half as strong as when it overflowed the banks.

Merchants apprise us that the trade has been quite brisk for the last few days and continues to increase, Traders have been arriving from Monterey and neighborhood in considerable numbers, and they speak of many others on the way and preparing to come.—They purchase pretty freely.

In relation to the order issued by General Patterson, concerning persons trading on the Rio Grande, which was interpreted by many as being intended to prohibit the importation of goods, the Flag says General Patterson did not desire that it should be so understood and adds:

"The order was intended for the government of masters and steamboats in receiving and carrying freight and passengers, and to render more positive and concise the prohibition against receiving on board any spirituous liquors. As far up as this place, all legitimate freight can be brought without an order, but before sending it higher it is necessary to obtain the consent and an order to the effect from the commander at this post. The object in thus making it incumbent on persons in order to proceed higher up with goods, to obtain the consent of the commander or quartermaster here, is to prevent individuals from following the army, and hanging around military posts who have no specific business.” [MJK]

NNR 71.165 November 14, 1846 arrival of sappers and miners at Matamoras

The company of sappers and miners from New York, under command of Captain Swift of the topographical Engineers, arrived at Matamoras on the 23rd. [MJK]

NNR 71.165 November 14, 1846 Mexicans evacuate Saltillo

"ARMY OF OCCUPATION"

By the arrival of the steamship Galveston at New Orleans on the 2d instant, we have Galveston updates to the 30th ult. The news of that date says-

From Col. Davis we learn that the Mexicans have totally evacuated the whole country this side of San Luis Potosi. The information has been derived from so many sources that there is now no doubt of this fact. They left behind some forty dragoons to destroy fortifications that had been constructed at Los Muertos, a naturally strong and difficult pass on the road to Saltillo, and about five or six miles beyond the Rinconada. They have also dismantled Saltillo, destroying whatever might be of use to our army, and which they could not take away. Thus there is nothing left for General Taylor to conquer, but a barren region of rugged mountains and thirsty plains, affording neither water nor provisions for the sustenance for man or beast, over a distance of two or three hundred miles, to San Luis Potosi.[MJK]

NNR 71.165 November 14, 1846 Gen. Zachary Taylor ordered to advance on San Luis, difficulty doing so

If, as has been said, General Taylor has orders to march upon San Luis Potosi, so as to reach that city by the end of November, the question arises how he is to traverse such a country as he will have to do, by a forced march at the rate of 15 or 20 miles per day?

The only water on this route is in the Mexican tanks, which will doubtless be all broken up as the enemy retires. To carry water sufficient to save his army and teams from suffering would probably require more horses, mules and oxen that are now in the army, all of which are required for the transportation of the necessary stores and munitions. In making this retreat the enemy has doubtless adopted a wise policy, leaving behind them a far more formidable enemy for Gen. Taylor to encounter, (viz: this march) than he could ever find in their own arms and fortified towns.

This policy has doubtless been dictated by the sagacity of Santa Anna. It is stated on good authority that he sent orders to Ampudia to evacuate Monterey and all other places this side of the mountains, but that those orders were not received till after the battle.

After leaving the troops necessary to garrison Monterey, Saltillo and other town, Gen. Taylor will only have an army of about 5000 men with which to penetrate into the heart of the enemy’s country, and far beyond the reach of any reserve upon which he might fall back in support, in case of necessity.- Such, we believe, is an account of the present position and prospect of our army, as derived from good authority. Gen. Ampudia has been superceded in command, but the name of his successor is not remembered.[MJK]

NNR 71.165 November 7, 1846 correspondence between Gen. Zachary Taylor and Gen. Francisco P. de Morales respecting conduct of volunteers; Correspondence relative to supplies of provisions

The Matamoros paper, the American Flag, of the 24th ult., says:

Although several persons have called at our office within the last two days, direct from Monterey and intermediate posts, yet not one word of news do they bring not before published, except that preparations for future hostile operations on our side are rapidly progressing. By the time the armistice shall have expired, everything will have completed to ensure success in future engagements or movements.—Of the doings of the Mexicans we can learn nothing accurate. If any belief could be attached to the to the trading parties of Mexicans coming here from Monterey and vicinity, all their troops have been withdrawn from Saltillo and are concentrating at San Luis Potosi, where Santa Anna is stated to arrived. A Mexican who arrived in town yesterday, states that there is no preparations making at the pass of Rinconada to dispute the passage of our army to Saltillo, and that Saltillo will not be defended. It is but fair to presume that he knows no more in regard to the intentions of the Mexican Generals, than we do to the intentions of our own Generals. It would take more than his assurance to make us believe that the passes through the mountains will be left undefended.

Every thing has remained quiet and peaceable since the battle, both at Monterey and on the road. The trains were going up without molestation. The full extent of the American loss in killed and wounded was 480. The climate favors the healing of the wounds, and many are recovering. The general health of the troops is good. Preparations are going forward actively for a renewal of hostilities after the expiration of the armistice- no belief was entertained in Monterey that the Mexicans designed to break it. If they did, General Taylor was prepared for them.

The flag contains a translation of a correspondence which took place after the capitulation of Monterey between General Taylor and Governor Morales, in regard to certain charges made by the latter against the volunteers quartered in the city, of having murdered several Mexicans, and being generally disorderly in their conduct; and also concerning the furnishing of supplies for the American army.—After the capitulation, General Taylor had a conversation with Morales on the last mentioned subject, and subsequently Col. Whiting, Quartermaster General addressed the following to the Governor:-

"General Taylor orders me to address your Excellency upon various subjects in reference to the conversation had with you the other morning when visiting his camp.

He desires, in particular, that you will order the inhabitants of this province to furnish mules for burden between this place and Camargo. Though we have a good number now employed, yet many more are needed.

He also charges me particularly to say to your Excellency, that you will request or command the inhabitants to bring in their corn and deposit the same to a considerable amount in the city. It is necessary that this corn should be brought in, and it must be, by your Excellency’s order of by force. If procured by the first means, it will be paid for at the same price the Mexican government allowed; if by second the owners may look to their own government for redress.

You will please to inform me officially; (we wish a speedy reply,) what the current prices of transporting each mule load from Camargo to this city, and the prices which the Mexican government have been paying for corn at this season.”

To this note of Col. Whiting, Governor Morales replies as follows.

"Since this government had the pleasure of conferring with Gen. Taylor upon various subjects of importance, they have taken due measures to accomplish your desires, relative to the accumulation of corn and removal of effects from Camargo belonging to the American army. I have to inform you that corn will be furnished, (as much as can be gathered) at five dollars per mule load, and also mules for burden, as soon as they arrive from the interior, where they have been sent on business, but ordered to return forthwith—with the understanding that the current prices for freight from this city to Cervalo is two dollars and fifty cents per mule load-to Camargo five dollars- to Cadereita one dollar and fifty cents- the same to the estates of Dolores and Conception, which are below Cadereita.

Such being the case you will signify the same to General Taylor, adding at the same time that it will not be necessary to use force in procuring the object indicated, for there is no lack of desire to serve.

With this motive I offer you my consideration and esteem. God and Liberty.
Monterey, Sept. 30th, 1846.

Francisco P. Morales

Col. Whiting consented to receiving the supplies on these terms. The flag says the prices are double those paid by the Mexican government.

The following is what Governor Morales says in relation to the volunteers, in a note dated the 29th of September:

"Multitudes of complaints have been made to this Government against excesses committed upon persons and property against Mexicans daily by the volunteers, in the service of the United States, and I am this moment informed that three of our citizens have been killed by them, without pity or any reasonable motive. Only because they possess the power to do so. Under such circumstances, it is impossible that society can remain in much security, as the most essential guarantees are wanting. I have the honor of making this known to your Excellency, hoping that measures will be adopted to put an end to such atrocities in the future, and to carry into the effect the assurances given to the protection of the people.

Repeating my esteem and consideration for your Excellency, I am, &c. &c.

"On the 1st of October, General Taylor wrote in reply:

"The communication of your Excellency, dated 29th ult., relative to excessive committed by volunteers in Monterey, was duly delivered. Some delay has occurred in answering it, in order that I might communicate with the commandant of that post.

It is with sentiments of regret I learn your just cause of complaint, founded upon the grounds stated by your Excellency. Your Excellency must be aware that it is no easy task to keep such men in subjection, and although my great desire is to maintain good order, yet excesses have been committed, but I believe, none of grave character.

The volunteers now in the city, will be removed in a few days, and by their absence, I hope all cause of further complaints will cease. In the meantime, Brig. Gen. Worth will use all efficacious measures to maintain order in the city. He is now invested with orders to this effect. Your Excellency must be aware that my desire is to comply with the guarantees I have given, in the name of my government, relative to the security of persons and property."

In order to arrive with a better understanding with General Taylor, while his correspondence was going on, Morales, understanding that General Taylor had a knowledge of the French language, requested that correspondence be carried on in that language. The old hero, however, determined to stick to the vernacular, and at the conclusion of the last of the above notes, he says:-

"I take the liberty, at the same time, to add, that your Excellency has been misinformed in regard to my possessing a knowledge of the French idiom, and in consequence, you will please hereafter, as heretofore, receive my communications in English."[MJK]

NNR 71.165-71.166 November 14, 1846 express mail with dispatches taken by Mexicans

ORRESPONDENCE OF THE N. O. PICAYUNE.
Monterey, Mexico, Oct. 12, 1846

GENTLEMEN: We have received new from New Orleans up to the 25 ult. It seems that there is no probability of peace being established for some time to come. Lieut. Armistead, of the 6th infantry, has just arrived from Washington with dispatches for Gen. Taylor, but the instructions sent him are not known in the army.

A mail which was sent from Camargo by a Mexican express rider for the army, about the 21st ult., and which, it is believed, contained important dispatches for Gen. Taylor, besides many private letters was taken by the enemy and conveyed to Ampudia, who received it on the day of the capitulation. Whether the Mexican mail rider was killed, as is pretended, or carried the mail of his own accord to Ampudia, is not known; but certain is it that the mail is in the possession of the enemy. After the Mexican army had retired to Saltillo, Gen. Taylor, hearing the loss of the mail, sent a messenger to Ampudia and requested him to return the private correspondence. The self-appointed postmaster of our army replied, through a Mr. Faullac, that a mail had been taken and received by him, but that he had forwarded the bag to Santa Anna! Mr. Faullac, however, hoped soon to have the pleasure either of sending back the private correspondence or bringing it in person. This accounts for the many persons in the army not receiving intelligence from home when they knew it was due. For instance, I have not received a letter from my family of a later date than six weeks ago. It is hoped that to Ampudia and all his officers and wives and concubines and Santa Anna shall have read these letters, they will be returned to us. The ladies who have husbands or lovers in the army will have the satisfaction of knowing that their letters have been read by the illustrious Ampudia. It is hoped that our wives have written us very becoming letters, and that they have been mum on family secrets.—Happily for their feelings of delicacy on this subject, however, neither Mexican men or women can understand or appreciate the devotion which has been breathed forth in their letters to those who are dear to them here. I know that I have at least a half a dozen letters in that mail, none of which will assist the Mexican government in the least in the war with us. I would write to Pedro de Ampudia and ask him to do me the special favor to return them to me, only this, “corresponding with the enemy” is a shooting affair. You may ask how the mail be entrusted to a Mexican, or to one man, to be carried a distance of one hundred and eighty miles through a country filled with rancheros, and particularly at a time when General Taylor was anxiously expecting instructions from Washington. I will answer this, if not to your satisfaction, at least to the best of my knowledge and understanding. The economical quarter master at Camargo was enabled to hire the Mexican to run the gauntlet for fifteen dollars, where as if any escort had been sent up with it, the expense would have amounted to, just nothing at all. No American citizen could be hired to take the mail through alone for $100, but it should be obvious to any one that it is very important to risk a mail with such a chance.

71.166 November 14, 1846 Texas volunteers disbanded at Monterey, their return to Texas

The first part of this statement is not to be relied on. There were no such accounts at Monterey on the 17th instant. There is no such place as Labradores near Monterey, unless it be a small rancho—Governor Liano, it is known, was not there, because his whereabouts had been ascertained a few days before. Salinas is much further than San Luis Potosí than Monterey and that part of the story is but the extension of the report current at the latter place ten days before the time mentioned. As to the killing of the Texans at Lampasos, it is not improbable. The troops from that state were disbanded at Monterey, and a number set off on the road to Salinas, Lampasos, &c., to Loredo on the Rio Grande. They were without provisions for themselves, or food for their horses, a certain sum being allowed for each day’s expenses. Their organizations were broken up, and they went off in parties, many without other arms but pistols and knives. It is very probable they levied contributions on the people, and they got into difficulty. At first, all the public arms were taken away, and it was not until General Henderson sent Colonel Hays to General Taylor, that the arms were restored to be delivered up to Bexar, in Texas. Many men would not go to get them.

NNR 71.166 November 14, 1846 General John Ellis Wool crosses Rio Grande en Route for Monclava

CORRESPONDENCE OF THE NEW ORLEANS PICAYUNE

Monterey, Mexico, Oct. 16, 1846

A chance offers to send a line, which I must write in haste, as the gentleman who takes it will be off in a few moments. Gen. Wool crossed the Rio Grande thirteen days ago on his way to Monclava. A train of fifteen hundred mules arrived from Camargo a day or two since, with provisions. Two thousand mules have been hired at this place for the use of the army at 37 ½ cents per day each.

Lieut. Graham’s remains were followed to the grave three day’s since, by Gen. Taylor and nearly all the officers.

No news yet from the first mail that was captured by the enemy. Another large mail started from Camargo a few days ago (the 5th Inst.) which shared the fate of the first. This makes two important mails that have been captured from us within a month.—The last was taken out of the mule train.

NNR 71.166 November 14, 1846 Major Lear expected to recover from his horrible wound

The wounded are doing well, better than what was at first anticipated. Major Lear who was so horribly wounded through the mouth, the ball coming out at the back of the neck, shattering the jawbone and palate, will, it is hoped, recover. His son, a young gentleman o twenty, is fortunately with him.

71.166 November 14, 1846 death of Lt. Richard H Graham

Lieut. H Graham, of the 4th infantry, died of his wounds last night.

NNR 71.166 November 14, 1846 Gen. William Orlando Butler recovering from wound

General Butler, who was shot through the leg, is recovering fast, and begins to attempt, in his impatience to be on his legs again, to hobble about the floor.

General Taylor keeps his own counsel respecting the nature of the instructions received from Washington. The Washington letter writers probably know more about the it than a majority of the officers under General Taylor at the moment. Something is brewing, however, and I can see that some movement is soon to be made, though none has yet been ordered. [MJK]

NNR 71.166 November 14, 1846 Letter reporting that the Mexicans had evacuated Saltillo to stand at San Luis Potosi

The following letter from the Commercial Times, states, as a fact, that the Mexicans had evacuated Saltillo, and intended to make their stand, if they stood again, at San Luis Potosi:

Camargo, Mexico, Oct.22, 1846

Gentlemen: In my last letter I intimated you that the evening was very quiet about Monterey, and the indications were in favor of a continuance of the calm until the terms of capitulation, or the return of Capt. Eaton, the aid of Gen. Taylor, from Washington city. Up to the time of my departure on the 16th, nothing indicated any change in the state of things. The discharge of the Texas troops and their departure caused the town to be more tranquil than ever. Not many of the Mexicans had returned to the place, as they are yet afraid; but that will not continue much longer.

Before my departure, the account of the departure of General Ampudia from Saltillo with the army was fully confirmed. He proposed to fortify that town and make another stand: therefore he called on the citizens to assist him. They held a meeting, and the answer to his call was, Monterey was a town naturally easier of defense than Saltillo, that it was well fortified, and he had been driven out of it, therefore they would not expose their families and property to certain injury and danger.—The general then left, taking the road towards San Luis Potosi. [MJK]

NNR 71.166 November 14, 1846 Gen. Pedro Ampudia and the authorities of Saltillo, his official announcement of the surrender of Monterey

MEXICO.

The Washington Union states that dispatched have been received from the U.S. squadron off Vera Cruz. Before the battle of Monterey, Ampudia boasted that the American army should be defeated, and that not one of our troops would be left to taste the waters of the Rio Grande. And since the Mexicans were driven from Monterey, they are misrepresenting everything-making our loss to be 1500-and some say near 3000-and stating that they left behind them only about 6 pieces of artillery, not fit for use. Private letters from Vera Cruz, however, appreciate the depth of the blow they have sustained-Monterey being considered one of the strongest places in the world. A few numbers of the Locomotor of Vera Cruz, to the 8th of October, inclusive, have been received at the Navy Department. The intelligence of the capture of Monterey is copied from other papers, with few comments.

OFFICIAL DESPATCH OF GENERAL AMPUDIA TO THE MEXICAN SECRETARY OF WAR, ANNOUNCING THE SURRENDER OF MONTEREY:

Most Excellent Sir:

After a brilliant defense, in the course of which the enemy was repulsed, with the loss of fifteen hundred men, from various posts, he succeeded in possessing himself of the heights commanding the Bishop’s palace, and another to the south of it, and likewise a detached breastwork, called the Teneria, and continuing his attacks through the houses, which he pierced in a direction towards the center of the city, he succeeded in posting himself within a half gun-shot of the principal square, where the troops were posted, who suffered much from the hollow shot.

Under these circumstances, I was requested by various principal officers to come to such terms that would diminish our losses: for to open our way with the bayonet, surrounded as we were by entrenched enemies, would have resulted in the dispersal of the troops, and nothing of the material would have been saved. These considerations having been weighed by me, I also took into view what the city suffered, and would suffer, from the attacks by the piercing of the houses, as well as the destruction by the bombs; the scarcity of ammunition, which was beginning to be felt; the provisions which we were losing, as the enemies lines approached the center; the distance from our supplies, and finally that to protract this state of things for two or three days, even if it were possible to do so, could not end in a triumph, and I consented to open propositions, which resulted in the annexed terms of capitulation.

Your excellency will perceive that the preserve the honor of the nation and that of the army; and it is to be observed that, if they do not grant us as much as was perhaps expected, that of itself proves the superiority of the enemy, not in valor, which he displayed in most of the combats but in his position within the squares of pierced masonry, which surrounded the square and cut off any supplies of provisions, wood, or other articles necessary to subsistence.

With the greatest regret, the army withdraws from their capital, abundantly watered with its blood, leaving under the guarantee of the promises of the American generals the severely wounded and the neighboring population of the state, whose civil authorities will continue in the exercise of their functions. Tomorrow I shall continue my march to Saltillo, where I will await the orders of the supreme government. And in communicating this to you, I have the honor of reiterating the assurances of my highest respect.

NNR 71.166 Gen. Jose Mariano de Salas’ announcement of the loss of Monterey, and calling on Mexicans to rally

PROCLAMATION OF GENERAL SALAS, THE ACTING PRESIDENT, TO THE PEOPLE OF MEXICO, ANNOUNCING THE LOSS OF MONTEREY:

Mexicans! A government established against the will of the nation is interested in concealing from it events which are disastrous to it; above all, when the responsibility of their occurrences must fall upon the government. A government whose sentiments and interest are no other than those of the nation, and which has emanated from the movement by which it threw off its oppressors, has no need to conceal anything from it, for the nation itself must combat for its preservation and for its honor.

Mexicans! Monterey has fallen. It was not enough to defy death, as our valiant fellow-countrymen did for four days; it was necessary to do more, to defy want in every shape, and the insufficiency of means of resistance. The intention of the enemy to occupy the whole republic is manifest; but the government is determined to triumph or parish with the republic. Partial disasters are of no importance; the Spanish nation suffered much more in the space of six years, and the results of her heroic efforts, and the co-operation of all her sons, was that the bones of a half million unjust invaders whiten the fields of the peninsula. Shall we become unworthy of independence, by not showing ourselves sons worth y of out fathers? The independence was achieved by us alone, only after ten years of constancy; and it is not possible that an organized nation should show less strength than its oppressed sons, such as our first leaders were.

Mexicans! The time to act has come. Will you suffer your population to be decimated, sending it to perish by the handfuls on the frontier, one to-day, another to-morrow, and to perish less by the enemies' balls then by neglect? The government will exert all its power in the defence of its rights; but it has a right to expect that the indifference or inactive contemplation shall not be the recompense of its plan of operation; for the nation will prefer that not one stone will be left on another, rather than behold its sovereignty, its right and its temples trampled under foot. The invincible general called by it to place himself at the head of the troops is resolved not to survive the dishonors of the country.

Will it be less so? No. Our blood and our property will be the sacrifice that we offer up; and when you are in the full enjoyment of the rights which you claimed, I do not doubt of your co-operation, and with it we will snatch from fortune a complete victory, which in the end will ensure to us existence and honor.

JOSE MARIANO DE SALAS

NNR 71.167-71.168 November 14, 1846 Maj. Luther Giddings’ account of Monterey and its capture

No mention is made in those papers of Santa Anna. Except that he has been ill with a severe constipation, from which he had recovered; and that, after he learned of the capture of Monterey, he wrote several letters to his friends reminding them of his advice to the government to withdraw the troops from Monterey.

It is mentions in one of the papers, as some indication of public spirit, that the dealers in pulque (a kind of beer) in the city of Mexico, had requested the government to double the tax on that article, which would yield in an increase in revenue, in the capital, of a thousand dollars a day.

The most exaggerated statements are made of the loss sustained by our troops at Monterey, one account estimating it to be three thousand.

LETTER FROM MAJOR GIDDINGS.

We publish to-day a long and interesting letter from Major Giddings, giving the most intelligible description we have yet seen, of the city of Monterey, its topography, its defences, and fortifications, the storming the place and its capitulation. Lieut. Egry resigned a few days after the battle, and reached home last night in good health, but most heartily sick of the war! He pronounces it a humbug, alike in its origin, design, and conduct. Gen. Taylor, in his opinion, is really a great man, but in danger of being sacrificed by the feeble and inefficient conduct of the government at
We have a private letter from an officer of the 1st Ohio regiment, which speaks highly of the coolness and gallantry of Lieut. Egry. The Lieutenant gives a good report of the conduct of the Dayton companies—who stood for hours together exposed to the enemy’s fire, suffering a loss in killed equal to all the other companies of the regiment. But not a man faltered or blenched at the death-shot that rained thick and fast around and among them. Maj. Giddings was much exposed during the action, and won “golden opinions” from men and officers by his cool courage and self possession throughout.

Colonel Mitchell being badly wounded, and Lieut. Col. Weller being sick of a fever, Major Giddings has the principal command of the 1st regiment, and will be promoted to the colonelcy, in case of Mitchell’s resignation. [Dayton Jour.

Camp near Monterey, Mexico,
Thursday, Oct. 1, 1845.

Messrs. Comly-Gentlemen: In my last letter from Comargo, I informed you that our army was about moving upon Monterey, at which place we expected to meet the Mexican forces. We left Comargo on Sunday, Sept. 6. halted three days at Seralvo, and encamped before the walls of Monterey on Saturday, 19th Sept. The first days of the march were void of interest; the road passing through a wilderness of thorns, broken up in places by immense chasms, hundreds of feet deep. In these ravines alone, often mile apart, the heated and toil-worn soldiers found water offensive to every sense. At Mier, the town so celebrated in the History of Texas border warfare—we caught the first glimpse of the distant mountains, and the following day, encamped on a pure, transparent mountain stream, called the Arroya Mier, the murmuring of whose waters made every heart bound with delight. As we approached the mountains the country improved, and our camps were usually upon the banks of pleasant streams and amid groves of olive trees, whose branches were loaded with both flowers and fruit. The whole of the vast region between the gulf and the mountains, seems to be thinly populated. On some days of the march we did not pass a rancho or see a ranchero, (farmer,) the only visible traces of man and his religion, being the cross, which was erected upon almost every hill, and in every valley. Upon many of these holy emblems were inscriptions in Spanish, requesting the prayers of the clergy for him who died or was murdered there.

At Marin—two days’ march from Monterey—our army was concentrated, it having hitherto marched by divisions. Here several handbills, printed in English, were scattered through the camp, signed Pedro de Ampudia, inviting us all to desert, and accept places in the Mexican army, or a free passport to the interior. Our men, after reading the extra, concluded to visit Gen. Ampudia in a body, and accordingly we marched the next day to San Francisco, a small village about 10 miles from Monterey, and which all those through which we had previously passed, was deserted by all its inhabitants, who were not too poor to move away.

The following day (Saturday, Sept. 19th) was the last march which many of our brave men performed. Our regiment was on the rear upon that day, and ere we had fairly left San Francisco, we heard the report of heavy artillery in the direction of Monterey. Supposing that the advance guard was engaged with the enemy the shout was—“Quick time! Forward!” and for six miles the men ran, quickening the pace at every report, until we met a dragoon going to the rear, who informed us that the firing was from the town upon the mounted Texans, who had ventured within range of the enemy’s guns. The American army of invasion, about 6,000 strong-horse, foot, and artillery—encamped that morning in a beautiful grove of live oaks, about 3 miles from the city; a more suitable spot for a picnic could not be found in the vicinity of our own Dayton. I am informed that this camp ground of the invaders (and from which I now write) is a place much resorted to by the elite of Monterey.

The afternoon of the day of our arrival, and morning of the day of the following, were spent by our engineers in the reconnoitering of the defences of the city, which they reported to be splendidly fortified. Almost everyone seemed to be disappointed in the strength of the place.

In order that you may better understand the character of the conflict, which I shall presently attempt to describe, and appreciate the indomitable courage and resolution of our little army, as displayed in the “storming of Monterey,” it is proper that you should first learn of the position of the parties at issue.

Monterey contains about 15,000 inhabitants, and is situated at the base of a lofty range of rugged mountains, called the Sierra Madre. A branch of San Juan River divides the city in unequal parts, the larger and better proportion being between the river and the base of the mountain. A gently ascending slope, covered in places with chaparral—there and there a field of corn or sugar cane, spreads itself before the town. The road by which our army approached, descends over this plain into the center of the city. Standing upon the elevated grounds, midway between our camp and town, but little of the latter can be seen. It is embowered in trees—a spire or white wall being, in some places, all that is visible through their branches.

In front of the city, and about one fourth of a mile out, upon the plain, stands, solitary and alone, an immense fort, covering 3 or 4 acres of ground. It is built of solid masonry, with bastions, ditches, &c.—and is one of those strong holds which, in the opinion of our military engineers, can only be taken by what they call regular approaches. This fort is pierced for 32 guns, and commands every avenue to the city, over the plain upon the east. It throws both shots and shells from its walls; and it was this fort (named afterwards by our boys—“The Old Colored Gentleman”—from its dingy appearance) that fired upon our advanced division on the day of our arrival.
in the rear, or west of the city, rises, ridge after ridge, and peak after peak, the lofty Sierra Madre. On the north of the city is a deep gorge in the mountains, through which is the road to Saltillo and Mexico. This pass and the approaches to Monterey upon the side, are defended by a series of batteries placed upon peaks jutting out of the sides of the great Sierra, and by a strong and elevated fortress, located about halfway between the pass and the town—known as "the Bishop's palace." It was through this pass alone, that the Mexican army could receive reinforcements or retreat with safety. The city was protected on the south, by a chain of small forts, (six I think the number,) extending from the foot of the mountain out to the plain.

In addition to these immense exterior defenses, almost every street and square of the city was barricaded, and raked by field pieces, and every house (being built in the old Mexican style, with thick walls and stone roofs) was a fortress. These fortifications of Monterey (the position and strength of which we learned by cruel experience) were occupied by at least 10,000 regular Mexican troops, and defended by forty or fifty pieces of heavy artillery. It will thus be seen that Monterey is one of the strongest places on the continent.

When it is recollected that the assailants of such places should (other things being equal) be much more numerous than the besieged, you will perceive how great was the work to be achieved by our arms. Indeed the Mexicans had the advantage in everything but the character of our troops. The Anglo-Saxon race cannot be beaten by any other on the face of the earth. The Mexicans having felt the power of our arms at Palo Alto and Reseca, had wisely retreated to one of their strongholds in the interior, knowing well that if we should be unsuccessful there, our army would be utterly destroyed: for had we failed it would have been impossible for us to retreat though the wilderness without provisions:-the first step backwards, would be our ruin. Every ranchero between the mountains and the coast would have been encouraged to take up arms in defence of his bleeding country, and assist in driving back the bold invaders.

Such was the position of affairs on the 19th of September. We all felt that our safety could only be secured, by wresting Monterey from the Mexicans; and as our army was provided with a siege train, or heavy artillery for battering, the city was to be won by downright fighting and good luck;—the place must be carried by storm, and that too without delay, as every hour strengthened the Mexicans and weakened us.

Accordingly on Sunday, the 20th of September, Gen'l Worth with his division 2,000 strong and the flower of the army, marched out of camp to secure possessions of the Saltillo pass and the heights on the north of the town. In order to attract attention from Worth's movements, General Hamer's brigade made a feint upon the town, which was, however, observed by the Mexicans, and the next morning the division was marched halfway down to the city and formed in line of battle behind the crest of the hill, which as before remarked slopes down to the walls of the town;—the regulars on the left an volunteers on the right. A mortar (the only one with our army) had been planted here the night previous, and was engaged in sending bombs against the huge fort that communicated with the approach to the city from our side, the east. They fell short, however, whilst the guns of "the old colored gentleman" were throwing round shot clear over our heads, and almost into our camp. Duncan's battery having accompanied Worth's division, our three remaining batteries of field pieces (Bragg's, Ridgely's and Webster's) took up position to engage the Mexican forts upon the south of the town.

The battle commenced with a brisk cannonading on both sides, in which the enemy had much the advantage—our guns not being large enough to be effective in battering; their men were also concealed behind stone walls, whilst our men were in the open, and the Mexicano's were in the exercise of artillery and indeed the battle was fought on their side mainly with that strong arm of war. For about one hour, our division remained in line, anxiously watching a scene so novel to volunteers, their hearts beating with wild enthusiasm, as they beheld the great superiority of the Mexican artillery. Yes-tell it not at West Point, publish it not in the streets of Washington—the volunteers demanded to be led where veteran troops have often quailed—to the cannon's mouth. In the meantime, the first division of regulars had moved off from our left and became engaged with the defenders of the chain of forts on the south of the city. They drove in a body of Mexican infantry, and in the heat of the pursuit were drawn in between two batteries which poured down upon them a shower of grape and canister, making sad havoc in their ranks, and cutting down thus early in the action, several of the most gallant officers in the service. At this juncture, our division was put in motion. Gen. Quitman's Brigade, composed of the Tennessee and Mississippi regiments, hastened to the left to support the first division of the regulars. One regiment of Gen. Hamer's brigade, the Louisville Legion, being left to guard the mortar on the hill, either fortunately or unfortunately, did not get into action at all; whilst the other (1st Ohio regiment) faced to the left flank, and with a loud huzza, rushed down alone upon the center of the town to support Bragg's battery, which had already been weakened by the loss of seventeen horses, and being in that quarter of the suburbs, was in danger of being captured. For at least a mile, our regiment advanced under fire of the guns of "the old colored gentleman," and entered the suburbs of the city, only to find itself raked on all sides, by batteries of whose location we were ignorant, and escopette balls from the tops of the houses, whose occupants were perfectly safe, as we could neither burn nor batter down their stout walls. But notwithstanding the discouraging and disagreeable position (that of being fired at by an unseen enemy) in which our regiment found itself, the men grouped their way on cheering at every volley that descended upon them. On we scrambled through the gardens and yards, until we finally reached a ditch and stone wall a few feet beyond and parallel to it, behind which we saw for the first time, some of the black rascals loading and firing off old rusty muskets at us. This party rapidly retreated with some loss to a battery that was about a hundred
At this period the scene must have been “grand and gloomy;” it was certainly very peculiar. Gen’l Worth’s division was engaged in contending for the heights on the north of the city; the first division of regulars with the Tennessee and Mississippi volunteers were storming the forts upon the south side, whilst our little regiment (we took about 400 men into action) stood alone in the center, clouds of dense smoke rolled over and through the streets of the town, through which might be seen the flashes of the musketry, and the redder flames of the deep-toned artillery. In the meantime our people had succeeded in carrying two of the forts upon the left and the Mexicans retreating from that quarter, came up to the support of their center, and bringing around with them a field piece, commenced a raking fire upon our flank. Our regiment having secured the object of its attack, viz: the safety of captain Bragg’s battery, was ordered to retire. Our forces having gained a foothold on both ends of the city, the battle was from that time continued by us from those quarters alone.

Our companies having become very much scattered by this species of Indian fighting in the suburbs, and the order to retire not being generally known, the regiment presented a very ragged and unmilitary front when it emerged upon the plain; so much so, as to embolden a squadron of lancers to charge it. — They it seems were concealed behind the large fort which continued to send us in quick succession its ugly and unmusical iron messengers. It being impossible to form a square in time to resist this charge as officers had lost their companies and men their officers and the stragglers of other regiments both regulars and volunteers having joined our ranks, our broken column was hastily formed in line, behind a brush fence which happened as a Paddy remarked— “to be very convenient.”

On came the lancers dashing over the plain, spearing as they passed at full gallop, the wounded Americans who had been struck down by their deadly artillery, and were strewed like leaved over the field. Had it not been for this dastardly conduct, I could have almost of imagined that the days of Spanish chivalry were revived, so much did these murderers with their lances and pennants and flowing parti-colored blankets, resemble the knights of olden times. A single volley from our line emptied several saddles, and put them to flight. The remainder of the afternoon our regiments remained in position, supporting the battery of Bragg. Bragg, a target for the enemy’s artillery without being able to fire a musket in return.

After hard days work, the settling sun saw us in possession of two of the forts upon the south side of the town, whilst during the day Gen. Worth had won all the heights and batteries on the north, except the Bishop’s palace. At dark we returned to camp, weary and hungry, to prepare for battle the next morning. Our men had not eaten anything since daylight, and many of them were so exhausted as scarcely to be able to drag themselves from the field. As it was many of the companies came home only to sleep in the mud, without blankets or tents, the treacherous muleteers having lost their baggage somewhere upon the march. The result of that day’s conflict was very unsatisfactory to our regiment. It had been dreadfully exposed to the enemy fire, without being able to return it.

The evening breeze swept up the mountain side—the clouds of smoke that hung over that beautiful city, and the silence which followed the darkness was almost as appalling as the thunders that heralded the morning. That night was a gloomy one in our camp. How great was the contrast between the evening before and then after the battle! The surgeons were busy amputating limbs, extracting balls, dressing wounds; and all who had walked unmoved through the carnage of the field, then found time to weep for the groaning sufferers. The loss of our regiment was 15 killed and 39 wounded. Of the number killed, the company known in Dayton as the “Dayton Riflemen,” lost 5—being one third of the whole number killed in the regiment. Lieutenants Motter and M’Carter, of that company, were also wounded—but I am happy to inform their friends, they are fast recovering. In Capt. Hormell’s company there were three killed.

At daylight, on Tuesday morning, the battle was renewed by the occupants of the forts and batteries won on Monday. Early in the day, another fort and some squares of the southern end of the town were wrested from the Mexicans, who fought with desperation over their hearth stones, and being acquainted with all the streets and the alleys of the city, had always much the advantage in position. For 12 hours more our men sustained most gallantly this unequal contest, calling upon the “yellow villains” to come out from their stone walls, and give us a fair and decent fight.

General Worth having been taken in succession all the batteries of the enemy, on the northern side of the city, and secured the Saltillo road, was seen in the afternoon to advance upon the Bishop’s palace or castle, which fortress was all that remained to the Mexicans in that quarter. It was gratifying to see how quickly this strong hold was taken. I have not yet learned the manner in which it was won, but to us who were looking on from the other side of the town, it appeared as if the Mexicans made a sortie, either to drive back our men, or to effect their own escape; but being met almost at the threshold by Worth’s column, were forced back, and Mexicans and Americans entered pell-mell into the castle over the battlement of which soon floated the American flag.

Thus the evening of the third day saw us in possession of all the strong holds of the enemy, on both sides of the city. The “old colored gentlemen,” in front of, and the many interior defences of the town, yet remained to be taken.

On Wednesday morning, Sept. 23d, Gen. Hamer’s brigade marched down to relieve the brigade of Gen. Quitman, which had been holding the position won from the Mexicans on the south side. The battle raged with great fury during the most of this— the third day. The Texan Rangers, having dismounted, entered the extremities of the city, now in our possession, and with their axes and rifles cut and fought their way from house to house, shooting, with unerring aim, every Mexican who ventured from their cover. One of them told me that in one room he found 11 Mexicans, all shot through the head.

The Mexicans were thus driven by inches toward the center of the city. In the afternoon of that day Gen. Worth's division descended from the Bishop's castle upon the town. In a few moments after, Duncan's artillery was heard thundering in the streets of that quarter, advancing half a square at every discharge, driving the Mexicans towards their church and into the large plaza, which they had barricaded for a final and desperate resistance.

During that day there occurred a few intervals of deathlike silence, in which some exhausted men sunk down and slept, whilst other untiring, reckless fellows, between their work, sang in concert popular negro melodies.

Thus for three days the work of death had progressed in and around the beautiful city, whose groves of orange and pomegranate were stained with the blood of contending mortals. That (Wednesday) night, our regiment slept, or rather watched in the forts. The air was tainted by the dead bodies, that were scattered over the plain and in the streets and which were stripped in the darkness by the prowling rancheros.

Early on Thursday morning and before it was light enough to renew the attack, a white flag was borne out to our fort, and a proposition to surrender sent to General Taylor in camp. You will have learned ere this; the terms of the capitulation. I scarcely know what to say of them. It was important that we should get possession of Monterey upon any terms, but it is now certain that after another day we could have got it upon our own terms, and made prisoners of war of Gen. Ampudia and his army. We had him in what is often termed a "tight place." The rangers, (of whom I should like to write more,) were much incensed at the capitulation; for as they said, "they had just gotten possession of all the high houses," and could have slaughtered the Mexicans ad libitum.

It is to be hoped that these terms were not given to Ampudia in pursuit of the wretched policy of conciliation. If our government wishes to conciliate Mexico, our cause is a bad one. If its object is conquest, then have the volunteers been much deceived. They came here to punish Mexico in the most summary manner, for her aggressions and wrongs committed upon our people, and not by pursuing this sneaking policy of conciliation-this unpleasant mixture of war and peace, to plunder her of her territory. It is true we have got possession of thirty or forty pieces of artillery, some tons of ammunition, and a lot of good Spanish cigars, which our idle soldiers are now smoking, but they have cost us in killed and wounded about 500 brave men. The Mexican army and most of the citizens have left Monterey, whose streets are almost as silent and deserted as are ours at midnight. Our army is still in camp-the wounded alone being removed to the city.

Whilst the days are still exceedingly hot, the night have been exceedingly cold in this climate, and there is much suffering among many of our men who are without tents and blankets. Indeed there are but few of them who would not be pleased to return home, as they have seen quite enough of the elephant. I have neither the time nor inclination to describe any of the scenes of the battle field, -besides my letter as already grown to a tedious length. It would however afford me pleasure to give you some account of a tour which a fellow Daytonian, (Mr. Mc*) and myself made through Monterey on yesterday.—to tell you of the magnificence of the church, the beauty of the paintings, (to obtain one of which, I would willingly serve Uncle Sam a year,) and the splendor of Arista's bath and palace gardens.

It is reported here to-day that Gen. Ampudia has gone on with his army to San Luis Potosi, to assist Santa Anna in quelling a rebellion in that province. In the meantime we shall await here the news from Washington,-peace or war! If war, we shall fight another battle at Saltillo about Christmas. Of this our government may be assured, we can hold Monterey and the country between it and the coast, if desired-against all Mexico combined.

Yours, &c.

NRR 71.168-71.169 November 14, 1846 Col. Weller's report of the actions of the Ohio regiment in the action at Monterey

COL. WELLER'S REPORT.

I have the honor to report that the first regiment of Ohio volunteers, now under my command, was led by its commanding officer, Col. A. M. Mitchell, unto the attack made on Monterey in the 21st instant.- Notwithstanding the galling fire to which they were exposed for many hours from the batteries of the enemy, the loss has been much less than anticipated. The whole force brought into action, exclusive of commissioned officers, was, as near as can be ascertained, three hundred and seventy.<

Soon after the column reached the city, and near one of the enemy's batteries, my immediate commander, then at its head leading the charge, received a severe wound in the leg, compelling him to retire from the field.

The battalion remained some time exposed to a galling fire in front and upon each flank from the enemy's batteries, the locations of which could not be ascertained until immediately among them, and apparently increasing in number at every fire, we were ordered to retire from the streets into an open ground, giving us a position less exposed, and with a better opportunity of obtaining a knowledge of the enemies actual position.
The extent of our impression upon the batteries of the enemy, though severe, cannot be precisely known; a continued fire was kept up by our troops, who exhibited the coolest intrepidity and bravery, though exposed to batteries beyond their reach and by an almost invisible foe.

When the troops were in position upon the plain, a large body of lancers were seen in the distance advancing with great speed. We immediately took position under cover of a brush fence, and arranged in line. Our fire upon them, with the aid of a shell from our mortar at a distance, drove them with precipitation and some confusion into the fort; not, however, until they had speared several of our wounded, as they lay helpless on the ground.

Our battalion was again remarched to the streets of the small town to sustain our own batteries, and after remaining in this position till near night, were marched from the field into camp, having been exposed to cross fires of four or five batteries for five or six hours. The men, wore down and exhausted from the day's fatigue, were ordered to remain in camp the whole of the 22d. On the morning of the 23d we again took the field, and were ordered in position to sustain Capt. Webber's batteries, and subsequently into the fort which fell into our hands upon the first day, and which itself was exposed to the range of several of the enemy's batteries and forts. We kept possession of the fort until the succeeding day, (24th,) when we were again relieved, and ordered into camp.

Too much credit cannot be given to the officers and men under my command for the gallant and chivalric manner in which they acquitted themselves during the engagement. They proved satisfactorily that in their hands the reputation of Ohio will never be tarnished, and that whenever an opportunity is presented they will be found ready and willing to maintain it. I regret to say that in the battle of the 21st., Adj't A. W. Armstrong was severely wounded in the leg, making an amputation of the limb necessary; 1st Lieut. Hett, of company H, was killed, 1st Lieut. Niles, of company E, was severely wounded, and Capt. George, of the 2d rifle, and Lieut. Motear, of company B, slightly wounded. The total killed, wounded, and missing is fifty-two; a detailed statement of which I herewith send you. It is proper that company F, under Lieut. Beargrand, had been detailed as a guard for the camp, and of course was not in actions.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

John B. Weller.

Brevet Brigadier General Hamer. 1st Field Brigade of Volunteers. [MJK]

NNR 71.169 November 14, 1846 John Wise's project for reducing the fortress of San Juan de Ulloa

EASY METHOD OF CAPTURING THE CASTLE OF SAN JUAN D'ULLOA, AT VERA CRUZ.—

Mr. Wise the Aeronaut, has become before the public, in the columns of the Lancaster (Pa.) Republican, with a plan of taking the business out of the hands of the Generals Taylor, Worth, and Patterson, and doing up the Mexicans at a short notice. We do not think our readers would be satisfied with less than the whole article:

Mr. D. S. Kieffer:- The present condition of the war with Mexico, will require our forces to reduce Vera Cruz. And it is acknowledged on all sides to be an extraordinarily well fortified point of defence, almost impregnable to the common mode of warfare; and at best cannot be taken in that way, without a great sacrifice of life and ammunition. I will suggest a plan to our War Department, that will render the capture of the castle of San Juan D'Ulloa as feasible and easy as the launching of a frigate.

Although the plan I shall propose may seem novel to many, still a brief detail of it, I think, will satisfy the most incredulous of its efficacy. In the first place, it will require the construction of a balloon of common twilled muslin, of about one hundred feet diameter. This machine, properly coated with varnish, will retain its buoyancy for many days or weeks. It will be capable, when inflated, to raise over 30,000 pounds-say, 20,000 of its own weight, net work, car and cable. It can be inflated in a day, or less time, if necessary.

The process of inflation may be accomplished on land, board of a man of war at sea, as circumstances may require the car to be loaded with percussioned bomb shells and torpedoes to the amount of 18,000 pounds, which will leave 2000 pounds for ballast and men. Thus it will be ready to be placed in a position for deadly action, in a very short time. The cable by which it is to be maneuvered, may be at least 5 mile long, so that the balloon, at a mile of elevation, would leave the vessel, or land position, which act as the retaining point, out of reach of the castle guns, and under the cover of our own batteries. The man of war balloon, hovering a mile above the castle like a cloud of destruction, would be entirely out of danger of the enemies guns, since they could not be made to bear at an object immediately above them. The position of the balloon as to the heighth and distance above the retaining point, could be easily maintained by keeping a proper eye to its ballasting. As it would become lightened by the discharge of shells and torpedoes, an adequate quantity of gas can also be discharged.

If a gun from the castle could ever be made to bear upon the war balloon, it would soon be silenced by the rapidity, precision, and certainty, with which the deadly missiles could be showered down upon them.
With this aerial warship hanging a mile above the fort, supplies with a thousand percussion bomb shells, the castle of Vera Cruz could be taken without the loss of a single life to the army, and at an expense that would be comparatively nothing to what it would be to take it by the common mode of attack.

Through the medium of your journal, I would most respectfully suggest this plan to our government, and will tender my services for its construction, and when constructed, will, if necessary, most cheerfully undertake its directorship into actual service, at a moments warning.

Very respectfully, your friend and fellow-citizen,

J. Wise

NRR 71.173-71.174 November 14, 1846 Letter concerning Capt. John Charles Fremont’s operations in California

LETTER FROM SENATOR BENTON TO THE PRESIDENT.

Sir: In the absence of official information on the subject of Lieutenant Colonel (then Captain) Fremont’s operation in Upper California, I deem it my duty to lay before you the private letters which I have received from that officer, for the purpose of showing you his actual position at the latest dates; the unwilling manner in which he became involved in the hostilities with the Mexican authorities of that province, before he had heard of the war with Mexico; and especially to disprove the accusation, officially against him by governor Castro, of having come into California with a body of United States troops, under the pretext of a scientific expedition, but in reality to excite the Americans settled in that province to an insurrection against the Mexican government. The accusation is of the greatest character, most seriously implicating the good faith and honor of our government, and officially made by Governor Castro, in a dispatch to the minister of war and marine, under date of the first of April last, and published in El Monitor Republicano, in the City of Mexico, by the order of the Mexican government, on the 10th of May last. A copy of this paper was sent to Mrs. Fremont, my daughter, by the Hon. Mr. Slidell, and an English translation of it herewith presented.

When Captain Fremont left the United States to complete his scientific labors beyond the Rocky Mountains, it was with full knowledge of the Political, as well as personal difficulties of the enterprise. He knew that the relations of the United States were critical with both Great Britain and Mexico—that he was going through the territories of one, and among the settlements of another—that jealousy would attach to his movements, and all his acts be referred to his government; and he was perfectly determined to use the utmost circumspection in all his conduct, confining himself wholly to his scientific pursuits, and carefully avoiding as well the appearance as the reality of either a political or military mission. With this view, and after having traversed the desert, and crossed the great Basin which lies between the Rocky Mountains and the Sierra Nevada of the Alta California, he left his men upon the frontier, an hundred miles from Monterey, and went alone to that city to explain his object and wishes in person to Governor Castro. He did this in the most formal and official manner, in company with the United States consul, Mr. O’Larkin, (at whose house he stopped;) and conforming to the whole detail of the Spanish ceremonial, he not only called on the Governor, but also on the prefect and the alcalde. The interview was entirely satisfactory. To the governor’s remark that he was bringing a considerable body of United States troops with him, Captain F. answered that it was not so—that he had no troops at all—only a few hired men for security against Indians and Killing game, that he was not even an officer of the line, but of topographical engineers—and that he was seeking a new route (among other objects of science) to the mouth of the Columbia, upon a line further south than the present traveling route, and which had brought him though the unsettled parts of Upper California; and that he now wished to winter in the valley of the San Joaquin, where there was game for his men, and grass, for his horses. To this the governor agreed, and Captain Fremont left Monterey to bring his men to the beautiful valley which he explored in his previous exploration, and to which both himself and his men looked forward as to a paradise of repose and refreshment, after their toilsome and perilous march of three thousand miles among savage tribes, and through wilderness and desert countries.

Scarcely had he arrived in this valley, when information began to reach him from all quarters that the governor was raising the province against him, and coming upon him with troops of all arms—cavalry, artillery, and infantry—and that his situation was most critical and dangerous. The consul sent a special messenger to warn him of his danger; the American settlers below offered to join him; but he utterly refused their assistance, because he would not compromise them. But he did what honor and self-preservation required, and what the courage and fidelity of his men enthusiastically seconded; he took a position, and he awaited the approach of the assailants; and that position was nearer to them, on the summit of the Sierra, overlooking Monterey, at thirty miles distance, and whence, with their glasses, they could plainly see the troops, with their artillery, which had crossed the bay (of Monterey) to San Juan, on their way to attack him. The governor, with these troops, and with all his threats, after coming towards the camp on Sierra, did not come to it; and Captain Fremont, faithful to his design to avoid collision, if possible, finding himself not attacked, determined to retire, and to proceed to Oregon, on his intended route to the valley of the Sacramento, the Tlamath Lake, and the valley of the Wahlahmath river. Accordingly, about the 10th of March, he left his position on the Sierra, descended to the valley of San Joaquin, and commenced his march by slow and easy stages, of four and six miles a day, towards Oregon.

It is of this encampment on the Sierra that governor Castro makes particular complaint in his dispatch to the minister of War and Marine, as evidence of hostile intentions, and where the American flag was raised, a fortification built, and the American settlers called in for defense. Unhappily we have no letter from Captain Fremont detailing the events of these days; but the want of such a letter is well supplied by the official communications from the American consul at Monterey to our secretary of state, and by Captain Fremont’s brief note to the consul, (written in pencil) while expecting the attack of Governor Castro, and which has been heretofore published in our papers. Mr. Buchanan furnished us, as soon as they were received, with copies of these dispatches, which are herewith laid before you, and from which it will be seen that Governor Castro’s accusations against Captain Fremont are entirely unfounded—that so far from having excited the Americans to revolt, he absolutely refused to receive those who offered to join him! And, more, that when after leaving his position, and granting discharges to five or six of his men, he refused to fill their places with men in the country! So determined was he to avoid as well as in appearance, as in fact, the smallest fact offensive or injurious to the Mexican authorities. The same correspondence shows the entire falsehood of all the superlative gasconade which Governor Castro put into his official report about the spoils of the camp—the dispersion of Fremont and his men—their flight into the brushes, and through the desert, his suffocation in the cradle of a dangerous conspiracy, &c., with all which imaginary exploits his official dispatch was filled, while Fremont, with sixty-two men and two hundred horses, were slowly retiring in a body, almost in his view, and utterly abstaining from any act of offense to the province or its authorities. It was no doubt this false report to his government, and the ridicule he incurred by it in California, that led to his subsequent operations in May to exterminate Fremont’s party, and all the American settlers on the Sacramento.

On return from the evacuated camp on the Sierra, the governor also put forth a proclamation, in the vein of his report, and even worse, styling Fremont and his men a band of highway robbers, plundering the people, &c., which accusation of plundering, the consul took the trouble to investigate, and found to be a very trivial offense of manners (not of law or morals) which the injured party valued at five dollars, and for which Captain Fremont gave ten. For the rest, the consul, after all this, declares the inhabitants of the country to be well pleased with Capt. Fremont. And that he might walk the streets of Monterey the next day alone, if he chose. The only truth in Governor Castro’s dispatch is, that Captain Fremont took a military position, entrenched it, and raised the American flag; but these events were the consequence and not the cause of Governor Castro’s movement against him; and this is fully known in that brief, heroic note, written in pencil in answer to the consul’s warning, in which Captain Fremont, after refusing the aid of the American settlers, declared for himself and his sixty-two men that they had done nothing wrong to the authorities or the people of the country—that if attacked they would defend themselves, and die to last man under the flag of their country, and leave it to their country to avenge their deaths. All they did was in self defence. The flag was raised, not as a standard of insurrection, or as a sign of contempt for the Mexican government, but as the American symbol of honor and patriotism, which was entitled to respect from others—to defence from them—and which they had displayed in that hour of danger as a warning to the approaching assailants—as a bond of union and devotion among themselves—and as an appeal and invocation (if they should be destroyed) of the avenging spirit of their far distant country.—To my mind, this entrenching on the mountain, and raising the national flag, was entirely justifiable under the circumstances of the case; and the noble resolution which they took (refusing the aid of their countrymen) to die if attacked under the flag of their country, four thousand miles distant from their homes, was an act of highest heroism, worthy to be recorded by Xenophon, and reflecting equal honor upon the brave young officer who commanded and the heroic sixty-two by whom he was supported.

The first letter that we received from Captain Fremont after his withdrawal from the Sierras, and from the valley of the San Juan, is dated the first day of April, in latitude 40, on the Sacramento river; and though written merely to inform Mrs. Fremont of his personal concerns, becomes important in a public point of view on account of the subsequent events in June and July, by showing that on the first of April he was on his way to Oregon—that he had abandoned all intention of returning through any part of California—would cross the Rocky Mountains through the Northern Pass on the line between the Upper, or Kettle Falls of the Columbia, and the Great Falls of the Missouri, and be in the United States in September. This shows that he had, at that time, no idea of the events in which he was subsequently involved, and that he had abandoned the cherished field of his intended scientific researches for the express purpose of avoiding all offence to the Mexican authorities. Of the events in the valley of the San Joaquin [?] he speaks in few words, without detail but descriptive of his condition, characteristic of his prudence in not compromising his country, and worthy to be repeated in his own language. He says, “The Spaniards were somewhat rude and inhospitable below, and ordered me out of the shadow of a cause the governor suddenly raised the whole country against me, issuing a false and scandalous proclamation. Of course I did not dare compromise the United States against which appearances would have been strong; but although it was in my power to increase my party by Americans, I refrained from committing a solitary act of patriotism, which was entitled to respect from others—to defence from them—and for which Captain Fremont gave ten. For the accusation of plundering, the consul took the trouble to investigate, and found to be a very trivial offense of manners and leave it to their country to avenge their deaths. All they did was in self defence. The flag was raised, not as a standard of insurrection, or as a sign of contempt for the Mexican government, but as the American symbol of honor and patriotism, which was entitled to respect from others—to defence from them—and which they had displayed in that hour of danger as a warning to the approaching assailants—as a bond of union and devotion among themselves—and as an appeal and invocation (if they should be destroyed) of the avenging spirit of their far distant country.—To my mind, this entrenching on the mountain, and raising the national flag, was entirely justifiable under the circumstances of the case; and the noble resolution which they took (refusing the aid of their countrymen) to die if attacked under the flag of their country, four thousand miles distant from their homes, was an act of highest heroism, worthy to be recorded by Xenophon, and reflecting equal honor upon the brave young officer who commanded and the heroic sixty-two by whom he was supported.

His next letter is dated the 14th of May, and informs me that, in his progress to Oregon, he found himself and party unexpectedly attacked by the Tlamath Indians—the most warlike of that quarter—had lost five men in killed and wounded—and still expected to be in the United States by September.

This was the last letter received from Captain Fremont until the one of July 26th, from Monterey, of the Pacific Ocean, and brought in by Com. Sloat. The events which have brought him back you have learnt from that commodore; but the causes which led to these events are necessary to be known for the justification of Captain Fremont; for, although actually justified by the existence of the war with Mexico, yet he knew nothing of the war when these events took place; and, though knowing of it when he wrote, yet he would not avail himself of the subsequent knowledge to justify his previous acts, and there fore he chose to justify everything on the state of facts, as he saw them, when he resolved and acted. These causes, and the events to which they led, are rapidly sketched by him in this, his last letter; and while the whole letter is herewith submitted to you, yet for your convenience, I collect its substance into the smallest compass and lay it before you. The substance is this: At the middle of May, capt. Fremont, in the process of his design reached Oregon, and returned by the Columbia and Missouri through the Northern Pass in the Rocky Mountains, had arrived at the Tlamath Lake, in the edge of the Oregon territory, when he found his further progress completely barred by the double obstacle of hostile Indians, which Castro had excited against him, and the lofty mountains, covered with deep and fallen snows, which made the middle of May in that elevated region, the same as the middle of winter.—These were the difficulties and dangers in front. Behind and in the North bank of the San Francisco bay, at the military post of Sonoma, was General Castro, assembling troops with the [?] of attacking [?] Fremont’s party, and at the American settlements, against whom the Indians had already been excited. Thus, his passage barred in front by impassable snows and mountains—hemmed to by savage Indians, who were thinning the ranks of his little party-menaced by a general head with a tenfold force with full arms—the American settlers marked out for destruction on a false accusation of meditating a revolt under his instigation—his men and horses suffering from fatigue, cold, and famine and after the most anxious deliberation upon all the dangers of his position, and upon all the responsibilities under his command, captain Fremont determined to turn upon his pursuers, and fight them instantly, without regard to numbers, who seek scarcely for his party and the American settlers, by overthrowing the Mexican government in California. It was on the 6th day of June that he came to his determination; and the resolution being once taken, all halfway measures were discarded, and a rapid execution of the plan was commenced. On the 11th of June a supply of two hundred horses for Castro’s troops, on the way to his camp, conducted by an officer and fourteen men, were surprised at daylight, and the whole captured—the men and officers being released, and the horses retained for American use. On the 15th, at daybreak, the military post at Sonoma, (the point of rendezvous, and the intended headquarters), was surprised and taken with nine pieces of brass cannon, two hundred and fifty stand of musket, other arms and ammunition, with several superior officers, general Vallejo, (Val-ya-ho), his brother captain Vallejo, colonel Greuxdon, and others; all of whom were detained and confined as prisoners. Captain Fremont repaired to the American settlements on the Rio de le Americanos to obtain some assistance: and receiving an express from his little garrison of fourteen in Sonoma that gen. Castro was preparing to cross the bay of San Francisco and attack them with a large force, he sat out on the afternoon of the 23d of June with ninety mounted riflemen, and traveling day and night, arrived at 2 o’clock the next morning of the 25th at Sonoma—eighty miles distance. The vanguard of Castro’s forces had crossed the bay— a squadron of seventy dragoons, commanded by de le Torre—which was attacked and defended by twenty Americans, with the loss of two killed and some wounded on the part of the Mexicans, and no injury to themselves—de le Torre barely escaping with the loss of his transport boats, and spiking six pieces of artillery. In the meantime, two of Captain Fremont’s men, going as an express, were captured by de le Torre’s men, and, being bound to trees, were cut to pieces alive with knives! In return for which, three of de le Torre’s men, being taken, were instantly shot. The north side of the bay of San Francisco was now cleared of the enemy, and on the fourth day of July, capt. Fremont called all the Americans together at Sonoma, addressed them upon the dangers of their situation, and recommended a declaration of independence, and war upon Castro and his troops, as the only means of safety. The independence was immediately declared, and war proclaimed.

A few days afterwards, an officer from commodore Sloat brought intelligence that the American flag was hoisted at Monterey— an example that was immediately followed wherever the news flew. The pursuit and defeat of Castro was the only remaining enterprise. He had fled south towards the numerous Mexican settlements beyond Monterey with his four or five hundred men; and, captain Fremont, leaving some fifty men garrisons, set out with one hundred and sixty riflemen in the pursuit, when he received instructions from commodore Sloat to march upon Monterey. He did so, and found commodore Stockton in command, approving the pursuit of Castro, and aiding by all the means in his power.—The sloop-of-war Cyane was put at his service.— Capt. Fremont, with one hundred and sixty American riflemen and seventy marines, embarked on that vessel, and sailed down the coast on the 26th of July, to San Diego, four hundred miles south of Monterey, and one hundred south of Puebla de Los Angelos where Castro was understood to be, with an increasing force of five hundred men. The descent of the coast as far as San Diego was to get ahead of Castro, and to be in position to either intercept him if he fled south to Mexico or to Lower California, or to run back upon him if he remained in Puebla de Los Angelos, or any of the numerous towns in its neighborhood. In either event, the enterprise will probably had its conclusion in early August, and official details may now be looked for by the first arrivals from the North Pacific Ocean. In the meantime I hope the information I am able to give, though all of a private character, written solely for the information of friends, and never expected to go before the public, may be sufficient to relieve any anxieties, to disprove the accusations of g.v. Castro, and to justify the actions of captain Fremont. I make this communication to you, sir, upon the responsibilities of an American senator, addressing the president of the United States, and with the sole view of vindicating the American government, and its officer, from the foul imputation of exciting insurrection in the provinces of a neighboring power, with whom we were at peace. I could add much more to prove that captain Fremont’s private views and feelings were in unison with his ostensible mission—that the passion of his soul was the pursuit of science— and that he looked with dread and aversion upon every possible collision either with Indians, Mexicans, or British, that could turn him aside from that cherished pursuit. A more formal occasion for the exhibition of these further and other proofs may soon occur; but the exigency of their circumstances seemed to me to require that no time should be lost in communicating the truth to the public mind, both at home and abroad, in a case so seriously affecting the national character, and in which uncorrected error, for even a short time, would do great mischief.

Very respectfully, sir, your friend and fellow citizen,

THOMAS H. BENTON.

NRR 71.174-175, 14 November 1846 Lt. Emory’s Journal

The last mail from General Kearney’s command brought a continuation of Lt. Emory’s journal, from Santa Fe, which we have now the opportunity of laying before our readers:

September 1.—The day passed away in preparing for tomorrow’s march, and listening to the thousand rumors about the force we are to encounter, not a word of which do I believe.
September 2.—Marched at 9 o'clock out of Santa Fe, taking no one of my party but Mr. Bestor. We descended the valley of the Santa Fe river nearly west for five miles, when we left the river, which is here dry, and struck across a plain intersected by arroyos, (creeks,) in a southwesterly course. Twenty-three miles brought us to Galisteau creek, which at the time was barely running. The bed is sand and pebbles of primitive rock, and lies between steep cliffs of clay and limestone, traversed occasionally by trap dykes, which in one place are so regular as to resemble walls pierced with windows. From this place to its mouth there is scarcely a sign of vegetation. At its dry mouth, and directly, on the Rio del Norte, is the town of Santo Domingo.

September 4.—This was a great day. The general received some days since an invitation from the Pueblos to visit their town of Santa Fe. From height to height as we advanced we could see horsemen disappearing at full speed. As we arrived abreast of the town, the general was told by a guide posted there for the purpose, that this was the road for Santo Domingo.

He sent the chief part of his command and the wagon train along the highway, and with his staff and Capt. Bargwin’s squadron of dragoons, wended his way along the middle path nearly due west to the town. We had not proceeded far before we met ten or fifteen sacheum looking old Indians, well mounted, two of them carrying gold headed canes with tassels, the emblem of the office of New Mexico, that no dandy, nor even an alcalde, or other magistrate, dare sport.

Salutations through, we jogged along, and in the course of conversation, the alcalde, a grave and majestic looking old Indian, said casually, we shall soon meet some Indians mounted. They are young men of my town, friends, come to receive you, and I wish you to caution your men not to fire upon them when they ride towards them.

Sure enough, within a few miles of the town, we saw a cloud of dust rapidly advancing, and soon a terrible yell; the real Florida war whoop over again.

The first thing that caught my eye through the column of dust, was a fierce pair of Buffalo horns overlapped with long shaggy hair. As they approached, the sturdy form of a naked Indian revealed itself beneath the horns, with shield and lance, dashing at full speed on a white horse, which, like his own naked body, was painted all the colors of the rainbow, and then, one by one, his followers came on painted to the eyes, their heads and their horses covered with all the hideous looking things that the brute creation could afford, in the way of horns, sculls, feathers, and claws.

As they passed us one rank on each side, they fired a volley under our horse bellies from the right and from the left. My horse, a fresh one, had never before smelt gunpowder, and long will my friend, Dr. Decamp. Recollect that fact, for he jumped against him, and the end of my pistol struck his knee, right on what the children call the singing bone. A pure American “God d---n,” came, perhaps for the first time from the doctors lips. I muttered some apology, but it was lost in the house that was made to the right and to the left of the passing Indians.

Our well trained dragoons sat motionless on their horses, who went along without pricking an ear or showing any signs of excitement.

Arrived in the rear, the Indian circled round and dropped into a walk o our flanks, until their horses recovered breath, when off they went at full speed, passing to our front, and when there, the opposite ranks met, and each man selected his adversary, and kept up a running fight with masked lances, and bows and arrows. Sometimes a fellow would stoop almost to the earth to shoot under his horse's belly at full speed, or shield himself from an impending blow. So they continued to pass and repass, all the way to the steep cliffs which overhang the town. Here they filed out on each side of the road, which at this place descended through a deep canon, and halted on the peaks of the cliff. Their motionless figures projected against the clear blue sky above, formed studies for an artist. In the canon we were joined by a priest, a hearty looking old white man, with the idea of the locality, occasioned several of us to say, well, this is really a canonical meeting. We were taken first to the padre’s of course, for here, as everywhere in New Mexico, the padre’s are most intelligent, and the best to do in the world; and when the good people wish to put the best foot foremost, the padre’s wines, beds, and meats have to suffer. The entrance to the portal was lined with the women of the place, all dressed alike, and ranged in simple flies. They looked rather fat and uninteresting.

We were shown into his reverence’s parlor, tapestried with curtains stamped with the likenesses of all the Presidents of the United States up to this time.

The cushions were of spotless damask, and the couch of the luxuriant old saint, covered with a white Navahoe blanket worked in richly colored flowers.

The air was redolent with the perfume of grapes and melons, and every crack of door and window was glistening with the bright eyes of the women of the casilla. The old priest was busily talking to the general in a corner, and little did he know of the game of sighs and signs the young fellows were carrying on with the fair people of his house. We had our gayest array of young men out to-day, and the women seemed to me to drop the usual subdued look and timid motion of the eyelash for good hearty twinkles and signs of unaffected and cordial welcome. Signs in this group was the only conversation, as neither party could speak the language of the other.

This little exchange of artillery of the eyes amused me a good deal; but I was very glad to see the padre put a stop to it, by advancing towards the grapes, melons, and wines. We were as thirsty as dust and heat could make us, and whatever was the quality of the wine, we relished it highly. The sponge cake was irreproachable, and would have done honor to the padre’s wines, beds, and meats have to suffer. The sponge cake was irreproachable, and would have done honor to Mrs. Bonkendorff, on Pennsylvania Avenue. Indeed whenever we have been feasted, we found the sponge cake in profusion and of this best quality.

The general now went forward on the portal, and delivered a speech to the assembled people of the town, which was interpreted into Spanish, and then into Puebla. He was very happy to-day in what he said, and almost every sentence was responded to by grunts of satisfaction. I will not report the speech, as I am not sure that it would be proper, or expected of me to do so.
The population of the town was impossible to arrive, but I should judge it to be 1,000; and the quantity of ground under tillage, for their support, about 500 acres.

The valley of the "Del Norte" is here quite narrow, and the soil sandy. The river itself was viewed, by me for the first time, with strange interest.—The hardships, trials, and perseverance of the gallant Pike, and the adventures of the pious and brave soldiers of the cross—the monks and early adventurers—came to my mind; and as I kneeled down to drink its waters, my thoughts were of them.—The little episode, too, in my own dog-trot life, in relation to this river, was not forgotten. Being stationed at Washington when the annexation of Texas was determined on, I was ordered to compile a map of that country. Instead of going to the hasty compilers, and romantic voyagers of the day, I went back to the original explorers themselves. I pleased neither party, and was roundly scolded in both houses of congress, until Colonel Benton, that able statesman who is the best informed man in congress in history and geography took the matter in hand, and justified all I had written and done.

Leaving Santo Domingo, we struck the highway in about four miles, and two miles more brought us to the pretty village of San Filipe, overhung by a sleep craggy precipice; upon the summit of which are the ruins of a Roman Catholic church, presenting in the landscape the appearance of the pictures we see of the castles of the Rhine.

Between San Filipe and the Augusturas, 6 miles below, the valley of the river is very narrow, affording no interval for agriculture. On the west side the banks are steep basaltic walls, crowned by table lands the west are rolling sand hills, covered with large round pebbles, terminating at the base of high mountains, running north and south.

The little town of Angosturas, the valley of the river opens into a plain, varying from two to six miles in width, generally low and level to admit the water of the river to be carried over it for purposes of irrigation; but the soil is very sandy, and better adapted to Indian corn than wheat. Of this last, we saw but few stubbles, the ground being chiefly in corn.

News now began to arrive which left but little doubt that the reports which caused our movements down the river, were exaggerated, if not without foundation. People had passed down the river, as was reported to the general, but in no great numbers. A messenger came in, too, from the alcalde of Topie, with an official note, stating that Armijo had left with him 100 mules, pressed into service by him, to meet us at the canon, and that Armijo had also notified him that 100 more would be left at the Passo del Norte. These belonged to citizens of New Mexico, and had been taken from them without their consent. It was his practice, in peace or in war, to seize the person or property of any who fell under his displeasure.

The town of Bernallillo is small, but one of the best built in the territory. We were here invited to the house of a very wealthy man, named Pasilla, to take some refreshment. We were led into an oblong room, furnished like that of every Mexican who is well to do in this world. A banquet runs entirely around the room, except where the "couch" goes. It is covered with cushions, carpets, and pillows, upon which the visitor sits or reclines. The dirt floor is usually covered a third or half with a common looking carpet. On the uncovered part is the table, freighted with grapes, sponge cake, and the wine of the country. The walls are hung with miserable pictures of the saints, crosses innumerable, and common Yankee mirrors without number. These last are hung entirely out of reach, and if one wishes to shave, or adjust his shirt, he must do it with out a mirror, be there ever so many in the chamber.

Mr. Pasilla was hospitable, but very uncommunicative. He evidently had not yet the news from below, of the retreat of Ugarte and Armijo. We passed on to the house of his wealthy son, where we were invited to dine. Here we found another table of refreshments, and, after waiting some hours, dinner was announced. It was a queer jumble of refinement and barbarism, the first predominating in everything, except in the mode of serving, which was chiefly done by the master, his Mexican guests, and a few female serfs.

The plates, forks, and spoons, were of solid silver clumsily worked in the country. The middle of the table was strewed with the finest white bread, cut into pieces and within the reach of every plate.—At close intervals were glass decanters, of Pittsburg manufacture, filled with wine made on the plantation. The dishes came of separately: the first was soup meager, then followed roast chicken, stuffed with onions, then mutton boiled with onions, and various others, all stuffed with the everlasting onion, and the whole terminated by chile—the glory of New Mexico. This dish, which the Mexicans consider the chef d'oeuvre of the cuisine, they seem really to revel in; but the first mouthful brought the tears trickling down my cheeks, very much to the amusement of the leather throated spectators. It was red pepper stuffed with mince meat.

From Bernallillo the valley opens but narrows again at Sandina, an Indian town, on a sandbank, at the base of a high mountain of the same name, said to contain the precious metals. Here they were treading wheat, which is done by making a circular enclosure, on level ground, of clay. Upon this floor they scatter the wheat, turn in a dozen or so of mules, and one or two Indians, who, with whoops, yells and blows, keep the affrighted brutes constantly in motion. To separate the wheat from the chaff, both Indians and Mexicans use a simple hand barrow, with bottom of raw bull's hide, pierced with holes. I should think it took an hour to winnow one bushel.

After dining sumptuously at Sandiral's, we went to our camp in the Allabavo. Here the valley is wide, and well cultivated. The people of the surrounding country flocked in with grapes, melons, and eggs. Several very pretty women were clustered around the general's tent; and, as night approached, he asked them if they were not afraid to venture amongst the strangers at that dangerous hour. "No," said one, "what have we to fear when our general is here?"

Swarms of wild geese and sand cranes passed over camp. They frequent the river; and are undisturbed, save when some American levels his rifle.

September 5.—Encamped last night on very indifferent grass. Breakfasted with Don Jose Chavis, at Pardilla. When sitting, the table was as high as our chins. There were five or six courses, ending with coffee. Before breakfast we were summoned to mass in a private chapel of Don Jose, where officiated the eccentric dandy we met yesterday at dinner. Priest and dandy were curiously combined in this person. Proud of his pure white hands, he flourished them incessantly, sometimes running his fingers through his hair, to give an air of elegant intelligence; and ever and anon, looking into the wine of the country. The walls are hung with miserable pictures of the saints, crosses innumerable, and common Yankee mirrors without number. Priest and dandy were curiously combined in this person. Proud of his pure white hands, he flourished them incessantly, sometimes running his fingers through his hair, to give an air of elegant intelligence; and ever and anon, looking into one of the many looking glasses with which they decorate their churches. After mass, to our surprise, he delivered a course-eulogizing the grandeur, magnanimity, power and justice of the United States. When we visited his chapel at the town of Isoletta, near by, some of the gentlemen of the staff stumbled into the refreshment room before it was intended and surprised two or three pretty women aiding in the arrangements.

Mass was anything but an appetizer before breakfast. The church was crowded with women of all conditions; and the horrid rebozo, which the poor use for shawls, bonnet, handkerchief, and spit-box, sent out an odor which the incense from the alter failed to stifle.

One thing struck me as singular— in all the houses of the better class, that we visited, the ladies never made their appearance; but here we caught, in the act of running across the court, the very pretty and gay widow of Mr. Chavis, who was killed for his gold, near the western borders of Missouri, a year or two since.

At Isoletta I became tired of the show, and seeing my servant talking, at the door of one of his acquaintances, I took the liberty of asking an introduction, with the intention of taking a quiet siesta, but this was out of the question. The good woman overwhelmed me with a thousand questions about the United States. I could only stop her by asking questions myself. She denounced Armijo as a coward, and said, with a true Castillian flash of the eye. "I do not see how any man, wearing those things," (pointing to my shoulder straps,) "could run away." "He had a good army to back him, and could have driven you all back to the United States."

The valley suddenly contracts below Perdilla.— Between Isoletta and Peralta, on the east side of the river, there is deep sand, and the country perfectly barren.

September 7.— Last night was the most beautiful, light, and scene; the air of the natural temperature of the body, ocasionally varied by a gentle breeze from the mountains, wafting along the perfumes of the vineyards.

Observed for time and latitude; the last unsatisfactorily, in consequence of the brightness of the moon dimming the southern stars. About 11 o'clock the whole character of the night was changed by an east wind, that came rustling down from the mountains, and driving the sand before it. Nearly the whole distance traveled to-day and yesterday, and indeed the day before, was over deep sand, with only occasional patches of deep soil. Although up late, I rose early; and after dispatching (by order) a note to Colonel Ruff, requiring him to move at 9 o'clock, I walked over the town of Peralta, which is dotted with cotton wood trees, growing in nearly the regular order of an apple orchard. Having seen all,
I repaired to headquarters, at the Palace of Mr. Hortera, a spacious edifice, nearly five hundred feet front. I found the general up, and waiting for the slow coming breakfast.— This was announced about ten; and as I had already breakfasted, I stretched myself on the luxurious ottoman that surrounded the whole room, and napped away, well knowing the length of a Mexican dejune. This over, we waited till the rear of the army passed, and escorted the general to Mr. Hortera, senior.

Here ends all my journal that could be copied in time to go to the mail. I wish I could go on, and describe our visit to Tome, the fete, the religious jubilee in honor of the conception, the fandango at night, and the dramatic performance of David and Absaloin. But this must be left for another opportunity.

We ascertained that the reports were all unfounded in reference to Armijo’s rallying the people in the south to resistance; that when near Col. Ugarte, who was marching towards us with a regular force he sent word to him that Kearney was in possession of Santa Fe. Upon this Ugarte left 12 dragoons for Armijo, turned short round, and trotted towards Chihuahua with his whole force.

We returned here on the 12th, and immediately retrieved orders to march for California on the 25th. 1,000 miles, a great portion of which is desert. I am constantly employed in examining guides, trappers, &c., in reference to it.

I studiously avoid giving any general notions of this country. I reserve that till I see all that is to be seen.

Peck and Abert are still too weak to accompany me to California, but both are fast recovering.

I will close this, as we are directed to hand in our official papers at 9 o'clock, and I intend it to go through the bureau. I will write further by this same mail, directed to you in person.

The more I think of the matter, the more I think of this journal, the preceding part of which as already been sent—the more I am satisfied it is unfit for official use in its present state. Therefore let it be considered as an unofficial record of passing, and often even trivial events.[MJK]

NNR 71.176 November 14, 1846 spirited Mexican exertions of defense

MEXICO-Latest. The New Orleans Times of the 7th, has a letter from Vera Cruz of the 7th ult. The news of the fall of Monterey seems only to have inspired the Mexicans with a sense of necessity of more spirited exertions of defense.
Santa Anna had reached San Luis Potosi and was concentrating an imposing force, at least, according to his own account. [MJK]

NNR 71.176 November 14, 1846 Gen. Stephen Watts Kearney’s proclamation appointing offers for the government of New Mexico, leaves Santa Fe for California
SANTA FE.  General Kearny, by proclamation dated the 23d September, 1846, announces that, being duly authorized by the president of the United States, he appoints the Governor and administrative officers of the Territory of New Mexico. He names as governor Charles Bent; secretary of treasury, Don Aduciano Vigil; marshal, Richard Dalain; U.S. District Attorney, Francis P. Blair; treasurer, Charles Blummer; auditor, Eugene Leitensdorfer; Joab Houghton, Antonia Jose Otero, and Chas. Baubie, judges of the supreme court. [MJK]

NNR 71.176 November 14, 1846 Col. Alexander William Doniphan’s regiment to proceed from Santa Fe for Chihuahua

Col. Doniphan’s regiment proceeds forthwith towards Chihuahua, which they believe to be in possession of gen. Wool. Indeed such a movement was necessary, as, owing to some mismanagement, provision were vary scarce, the army being obliged to subsist from Bent’s Fort, (some time in July), up to the last in September, without sugar or coffee, and on half rations of flour, (ground wheat.)

On the 25th General Kearney left Santa Fe for California, with a detachment of 400 U.S. dragoons; mounted on mules. They take the route known as “copper mine route,” down the Rio Grande, to Socorro, 900 miles south of Santa Fe, thence west to Gila, (Heela), thence the head of the Gulf of California and thence N. W. to Monterey. The route of this small command was considered by many of the oldest and most experienced mountain traders, as one of great hardship and suffering, if not absolutely impracticable. NNR 71.177 November 21, 1846 British press on the Monterey victory

THE MONTEREY VICTORY.- The Hibernia arrived at Liverpool on the 30th, with intelligence of the storming and seizure of Monterey. The London papers of the 30th, devoted a large portion of their columns to the details of the news, which created a marked sensation there. The London journals had not found time or disposition to comment upon the event at any considerable length. The Times publishes the news without a word of comment. The herald simply calls attention to the fact, and the chronicle of the 30th, barely alludes to the intelligence as ‘of considerable interest.’

The Daily News states that “the Mexicans have redeemed their character as soldiers, and maintained to the full the modern reputation of the Spanish race for stubborn valor in defensive war. Their courage, indeed, has not been crowned with success; they have not been able to repulse from Monterey the well-appointed Anglo-American army, consisting of a force almost as numerous as their own, but they baffled the American general for five days, behind crumbling and inefficient fortifications, disputing each position, inch by inch, and even at the last, when driven by the cannon of the enemy to a mere entrenchment in the public square, and to a church as their chief stronghold; even in this position, the attitude of the Mexican general and his troops, compelled the American commander to grant him not only the most honorable terms that a soldier could require, but to make concessions, which would seem to prove the conquering army to have been completely paralyzed by its very success.

Creditable as the defense of Monterey is to the Mexicans and Ampudia, it casts not slur on the valor of the Mexican troops or the skill of their commander. The satisfaction to be derived from it consists not in the incompleteness or the dear purchase of American victory, but in the unexpected assurance that the Mexicans are still possessed of the force and the courage to assert their independence, and compel its being respected even by their formidable neighbors.”

The Chronicle, of the 31st, recurs to the subject, and speaks of the capture of Monterey as having afforded a stimulus to those who loved war and pantet for conquest, and as having excited the dislike of those who began to see that the war was likely to prove long, difficult, expensive, and of doubtful issue. The American government, moreover, it adds, undoubtedly counted on the treachery of Santa Anna, and is doomed to disappointment. The Chronicle concludes thus—“It is really a matter of doubt whether the American successes at Monterey have brought the war one step nearer to its termination. They have exhibited an obstinacy of defence beyond what was expected; they have inflicted no irreparable injury upon the Mexicans; and they have weakened the influence of the peace party both in Mexico and the United States.” [MJK]

NNR 71.178 November 21, 1846 advice to government and estimates of force requisite to take the city of Mexico, by correspondent of New Orleans “Tropic”

A writer in the New Orleans Tropic, of the 9th instant, states that he has visited and examined thoroughly the entire territory of Mexico; that he is well acquainted with the institutions, its people, its resources, policy, and topography; and therefore he considers himself qualified to offer to the government some useful advice as to the proper mode of prosecuting the war with Mexico. The conquest of Mexico, (which he seems to take for granted to be the object of this administration,) through an invasion by land, he says, may be deemed extremely problematical. He then makes the following suggestions:

“That, to take the city of Mexico in virtue of his arrangements, the president will require an army of 50,000 men, and $50,000,000 of cash, and half of the above 50,000 men, and if he really entertains a serious desire to effectively conquer the country, he is advised to put the navy forthwith into motion; take possession of, garrison, and hold all the Mexican Atlantic ports as well as those of the Yucatan. In this way he will not only speedily conquer the country, but at once throw open to our commerce the gates of a benighted territory, the resources of which have been hitherto underdeveloped.

“As to the ports on the Pacific, they have nothing to do with the conquest of Mexico; they are out of the question. Our ships of war had better all be recalled from there, to act on the Atlantic board, where they would be of some service. A garrison left in California would be sufficient to maintain it in possession of the United States.” [MJK]

NRR 71.179 November 21, 1846 copy of Secretary of War William Learned Marcy’s reply to inquiry from Delaware, saying no more volunteers would be required, requisition among states for nine regiments of volunteers, rendezvous assigned them, speculation of the public press as to the reasons for the sudden change, letter from Camp Crocket, Texas, remarks on letter writing

When our last number went to press, we were fully under the persuasion that the administration had abandoned their intention of calling upon the States at present for any additional volunteers for the army. Such was not only the general expression of the public press, hardly excepting the “Union” itself, but also of the head of the Department of war, as will be seen by the following letter, published in the Wilmington (Del.) Gazette, of the 6th Nov.

War Department, October 15, 1846.

Sir: in reply to your letter of the 12th instant, I have the honor to inform you that it is not contemplated to make any further call on the Executive of your State for any volunteer or militia force, with a view to the existing war with Mexico. A sufficient amount of force for the prosecution of that war has, it is believed, been already called into service.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. L. MARCY, Secretary of War.

Mr. Willard Saulsbury, Georgetown, Sussex county, Delaware.

It was under the impression derived from the foregoing, that the introductory remarks in our last, were predicated. This change from the course which the Union had previously indicated as about to be pursued seemed so sudden, so contradictory, that nothing short of official authority would have induced us to credit it.

We had but just time to get the announcement that no more volunteers were to be called for shortly, into the mail, before the Washington Union reached us, with the counter announcement, that requisitions have been sent out from the War Department, calling into service of the United States nine additional regiments of volunteers to serve during the war with Mexico, unless sooner discharged. They are asked for from the following States:

One regiment of infantry from Massachusetts; One regiment of infantry from the State of New York; One regiment of infantry from Pennsylvania; One regiment of infantry from Virginia; One regiment of infantry from North Carolina; One regiment of infantry from South Carolina; One regiment of infantry from Louisiana, One regiment of infantry from Mississippi; and One regiment of mounted men from Texas:

In allusion to the foregoing announcement the Union says—“We have no time, at the late hour at which we receive the above interesting intelligence, to dwell upon the subject. It shows,” adds the official paper, “how little force there is in such suggestions as are thrown out in a Baltimore paper, that “it is believed that nothing decisive will be undertaken, either by our Army or Navy, before the next meeting of Congress.”:

The Union of the 17th, designates the rendezvous for the above regiments. The Massachusetts regiment, Boston; New York regiment, City of N. York; Pennsylvania, Pittsburg; Virginia, Guyandotte; N. Carolina, Wilmington; South
ARMY OF THE CENTRE.

The correspondent of the St. Louis Republican of the 12th November writes:

Camp Crocket, (Texas.) Oct. 10.

"As we are about to leave the United States post office in our rear, you will hear from us only at irregular intervals. The last detachment of Gen. Wool's command will march from hence to the Presidio in a day or two, and it is estimated that the effective force with which he will cross the Rio Grande will not exceed three thousand men; from the Presidio it is expected we will proceed to Chihauhua or Monclova, which you will perceive by the map is as near to Monterey as Matamoras is; though in case we shall diverge thence towards Chihuahua, you will behold this striking picture: A force of three thousand men, without the possibility of early reinforcement, on a march of invasion hundreds of miles into the interior of the enemy's country, and a country too 9,000,000 of people, accustomed to arms, and of a stubborn military pride, with standing armies, and a wealthy religious establishment.

At the latest accounts there were 12,000 troops assembled at San Luis Potosi, and a large force at Zucatecas. If, then, Durango will give her proportion for the western defenses, while Gen. Taylor is attended to by the cities east of the capital, I would enquire what are they of a Fabian character, or more in the line of precedent of Charles XII?

Whatever may be said of the poverty of the Mexican treasury, and however poor she may be on paper, it is nevertheless now a matter of history that her dominant priesthood holds the coffers, and with the military name and character of her politicians, these coffers once freely opened, could not Mexico defend herself, creditably, among her mountain passes, against an equal foe invading?

And when the Northern Saxon comes down with his regiments in battle array, will the priesthood be blind enough to see that its dynasty is to receive a shock from the electric influence of American institutions?—Will not, then, the gold and silver of the mines be turned for a time into a channel, by the ruling power of Mexico, for its own necessary self-protection?

If these questions are to be answered in the affirmative, then three thousand men entering the central dominions of that country will run no ordinary hazard, and must be considered the most fortunate of men, if they ever return.

This is the position and prospect of our little army; the timid and the tired have already left us, and we now leave them in security in their own homes, and hope the colors of our country will not be stained with dishonor by anything we may do or suffer in our campaign.

We wage no war of plunder, we disturb no religion; and if a religious zeal shall be infused into the Mexican lines by her wily hierarchy, we believe it only will be done to excite sufficient patriotism in her sons for a proper defense of the country which pays its tribute so generously to the tax-gathering hero of the Crozier and Mitre.

Our days here are still a little too hot for fair marches, yet we are drawing near the season of active military operations in this climate, and will soon be winding round the hills in the department of Chihauhua, from whence you will get but once in a great while, any tidings of our situation; but this you will know, that we are not reveling in the halls of the Montezumas, though traveling in the hills of the Turantulas.

Gn. Wool, with the first detachment of our force, is erecting fortifications at the Presidio-Col. Harney waiting there in breathless eagerness to try our fortunes on some bloody field-while Col. Churchill is hurrying on with his portion of the troops, thirteen companies, to share these fortunes. And in passing, I will remark, that the old colonel, without knowing it himself, has the name among our raw soldiery, of being a very cross, ill contrived old fellow, while in fact he is one of the most amiable and best natured men in the army. He takes hold of a gun on inspection, he scolds the soldier, then his captain, then the colonel, and looks very thunder at all times; but it you will scrutinize, you will perceive a good natured smile hiding itself in the dimples of his fine face, which seems ready to leap forth and say, you did not see me, but I was surely there. He is an excellent officer, and has a large share of strong logical mind, with sufficient experience, knowledge of tactics, and military pride, to inspire confidence among the soldiers in his usefulness on the field.
Monterey has fallen, five thousand men have seen nine thousand file past them with humbled mien and downcast looks; have gazed proudly on two fortified mountain fastnesses they had escaled; upon a castle of enormous strength bristling with cannon, and upon our formidable forts they had stormed; upon an impregnable citadel, thirty-five pieces of ordinance, countless munitions of war and the loveliest city in the world, with its stately palaces, sparkling streams and fountains, its magnificent gardens and fragrant groves of orange and pomegranate, which their gallantry had won. Ensconced among the dizzy cliffs of the Sierra de la Madre, circled on three sides by a buttressed wall in many places thirty feet high, the houses built of stone with flat and parapeted roofs for sharp-shooters, with barricades of solid masonry twelve feet thick crossing in all directions,-every house a castle and every street a fortress, defended to by ten thousand veteran troops, the pride of the Mexican soldiery, the city of the Royal Mountain seemed to scoff from her lofty seat at the puny force that lay encamped below. But in three days this despised band had entered the proud city, defeated an army twice their numbers, one thousand of whom lay stretched on the field of battle, and without ladders, fascines, siege guns, or battering train, had made themselves masters of more than thirty fortifications on which the heaviest artillery could have produced no impression by a six months uninterrupte cannonade.

Wonderful as is the achievement, the actors know that there will be deep dissatisfaction in the United States. It was thought a light matter to crush an imbecile people, and thousands of gallant spirits, burning with patriotism and covetous of distinction, had rushed to their country's standard in the fond belief that in a few months they would be reveling in more than Oriental pomp and luxury in the gorgeous palaces of the capitol of Mexico. How keenly must be felt the rebuke to the arrogant presumption with which the war begun,-this baffling our arms for three days, and arresting our progress for eight weeks, on the very borders of the country that was to be overrun in six months! How mortifying too must be the fact that our proud banner would have trailed in the dust, but for the much despised "mercenaries" under Gen. Worth, aided by three hundred ragged Texans almost as much reviled as they.

No one here pretends to deny that everything was effected by Gen. Worth's division of regulars, with the assistance of Col. Hays' little regiment of Rangers acting as light troops. The other two divisions did nothing whatever but waste their blood like water and inspire with enmity and confidence. High functionaries of the government had made invidious distinction between the few 'hirelings' and that fearful host of "citizen soldiery" so eager to fight for their country. It was unfortunate for such distinction, that but little more than two thousand of that "fearful host" were here, when tower, castle, citadel, fort, and redoubt sent forth their sheets of flame, and that not a few even of these showed more relish for shelter than danger. Most of the 1st and 3d divisions; however, fought bravely, and, that the few "hirelings," among them earned their wages, the havoc made in their ranks but too plainly shows. One fragment of a regiment, (the 3d infantry,) entered the field with fourteen officers, and returned with seven,-five being killed in the battle and two desperately wounded. The failure of these divisions is mainly attributable to the rashness of their commanders. Heavy dragoons on clumsy horses were ordered to charge through the streets barricaded with such wall as the boldest English sportsman, light clad, full of wine and mounted on his finest hunter, would shudder to think of leaping. Six pounders were sent to batter down fortifications that twenty four would played upon harmless as a child's bow and arrows. But it is, and must ever be, a proud reflection to the friends of the army, that one of the strongest cities in the world was captured, and a well-appointed force ten thousand strong, defeated, by fifteen hundred regulars poorly provided, and assisted by three hundred Rangers.

Gen. Worth volunteered his division to perform what was considered by far the most difficult and dangerous task,—the storming of the castle and the craggy heights that commanded the city and guarded the Saltillo road,—the only avenue for escape or reinforcement to the Mexican troops. So perilous did this enterprise seem to the rest of the army, that his command as they marched out of General Taylor's camp, were regarded as doomed men,—a forlorn hope of the most desperate character. Little was it thought that they were destined, with incredibly small loss, to be captures of this city of stone, where incessant volleys of grape and canister like hurricanes swept every street, and torrents of musket, rifle, and escopette balls poured from every door, window, embasure, and parapet; all these seem rather the fabulous exploits of Paladin and Knight, or the dreams of military enthusiasts, than the sober realities of the times. The morning of the 24th found the 2d division with but one barricade to storm and but one short street to traverse, to reach La Plaza Grande, in which the masses of the enemy were so crowded as to be helpless as sheep in a fold. A captured eighteen-pound howitzer was looking down at point blank distance from the roof of a high building, upon the cathedral in the Plaza, full to overflowing with arms and ammunition. In one hour it would have been blown to atoms and the fragments of Ampudia’s shattered army would have been unconditional prisoners of war. It was with deep dissatisfaction and indignation even, that the division heard of the capitulation so favorable to the enemy. From the highest officer to the humblest private, all felt that a great folly had been committed, and that the same army must be fought again under the most adverse circumstances, which would have been here crushed with scarce an effort. Still, no one blamed Gen. Taylor, for it was universally believed that he was influenced by political reasons and controlled by orders from the war department.

The folly from which the country suffered so much during the war, of directing the operations of a distant army from a parlor in Washington, it is feared, will be repeated again and again, until our arms are defeated and our country disgraced. The president distinguished secretory of war seems never to have doubted that with the aid of ridiculously inaccurate maps and ignorant advisors he could plan a campaign with the skill of a Wellington, and thus from the moment our army landed on the shelly shore of the Corpus Christi till now, he has taken upon him to manage every thing,-at one time restraining the general from the performance of possibilities, on another goading him on to impossibilities.—The “Man of Iron,” whom our secretary regards as a brother in arms, would doubtless be filled with astonishment, if not admiration, at some of his performances. He sent an army of invasion into the field without a single piece of artillery. He ordered the same army to encamp under the heavy gun of a fortified city, although entirely destitute of siege train and all the ordinary entrenching elements. To show that a battle could be fought earlier then Gen. Scott predicted, he urged on Gen. Taylor to the attack of an almost impregnable city, although the general’s weightiest was two twenty-four pound howitzers, whose shot fell back like pebbles from the solid fortifications of Monterey. And to crown the whole, when every obstacle had been overcome, and the Mexican forces were completely in our power, the secretary’s order determined that it was better to fight them again behind other entrenchments, then to crush them on the spot. It is supposed here that he is ambitious to occupy a page in Dr. Frost’s Wonders of History, and that to ensure so desirable an end, he will next order us to take San Luis Potosi with slings and pop-guns.

We are sorry to say, at the close of this rambling letter, that the general of this victorious division, apparently for the sake of popularity, sullied his fair fame by neglecting for some time after the capitulation, to restrain the passions of the volunteers. The guards were prohibited from sending out patrols to preserve order and quiet in the city; as a matter of course the foul spirit of mischief was no longer in showing itself. As at Matamoras, murder, robbery, and rape were committed in the broad light of day, and as if desirous to signalize themselves at Monterey by some new act of atrocity, they burned many of the hatched huts of the poor peasants. It is thought that one hundred of the inhabitants were murdered in cold blood, and one Mexican soldier, with Gen. Worth’s passport in his pocket, was hot dead at noon-day in the main street of the city by a ruffian from Texas. But for the moral influence and the finally exerted physical force of the “hirelings of the government,” the dark deeds of Badajoz would have been repeated at Monterey. Guards of "mercaries” are now placed in every street and over every valuable building in the city to prevent depredations being committed by those who came here from devotion to “the land of the free and the home of the brave.”

We do not care so much for the disregard of authority among the volunteers, -their frays and feuds among themselves, and the unsoldiery scenes between the officers and privates, such as the chasing of a dignified commander through his own camp. All these are private matters of their own, affecting but indirectly the issue of the campaign.—But outrages on the helpless and unoffending Mexicans, on the contrary, have a direct and palpable bearing on the successful termination of the war.—The Mexicans themselves admit that before the arrival of the volunteers upon the Rio Grande, all eastern Mexico was ripe for revolt and annexation to the United States. Now there is no portion of the country so bitterly hostile to us and to our institutions. We have before us at Monterey paper of July, which reminds the disaffected of the atrocities committed at Matamoras, and adds that “the volunteers, the most unprincipled and ungovernable class at home, have been let loose like blood-hounds upon Mexico.” We fear that very soon there will be kindled a burning hatred towards us, which will make the timid Mexicans rally from every city, village, and rancho around the banner of their country, and fight with a courage and constancy worthy of the descendents of those renowned hero’s who conquered the fairest portion of America.

NNR 71.180-71.181 November 21, 1846 Gen. William Jenkins Worth’s general orders after the Battle of Monterey

"ARMY OF CAPITULATION."

GEN. WORTH’S GENERAL ORDER.

The following order was issued by the general to the officers and soldiers under his commander after the battle of Monterey.

Headquarters second division,
Monterey, September 28, 1846.

The commanding general of divisions seizes the first instant of leisure to tender to the officers and soldiers of his command the expression of his thanks and admiration. During the three days’ operations, and down to the final capitulation of this important position, until after they have seen nearly twice their numbers defile before them in retreat—whether on the fatiguing march, in combat, in the valley, or on mountains, on the house-tops or in the streets, this noble division has given an exhibition of courage, constancy, and discipline above all praise, and generous and mainly forbearance towards fallen and humiliated foes, which bear comparison with the proudest achievements that grace the annals of their country.

The general feels assured that every individual in the command unites with him in admiration of the distinguished gallantry and conduct of Col. Hays and his noble band of Texan volunteers. Hereafter they and we are brothers, and we can desire no better guarantee of success than by their association.

To Brig. General Smith, commanding 2d brigade; Lieut. Col. Stanford, 1st brigade; Lieut. Col. Childs, artillery battalion; Major Scott, 5th infantry; Capt. Miles, 7th infantry; Captain Smith, 2d artillery; commanding light troop; Captain Scriven, 8th infantry; to Captain Blanchard, Louisiana volunteers; Lieut. Col. Duncan and Lieut. Mackall he tenders all his thanks and respect. To the gentlemen of the staff, Major Monroe, chief of the artillery; Captain Saunders, military engineer; Lieut. Deas, division quarter master; Lieut. Daniels, division commissariat; Lieut. Meade, topographical engineers; Lieuts. Pemberton and Woods, Aids de-Camp, his special thanks are due, for the alacrity, zeal and gallantry with which they have performed every service. To Col. Peyton, Louisiana volunteers, who did him the honor to tender his very acceptable services as Aid de-Camp, he feels under special obligations for his valuable counsel and splendid exhibition of courage.

To the general himself, the highest and proudest gratification is, that such fortunate results have been attained with comparatively so small sacrifice of the precious blood of the soldier.

By order of Brig. Gen. Worth:

J. C. Pemberton,
1st Lieutenant and Aid de-Camp.

NNR 71.181 November 21, 1846 no token of submission on the part of the Mexicans

By the same correspondence which brought Com. Connor’s official account of his second attempt upon Alvarado, the New Orleans Picayune received Vera Cruz nates to the 22d October.

That paper says- In the first place we say in general terms, that in no paper which we have opened do we find any token of submission on the part of the Mexicans in their conflict with this country. Every paragraphs breaths threats of vengeance. Their losses are enumerated in detail, to found theirupon more urgent appeals to the patriotism of their citizens to give up everything for the support of the war. It is not too much for us to say that there is the warmest enthusiasm apparent in all that we read whether in editorial remarks or the military addresses with which the papers are crowded. The spirit all is, “war to the knife.” But this shows the surface of affairs only. We shall have occasion to notice incidents, which lead us to suspect the country is by no means so united as the crisis in her affairs would seem to demand. [MJK]

NNR 71.181 November 21, 1846 Gen. Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna’s letter on arrival at San Luis de Potosi, his seizure of a conducta of specie

The news of Santa Anna’s arrival at San Luis de Potosi. He did not reach there until the 8th of Oct. As every thing in regard to his movement is sought after, we annex his letter announcing his arrival:

Liberating army of the republic,

Headquarters, San Luis, Oct. 10, 1846.

Most Excellent Sir-On the evening of the 8th inst. I arrived at this capital, accompanied by my staff, and established therein the headquarters of the army of operations, destined to repel the unjust invasion made upon the republic by the army of the United States on the North.

I have the pleasure of saying to your excellency that my entrance into this state was made amidst the congratulations of a magnanimous people who have not ceased to bestow upon me profuse marks of consideration, and the same remark will apply to the authorities and public functionaries of all classes.

Oblige me by communicating these facts to his excellency, the general charged with the supreme executive power, and accept assurances of my consideration and esteem. God and Liberty.
To the secretary of war.

One of the first acts of the wily generalissimo was to supply himself with funds. This he did very effectually by seizing upon a conducta of specie thereby getting a hold of two millions of dollars. His pretext was that it was unsafe to forward this large amount of money to the sea coast in the present state of affairs. He gave receipts for the money and his individual bonds for its restoration. It must be confessed that this mode of supplying his coffers is infinitely more expeditious than advertising for a loan, and more acceptable to the people at large than a forced loan from the clergy. The accounts we give of this great financial stroke, we do not derive from Mexican papers, but have entire faith in the facts.—We trust they will be satisfactory to English merchants, and be acceptable as earnest of the security of the money they loaned Mexico on the mortgage of the Californias. We find Santa Anna’s letter, of the 10th ult. In the last paper before us. We regret to say that the papers give us no clue to his plan of operations. [MJK]

But while Santa Anna was on his way to San Luis he wrote back from Quertaro on the 3d of October, as follows: “the disaster which we encountered at Monterey is not so great as I at first thought. Our troops have left for Saltillo and have already occupied principal points of the Sierra. So far from the troops having become demoralized, I am assured that great enthusiasm prevails among them. Their success has cost the enemy, according to uncontestable evidence, more than fifteen hundred men. Our artillery was well managed and it is said that the enemy believe it was served by French officers.—

* I am now about to unfold all my character, with the energy which is habitual to me, and the Americans will very soon succumb, or I shall cease to exist.” Upon copying this effusion of Santa Anna, the Diario breaks forth: “May Heaven crown with the most brilliant results the patriotism of this illustrious child of his country, whom we ardently desire to see return to the capital covered with glory.” [MJK]

We now for the first time learn what the fruits of the Mexican derived from the seizure of our mails near Marin, intended for Gen. Taylor at Monterey. Among the multitude of papers forwarded by Ampudia to Santa Anna and the government, we find a letter from our secretary of war, Mr. Marcy, to General Taylor, revealing the design upon Tampico and San Luis Potosi. This letter is dated Washington, Sept. 2d, and though our account of the letter will be an old story at Washington, we may say here that the design of the secretary’s letter is to obtain general Taylor’s opinion, rather than dictate a line of proceeding from him. He is told what the government has thought of doing, and asks what he thinks about it. The government refers to him for information on various points—as to the difficulties of his own advance—whether he deems it advisable to continue his march upon San Luis de Potosi, and various kindred topics. The letter pursues its inquiries in the most respectful terms, deferring it to the better judgment of Gen. Taylor; but of course discloses our plans, the number of troops intended to be used at Tampico, and some other general particulars. The letter of general Ampudia covering Mr. Marcy’s dispatch, contains a singular paragraph, if in our haste we rightly apprehend it. It is to the following effect:—“Every moment which passes, confirms my idea of the immense advantages we have gained from fighting four consecutive days at Monterey, since the enemy entertains great respect for the Mexican soldier, and the American blood flowed with such profusion that from the generals of the enemy came the suggestion of an armistice of eight weeks, which disarms, as it were, a great part of his regular troops.” [MJK]

Since writing the above we have seen another positive ascertain made on the authority of Ampudia, that the idea of the armistice was suggested by the American officers, and the Mexicans were led to presume it was suggested by them because the greater part of our regulars were cut to pieces at Monterey. [MJK]

The Mexican accounts of the battle of Monterey are more numerous than have been published in the United States. As a matter of necessity they praise very highly the valor of their troops, and they insist upon the obstinacy and gallantry of the defense. The movement of Gen. Worth on the west side of the town are described as very brilliant. One fort taken by Gen. Worth is said to have been taken and retaken three several times—once by Gen. Mejia at the point of the bayonet, capturing at the same time 300 Americans and eight pieces of artillery. Some of their first accounts declare that Gen. Worth was killed. From Saltillo Gen. Ampudia wrote to his government demanding an investigation of his conduct, both before and after Gen. Taylor presented himself at Monterey. He courts scrutiny, alleging that, "as laws of honor and the good of his country are the only elements of his existence, his mind cannot be tranquil until the secretary of war, the supreme government, and the republic are satisfied with his conduct." The humble letter does not save him from the letter writers. They charge him with the grossest cowardice and incompetency. But we have neither time nor space to-day to enter further in the Mexican accounts of the battles. One thing we must note, however. Almost all their accounts say they refused to capitulate until we agreed to salute their flag. Before the two months' armistice expires, the Mexicans count confidently that Santa Anna will have an army around him which will prevent any further advance of Gen. Taylor.

The Mexican papers are full of the orders of Gen. Salas made through his secretaries, providing resources for the war. We have various circulars of Almonte, one of which is the nature of a manifesto and written with marked ability. [MJK]

NNR 71.181 November 21, 1846 Gen. Romulo Diaz de le Vega exchanged for Capt. Edward William Carpenter of the brig Truxton, &c.

EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS. Col. T. F. Hunt, U.S. army on Saturday, the 7th, notified officially to Gen. Vega and other Mexican officers, prisoners in N. Orleans, that they had been exchanged for Captain Carpenter and the crew of the brig Truxton. They were informed that they could proceed to Pensecola as soon as possible, when they would be taken on board one of the U.S. men-of-war to Vera Cruz. It was, however, left to the discretion of General Vega and the other gentlemen to return to their country by way of the Havana. The communication containing this information was dated Washington the 28th ultimo, and signed by Gen. Winfield Scott.

NNR 71.181-182 November 21, 1846 Mexican movements, their account of the Monterey affair, disputes over control of the reins of government, &c.

On the morning of the 14th of Oct. a rumor was circulated in the city of Mexico that some battalion of the National Guard designed to issue a pronunciamento, the object of which was to wrest the reins of government from Gen. Salas, on the ground that he was aiming to perpetuate his power and intended to seize upon the property of the commercial classes. This rumor was followed by another of dissensions in the cabinet, threatening the stability of the government. The multitude assembled in crowds about the palace, and at last Gen. Salas, accompanied by Senior Gomez Farias, appeared and addressed the people, endeavoring to soothe and quiet them. The general was received, says the government organ, with enthusiasm of the liveliest kind.

The excitement subsequently took a new turn.—Senor Cortina, the governor of the federal district of Mexico, was said to have given notice to the merchants that he could no longer guarantee the security of their property. The warehouses of the merchants were in fact closed in some quarters, and the owners, it was said, were arming themselves in order to protect their property. This led again to the assemblage of throngs of people deeply anxious to learn the facts, and Gen. Salas and Senior Ferrias again sallied forth and addressed the people, and succeeded in dispersing them quietly. All this commotion is attributed by the papers in favor of the government to the intrigues of the monarchists. The church is roundly berated for favoring the designs of the monarchists. The motives of the clergy were of course their dread lest the government should seize upon their revenue to carry the war against the United States. We find unequivocal indications in the papers that such a seizure would be a very natural and justifiable measure on the part of the government.

An express arrived at Vera Cruz on the 21st ult., which announced that during the night of the 18th there was another alarm in the capital, similar to that of the 14th, which was quieted, however, like that of the 14th, after some moments of convulsion. We bitterly regret these commotions, says El Indication, because if they are continued, they will infallibly produce our ruin. Our enemy is already in the heart of the country, and nothing but the union of our entire strength can save us. The government is unable to discharge its weighty obligations toward a foreign enemy, when confidence is thus shaken by unfounded alarms and the time of the government is wasted in preventing and dispelling them. [MJK]

NNR 71.182 November 21, 1846 circular of Minister Manuel Crecenio Rejon about resisting the enemies of the existing order

We annex a circular from the state department in regard to the last attempt made in the capital. It is the best mode of giving an insight into the internal affairs of the republic:
CIRCULAR

Ministry of Internal and Foreign Relations

SIR: The enemies of the existing orders of affairs, who are equally enemies of the public repose, have aimed this day to disturb the peaceable inhabitants of this city, by circulating alarming reports, pretending that private property was threatened and the citizens composing the National Guard were divid in opinion—all this being done with the corrupt purpose of perpetuating discord and preventing the assembling of that congress which is to organize the republic. Conduct do perilous at a moment of extreme peril for the independence of the country, is calculated to affect most deeply every true patriot and the people who eagerly sought to learn the origin of the alarm, and to place themselves around the supreme government. But the government, supported by public opinion, dictated the most efficacious precautionary measures, thanks to which, calm was reestablished, without a necessity of resort to force or any other arms than those of persuasion; and this people, which has been atrociously calumniated, afforded one more proof of the prudence, good sense, and moderation which it has so often given.

In the supplement of the Diario of this day, of which I send you copies, you will find the proclamation, issued is the circumstances by his excellency charged with the supreme executive power. Firm in his principles, he is determined to carry out the programme of the revolution commenced at Jalisco and seconded in the citadel of this capital. Standing upon this basis, he directs me to recommend to your excellency that you provide, with the most solicitous that in your state no foothold is found for the suggestions of the enemies of the plan of the citadel, who aim at nothing less than the destruction of the government. But on the contrary you are directed assiduously to provide for the security of public order and liberty, as well as rendering the assistance indispensable for the prosecution of the war in which the country is compromised.

I reiterate to you assurances of my regard. God and Liberty. REJON.

NNR 71.182 November 21, 1846 resignations of Senor Cortina and Minister Manuel Crecenio Rejon

Mexico, 14th October, 1846.

Circular to the governors of the state, and the political chief of territories.

Subsequently to this latter difficulty Senor Cortina sent in his resignation of his post. His letter is dated the 17th of October. He says that his services can be no longer useful to the government, as his views and wishes have been misrepresented; and he takes advantage of the order and tranquility which prevails in the capital to lay down his authority. The newspapers promise that he will follow up his resignation with an expose of his motives in taken a step which was regarded a very critical in the then existing state of affairs. The subject of these commotions in the capital is touched upon by the papers as a very grave one, and we cannot doubt it is so considered by the government, or the above circular would not have been issued. We have, however, the papers upon one side only, and are therefore unable to fathom the secret causes of the difficulty. The promoters of it are stigmatized in general terms as disorganizers, monarchists, and enemies of the country.

We may as well mention in this connection that Rejon, the author of the above circular, subsequently resigned his portfolio. We do not know his motives, but it indicated farther dissatisfaction. [MJK]

NNR 71.182 November 21, 1846 Mexicans perfectly apprised of sickness at Matamoras, their movements in defense of Vera Cruz

The Mexicans appear to be perfectly apprised of the state of things in Matamoras. Their accounts of the sickness which prevails there are quite minute. [MJK]

NNR 71.182 November 21, 1846 enthusiasm among Mexicans for the successful defense of Alvarado

The Mexicans have received intelligence that our government was about to send vessels of a large class against Vera Cruz. This led to an immediate call upon the troops in the interior to move to the defense of the city and fortress. From Jalapa we have the address of Col. Sayago to his battalion of National Guards. It is full of enthusiasm and alludes to the success obtained by the inhabitants of Alvarado over our forces, as but the prelude to other victories which await them. We find numerous military addresses of this kind, all alluding to Alvarado. [MJK]
In Jalapa volunteers are urged to come forward and be organized as light somewhat on the plan of "minute men" – to be ready at any moment to march to any point which may be assailed. The enemy evidently are [?] and are organizing [?]. [MJK]

El Indicator of the 22d October has an article eulogizing Gen. Basadre for his skill, tact, and judgment in bringing the reincorporation of Yucatan in the confederacy, notwithstanding the formidable obstacles which he encountered. [MJK]

Domingo Ibarra writes to the secretary from Puebla on the 18th of October that a battalion of troops styled "Libres de Puebla," a part of the National Guard, would leave that city on the following morning, on their way to Vera Cruz, in conformity of the orders of the war department. From other points, too, troops have gone to the same destination. [MJK]

The correspondence of the N, O. Picayune, furnishes a brief description of the principal redoubts of the enemy in the east and the north of the town, which will convey some idea of the difficulties that had to be overcome.

1st. A strong redoubt of masonry of four faces, with an open gorge of ten feet, prepared for four guns, overlooked and commanded by a large stone house in rear: prepared with sand-bags and loop holes for infantry.

2d. Strong redoubt of four faces, open gorge of twenty feet, prepared for three guns.

3d. Fleches of masonry for infantry.

4th. Tete de pont, in front of the bridge of the Purisina, a strong work of masonry for three guns.

5th. Strong redoubt for one gun, not occupied by the enemy.

6th. A strong redoubt of masonry for three guns overlooking the approaches from Cadereita, and commanding the gorge of No. 2.

7th. A strong redoubt of masonry for three guns, overlooked and commanded by a large stone house prepared for infantry with loop-holes and sand-bags. Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7 were connected by breast works of earth and brush for infantry, thus forming a complete line of defence from 4 to 7. Barricades of masonry, twelve feet thick, with embrasures for guns, were met with in every direction. The house tops and garden walls (reader will remember the peculiar construction of the house) were loop-holed throughout the city, and prepared with sand-bags for infantry defence.

8th. Fort Independence, or Citadel. - A large rectangular stone building, walls only standing, surrounding by an enclosed work of solid masonry, of four bastioned fronts, and prepared for thirty-one guns. A continued fire of artillery from this place was kept up during the 20th, 21st, 22d, and 23d. From No. 7 along the southern edge of the town, a stone wall four feet thick, and prepared with embrasures for guns and banquettes for infantry, extended beyond the plaza.

9th. Cathedral in main plaza, principle magazine of the enemy. [SCM]

Ramsay, of the Ordnance Department, who has all these things in charge, informs me that an immense quantity of musket cartridges have been fortified concealed in the city since the property named in the foregoing invoices was turned over by the enemy; also many other articles in the shape of arms and munitions. Much property no doubt remains yet concealed, As for provisions, enough was found in the city to subsist our army and the citizens a month, and it is known that the enemy carried off large quantities of ammunition and provisions during the attack." An officer of our Army writes, in relation to that part of Gen. Ampudia's proclamation which stated that the Mexicans were short of ammunition and provisions,—"that more ammunition was captured and surrendered than has been sent from the U. States for the use of the army of occupation since the was begun, and that the provisions found in the city have mainly subsisted the citizens and entire American forces ever since the capitulation, now more than two weeks, to say nothing of the amount permitted to be carried off by the Mexican army." SECOND ATTACK ON ALVARADO.

Of Antonia Lizardo, October 13, 1846.

GENTLEMEN: We are on the eve of another attack on Alvarado. At 5 o'clock this afternoon com. Conner issued orders for the sailing of the squadron (frigates and reritan excepted) for the mouth of the Alvarado river. The Commodore takes command of the expedition un person, making use of the steamer Vixen as his flag ship for the occasion. One o'clock tomorrow morning ids the hour fixed for getting under weigh, and already the steamers Mississippi, Vixen, and McLane are firing up. Besides these vessels the force consists of the revenue cutter Forward, schooners Reefer, Petrel, and Bonito, and prize schooner Nonata. This latter vessel was recently captured from the Mexicans and and was formerly the American schooner Belle, out of your port. She now mounts four 42 pound cannonades. For the past month we have been drilling our men as infantry upon a small island here, and Jack is so anxious for a fight that he marks time with a good grace, and everyone appears pleased, that at last we are to have a chance at the enemy.

At the mouth of the river the Mexicans have a ten gun battery, and we know of a brig of war and two guns boats being anchored inside. A number of their small merchantmen have taken refuge in the harbor, and there must be a smart sprinkling of prize money in store for us.

October 16. Our sailing orders for the morning of the 14th were commanded in consequence of its blowing to fresh for operations-occasioning a delay of the expedition for twenty-four hours. We sailed, however, at 1 o'clock A.M. yesterday, but I regret to say that we are all at anchor again to-day and Alvarado is yet in possession of the Mexicans.

You were pleased to call the former attack on Alvarado an abortion, and I suppose you will not be sparing of hard names for the greatest failure; but I trust that when you examine the facts of the case, you will understand that it was owing to the efiiciency of the means at the disposal of Com. Conner, and to the natural defences of the place itself, that we have not been successful, rather than to any want of skill or courage on his part, or lack of spirit and support by the officers and men under his command.

We were within ten miles of the mouth of the river at daylight and stood slowly into shore, it being dead calm-the Vixen and McLane towing the schooners-the Mississippi anchored at long shot distance and commenced her fire. Up to this time everything seemed favorable for the success of the expedition. There being a heavy swell on the bar the pilots declined taking there vessels over. The commodore leading in the Vixen, with the rest of the force following, passed by the fort, each vessel firing her broadside as she ranged ahead, with but little effect, however, owing to the distance. A long eighteen in the forward sent a shot directly into the fort-this movement was completed with better success, the distance being lessened and again the Forward made a most beautiful shot. In the meanwhile the Mississippi had closed up and was exploding her Paixhans about the heads of the Mexicans in a way that must have made some of them see more stars than the Lord had ever made. One shot from her dismounted a heavy gun of theirs from a stockade, this they soon remedied, but thus far all their shot had fallen short. During the morning several of our boats surrounded within a half mile of the fort, receiving the fire of the enemy with as much impunity as indifference. The swell on the bar having somewhat subsided at 1 P.M., the time was formed as follows. Steamer Vixen, flagship, towing gunboats Reefer, and Bonita; steamer McLane, toeing the Nonata; cutter Forward and gunboat Petrel; then two launchers, three cutters and a barge, but the McLane stuck fast, and the commodore finding himself deprived of two thirds of his force, and being unable to sustain the fire of a twelve gun battery with but four light pieces of his own, was obliged to retreat. The force in the boats was now exposed to heavy fire, the shot flying thick and fast around us, and had the Mexicans fired grape it would have knocked some of us into fits. We escaped however, with a good ducking from the spray of the balls.

It being now too late in the day for any further operations, signal was made for return for anchorage, and thus ended this bloodless combat, bloodless not because each and every man of us would not have shed our hearts best to gain the day, not because our plan of attack was not good, or that we were not properly led, but because Providence has provided the enemy with such natural defences as cannot be overcome by a naval attack with such means as Commander Conner has at his disposal. The McLane is an abominable abortion, (to make use of your own word,) drawing too much water to be serviceable, and with not sufficient power to drive her over three and a half knots an hour-but it is due to Capt. Howard to say that as soon as he got this vessel afloat again he proffered to make another attempt to pass the bar, but the commodore declined, as it was now too late in the afternoon.

There remains one way to take this Alvarado, and mark my words, it will be done before many weeks; meanwhile we must expect to be severely handled by the newspapers at home, and by the people who expect us to accomplish impossibilities and gain glory on a field where none is to be won-although no man, with two ideas in his head, who witnessed our recent defeat can attribute blame to any one. [MJK] command of Com. Perry, left Anton Lizardo for an attack on Tobasco. On the morning of the 17th, the Mississippi made a prize of the American bark Coosa. Capt. Hickling, off Alvarado river, and sent her to this place upon suspicion of her being about to land her cargo on the Mexican coast. This vessel was cleared from New Orleans on the 3d inst. for Havana, by Messrs. Wythe & Egana, with 1,600 bales of cotton, put up in 200 pound bales, and there appears good reason to suppose that it was intended for Mexico. She will sail for your port on the 27th, in charge of passed midshipman Barrett, son of one of your former collectors.

To day, another prize, the Yucatan schooner "El Telegrafo," arrived from the Tobasco expedition on the 22nd, and reports the fleet standing off the land waiting for weather to go into the river.

Yours,
R.A.

[NRR 71.185 November 21, 1846 movements on the Pacific coast, expedition against San Diego, Com. Robert Field Stockton takes San Pedro, California ports occupied]

PACIFIC SQUADRON. Accounts from the Pacific of August 22, afford us some interesting particulars: On the 22d of July, Commodore Stockton assumed command of the United States Naval Forces on the west coast of Mexico. On the 25th, the "Cyane" with the "California company of mounted riflemen," under Col. Fremont, sailed from Monterey for San Diego, that they might be landed southward of the Mexican forces, amounting to 500 men, under Gen. Castro and Gov. Pico, who were all well fortified at the camp of the Mesa, three miles from the "city of the Angels." A few days after, Commodore Stockton, in the "Congress" sailed for San Pedro, where he landed with his gallant sailor army, and marched directly for the redoubtable "camp of the Mesa." When he had come within 12 miles of the camp, General Castro broke ground and ran for the city of Mexico. The governor of the territory, and the other principal officers, separated in different parties; and on the 13th August, having been joined by Col. Fremont and 80 riflemen, and by Mr. Larkin, late American consul, the commodore entered the famous "Ciudad de los Angelos," the capital of the Californias, and took quiet possession of the government house. Most of the principal officers were subsequently taken.

The American force thus chased the Mexican army more than 300 miles along the coast; pursued them 30 miles in the interior of their country; routed and dispersed them, and secured quiet possession of their territory.

The "Congress" was to sail in a few days on a cruise for the protection of our commerce, and the remaining vessels of the squadron were to be disposed with a view to the same object, so far as they could be spared from the blockade of the southern coast.

The President's proclamation, and the congressional proceedings in reference to the war, were first received by Commodore Stockton (in a Mexican account) on the 19th of August, by the United States ship Warren, from Mazatian. The flag of the United States is now flying from every commanding position in the territory of California.

The patriotism and courage of the men who accompanied the commodore on this expedition after Castro, are spoken of in the highest terms. Their march was trying and hazardous, perhaps longer than has ever been made in the interior of a country by sailors after an enemy.—

Wash. Union. The John Adams U.S. ship, Commander McCluney, sailed on the 4th inst. from Pensacola for Vera Cruz. [KMK]

PRIZES.- Bark Coosa, recently seized off Alvarado by the U. States Squadron, arrived at New Orleans on the 10th instant, in charge of Passed Midshipman Barrett.

The Mexican prize schooner Telegraph, taken by the U.S. steamship Mississippi of Tabasco, was brought up to the fleet on the 16th ult. [KMK]

On Friday evening, November 6, 1846: Mr. President and Fellow Citizens: I had not anticipated the pleasure of being present on this occasion. It is my wish rather to avoid, than to seek opportunities of addressing large public bodies. While it is my purpose to discharge, as well as I am able, the duties which devolve on me, as a citizen of the Gentlemen, since some little while— I think about six or seven weeks ago—great changes have taken place, not only with regard to political parties, but with respect to the great political prospects of the country.

There are many of my fellow citizens who heard me on a former occasion, and many gentlemen here present, this evening, who have heard me declare that it was difficult, and always would be difficult, to maintain such principles unless we could make an impression for the good upon the great central portion of our Union. We had done excellently in the east—excellently in the south, and in the southeast—and excellently in the steady west. But nevertheless, while New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio were against us our difficulty was great. We required them to come forward in the great work of maintaining sound whig principles. Here was our hope. And now or later, to-morrow if not to-day, we trusted that they would array themselves on the right side.

That day has come. (Great cheering.) The brightening of that morning has dawned upon us— and they are here, to-day, not against us, but with us.

(Renewed applause.) Gentlemen, let me remind you that every election, since the policy of the administration has been developed, has been, more or less, adverse to that administration. The results in Maryland, in New Jersey, in Florida, in Georgia, in Ohio, in Pennsylvania, in New York, (loud cheers,) all prove this. And will any man say, can any one suggest, that one single state has sanctioned the policy of the present administration? The most recent denomination has been in New York. (Enthusiastic applause.) The state of this election is very well known to all of you, and I do not know of anything new to communicate, except the following telegraphic dispatch, dated at five o’clock this afternoon—which I will read—

"The good news of yesterday is more than confirmed by telegraph from Buffalo and through this P.M. John Young’s majority will not be less than 11,000; 23 whigs are elected to congress out of 34, and at least 70 whig members of assembly out of the 128. Under the term "whigs" we do not include any ‘anti-renters’ or ‘hunkers.’ Massachusetts will respond to this next Monday, will she not? Gentlemen, will not Massachusetts respond? (Immense cheering.) Now gentlemen, there remains an important question to be answered. It is this. What has produced this great change in the political policy of the people? And upon this question I confine my remarks to the state of New York, the change in which is the most recent and important of all.

And what is it? It has been said by some that the anti-rent vote, the universal suffrage vote, &c., would greatly affect the result. We have also heard it said that the personal enemies of Gov. Wright would turn the scale of the election. But let me assure you that the case lies deeper than all this.

There are counties on the river which have given positive whig majorities—such as Long Island, and the river counties—wherein the question did not turn upon the local questions affecting the personal choice of members. But, throwing aside these returns for the assembly, and all the local questions connected with them, it is now certain that the whigs have elected the governor of New York by 11,000 or 12,000 majority. Not only is this a very handsome majority for the governor, but when we look at the congressional delegation, we find that more than two thirds (cheers) are ours. (Cheering.) Throughout the whole state we ran for members of congress, and throughout the whole state we are far ahead. But instead of choosing 23, the whigs ought to have chosen 26 members. Unhappily, in the city, and in Kings’ county, the whigs and the native republicans were divided.

Now, the native republicans and the whigs are divided. Amongst the former I must say there are men of intelligence, and I am glad to say men of the best character. They have all great personal and political respectability, and I should be glad if all could be chosen. I should be happy, too, could, at the same time, some others of our candidates for congress have been elected. James Munroe, inheriting not only the name, but the virtues of his ancestor, Van Wagenen, Phoenix. Unhappily this division amongst our party, and amongst the agents we employed, defeated all, and let in the enemy.

This let in the enemy. This was unhappy. But it does not become me to impute blame to any body, on this account. It was one of the infirmities of human nature.

Gentlemen, I shall go, on Monday, to the meeting in the town in which I live, and there deposit my vote. (Loud applause.) I shall find many well meaning men who differ from me, though they do not write "conscience" upon their flag. Some of my worthy neighbors will give their votes for the candidates of the 3d party, with the certainty that their votes can only avail to keep the district unrepresented, or let in the opposition candidate. I wish, that upon this subject, I could address myself—feeble as my voice may be—to every voter in the district in which I live.

The evil which threatens us is not to be overcome by railing or reproach, but by reasoning with our neighbors—by representing to them the true consequences of their conduct—and by showing them its inevitable result. It is as clear as anything can be, that those persons who voted the third party ticket in 1844, suffered Mr. Polk to be elected and Texas to be annexed. And therefore, so far as their permission extended, they suffered what we call the Mexican war to be suffered upon us. The Mexican war! It was proclaimed on the house-tops by the opposition, that the annexation of Texas would involve a war with Mexico, and denied by the other side. And yet those who professed to be the most zealous of peaceful annexation, did just what they could to bring about a war.

But to return to the causes which have brought about these changes in the middle states. What has caused this change? It is all to be referred to the recent measures of congress, not owing to the change of fifty or a hundred here and there. in the state of New York, but because the reflecting men of all parties—the masses, the troops, have come over from the opposite side and voted the whig ticket. In the most effectual manner they have signified their utter disapprobation of the war, the new tariff, the sub-treasury, and the various other projects of the administration. Tried on this standard, New York has gone whig, and especially as to members of congress has she gone whig out and out. There results here opens quite a new view— it opens quite new prospects; and if, as I trust, the whigs will act becomingly and moderately, and discreetly, we shall hold the majority we have gained.

Gentlemen, I do not suppose that the sub-treasury did much for the administration in New York. That is not yet in operation, and its benefits are not yet perceived. (Laughter.) Much as is the influence of the Union, it cannot refer all these results to the sub-treasury, either on one side of the other. The tariff and the war have had their share of these.

The Mexican war is universally odious throughout the United States, and we have yet to find any Sempronius who raises his voice for it.

(Here some one in the gallery asked Mr. Webster who voted for the war. He replied, "nobody at all. The president made it without any vote whatever." Tremendous applause.)

And that leads me to say that the war, in its origin, was a presidential war. But the constitution declares that congress alone shall have the power of declaring war; and I beg to know where, when they so declared it. Every one does know that our army was ordered, by the president, to advance from the Nueces to the Rio Grande, thereby invading a foreign territory. And because the Mexicans resisted this encroachment on their soil, we have next the proclamation of the president that war exists between Mexico and the United States. The proclamation of the president stated that explicitly.

But, gentlemen, there is another question here— Texas had become a part of this Union. We had received her as a state, and had assumed her boundary—the Nueces. Why should we not treat with Mexico for that? Why, when all new territory of the United States was bounded by the Nueces, and everything beyond that was claimed by Mexico; and in the actual occupation of Mexico—why, then, I say, should the president of the United States have ordered the army south of the Nueces, to take possession of Mexican land? That was the origin of the war, and that was against the spirit of the constitution of the United States. (Vehement applause.) Congress alone has the power to declare war, and yet it is obvious, under the present construction, that if the president is resolved to involve the country in a war, he may do it.
This, I say, is a great misjudgement on the part of the president; it is a clear violation of his duty; in my judgment it is an impeachable offence. (Great cheering.)

The great objection to this war is, that it is illegal in its character. There has been a great violation of duty on the part of the president. He has plunged the country into war, whereas, unless in case of invasion of our actual limits, he has no right to do so. In that case of such invasion, the power does exist in the president to take measures to repel aggression.
But to go out of our limits, and declare war for a foreign occupation of what does not belong to us, is no part of the power invested in our president by our constitution.

So much for the origin of the war.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak with all soberness in this respect, and I would say nothing, here, tonight, which I would not say in my place in congress, or before the whole world. The question now is, for what purpose, and to what ends is this present war to be prosecuted.

And in speaking of this, let me, in the first place, put myself right before the people. Individually, I have no respect for the government of Mexico. The people of that country are the worst governed on the face of the earth. They are subject wholly to military despotism, and it matters not whether Fareles, Almonte, Santa Anna, Ampudia, or any one else wields the supreme power.

And I say, also, that Mexico should have come to terms with us before. The United States have well-founded claims against Mexico. There is no doubt of that. And I have as little doubt, and as little hesitation, in saying that Mexico has behaved most wrongfully towards us. She has acted ruinously for her own interests, and injuriously for her own character, in all respects.

Mexico is a republic professedly formed on our own model. I could wish—we all wish—that she could find amongst her sons another Washington. But the truth must be told. And the truth is, that all republics made out of Spanish dominions in America, have been miserable failures. Mexico, especially, has no principles of free government about her at all.

But to indulge these considerations is not to discharge our own duty of inquiry into the objects and ends of this war. Who knows anything about the war, except that our armies have reached to Monterey, and will reach to Mexico if they can.
(Applause.) And what then? Is the whole country to be fortified—taken possession of as American territory—a territory equal to the formation of forty new states? These are questions which it is time for us to put with sobriety and seriousness. It is time for us to know what are the objects and designs of our government.

The people of these United States are not in the habit of calculating, when a right is to be asserted, what will be the expense, but on an occasion of this kind they will be very apt to ask what the speculation will cost. I have been at some pains to ascertain the facts of this respect, and I submit to your consideration the results to which I have arrived.
It appears from the monthly statements of the treasury of the U. States, that the balance in the treasury on the Making the excess of expenditures (beyond receipts) for 5 months $9,014,000.

The excess being at the rate per annum of $21,633,600.

According to the President’s message to congress last December, the receipts for the year ending 30th June, 1845 were $29,769,000. If they are the same the present year, it would appear that the government is expending money at the rate of $51,000,000 per annum. But as payments are, probably, not made so fast as debts in incurred, it may, I think, be fairly estimated that our present annual expenses are at least double the revenue, that is to say - at least $60,000,000.

So that the result is that the government, for the last five months, has been paying at the rate of sixty million per annum, or twice the amount of the revenue. And this does not include the outstanding claims.

All this has to be met. And how is it to be met? Congress has given authority to the secretary of the treasury to issue treasury notes, and to effect a loan. The notes have been issued, and the loan has been applied for - at a high rate of interest, 6 per cent. But as the existing debt is not above par, it is doubtful whether the new issue can be obtained on favorable terms.

And here it appears the absurdity of the sub-treasury scheme. And I must say, that if the government were to set itself at work most effectually to thwart its own financial measures, it could not contrive a better means than the sub-treasury for that purpose. Government, for instance, asks for a loan now, and obtains a loan from the capitalists. In January next, it requires another loan to say ten millions, all to be paid in specie. Where will it be found? It would require all the specie in New York and Boston to make the sum. As the matter now stands, the scheme is impracticable; by its operation, if carried into effect, the wheels of government would be clogged; the administration would be obstructed upon its own course, and government would be deprived of all means of action.

It is agreed by all that the administration is not, at present, remarkably strong in financial affairs, taking into consideration the present war - and it seems to be pretty certain that it will be hard work, rather an up-hill business, to carry that war on. And provided that every dollar which government gets locked up, is required by the sub-treasury act, the machine will soon come to a standstill.

Gentlemen, let me refer you to the tariff. That question was one of the causes which operated largely in the recent New York election. In counties where, for many years before, we had not been able to secure a majority any where, the whigs have now majorities in every town in district. The tariff law of 1846 is found to strike directly at the labor of the country and the interests of labor. (Prolonged cheering.) I have asked a friend of mine what caused the remarkable change in his district, in New York, and he replied that this was not an agricultural, but a manufacturing district, and the new law was a death blow to nearly all its interests. So of nearly all places where manufacturers are established.

Mr. Chairman, it is the Mexican war, the tariff of 1846, and the presidential vetoes, which have produced the great changes we see around us.

Sir, there are two surprises which have been sprung upon the people of the United States, The first was the nomination of Mr. Polk at the Baltimore convention – for surely no people was less prepared for any great event than this people for the nomination. (Applause) When the event was first made known, as you are all aware, the great question was, “Who, under heaven is James K. Polk?” But party allegiance was so strong that it overcame the surprise, and convinced the people that Mr. Polk was an especial fit man to maintain and support the interests of the country, and the interests of Pennsylvania in particular. (Laughter.) The second surprise was the Mexican war. Who expected that? But upon the 11th of May the war did exist, according to the president’s declaration. Our army was then in a critical condition. I had then, gentlemen, occasion to be absent from congress and at home, never anticipating such a state of things. The war bill which you have so often heard referred to, passed on the 11th, fourteen members voting against it in the house and two in the senate. And upon what ground was it passed? Surely on the part of the whigs, that the country was unexpectedly in a state of war—that our army was in an exposed situation—and that it was absolutely necessary to sustain them. I arrived in Washington a few days afterwards, and never did I hear the suggestion from anybody, that a vote for that bill involved an approval of the course of the administration. Never did I hear such a thing then.

Your excellent representative—than whom very few men, indeed, enjoy more the esteem, respect and confidence of the great whig party of the U. States—(tremendous cheering.) was one who voted for the bill. The opposition to it, and to him, springs up here and no where else. The members from the liberty loving state of Vermont, those from Connecticut—are they accused? And Amos Abbot, from your third district—is there a voice raised against him? Mr. Vinton, of Ohio, one of the most able, intelligent and influential members of congress, and for whom every whig member would this day, with all his heart, cast his vote for speaker—was any thing said against him? Not one word.

Fellow citizens, I am grieved, sorry, that at this late time a clamor should be raised against your member for his vote on that occasion. I do not think it quite fair—it is not reasonable or just—it is not at all like Boston. (Great approbation.) Sir, we live in a day of uncommon prosperity. Heaven has been gracious to us, beyond our hopes. We have been blessed with health. Education has flourished. Commerce and agriculture are prosperous. We have an enterprising and thriving population. But, Mr. Chairman, excesses sometimes lead to discontent, and I am afraid that something of that nature is the case with us. While I admit that the genial influences of our climate, the character of our soil, the energy of our people, much of this prosperity is owing, I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that the protective power over all these—carrying us onward to honor and renown—is the Constitution of the United States. (A tremendous burst of cheers.) And it is, therefore, with the greatest regret, that I hear any suggestions of doing away with that instrument. (Renewed shouts.) I entertain no such counsel. (Cheers.) I am for taking the constitution as out fathers left it to us, and standing by it, and dying by it. (Vehement cheers.) I agree that it has been violated. The admission of Texas—another slave holding state—was a violation of the constitution. But, how was that accomplished? I would indulge in no bitter expressions against our southern brethren. They had education, and hate, and prejudice, all to sustain them in their course. But what shall we say of those members of congress from the north—from New Hampshire, and Connecticut, and Maine—who voted for it? How they so acted, and why they so acted, is almost utterly incomprehensible. How they have since been rejected by the people, is comprehensible enough. (Laughter.) I agree that the annexation of Texas struck a blow at the influence of free institutions. New England might have prevented it if she would, but her people would not be roused. Thank God I did not slumber over that danger. (Cheering.) But if the constitution be violated—what is our duty? To destroy it? To cast it aside? Surely not. But to renovate and restore it. To be more alive to our own duties under it, and more earnest in performing them. If we are true to ourselves, let me say to you, there can never be another annexation of slave territory to this union under heaven. Never—never! (Vociferous plaudits.) But if the people, under the influence of party feelings, and for the sake of the dry and stale loaves and fishes in the gift of party, shall neglect their duty—then there is no limit to such annexation, from the Rio Grande to Patagonia.

Gentlemen, has not the constitution given this people great prosperity? Has not our commerce flourished under it? Has it not made our flag honored and respected in every sea on earth? Has it not festered our manufacturers? Where would our Massachusetts have been without it? Not the Massachusetts she is now.

I will not, I cannot contemplate—I cannot endure to turn my eyes to the state of things consequent on an abandonment of the constitution.

Some have spoken of it as violated, and therefore at an end. But it is not plain that to abrogate it involves the abandonment of oaths—the perpetration of violence—the shedding of blood—the existence of civil war? To speak disunion, therefore, without violence and bloodshed is nonsense. We may, it is true, make a revolution more or less bloody—but it will be a revolution still.

Sir, no true whig can, for a moment contemplate disunion. The project has been charged upon the whig party, but it is a false charge. (Immense and long continuous cheers.) From the Orient to the extremity of the west, an American is known—not as a citizen of Massachusetts or any other state—but as a citizen of the United States. It is the union which gives us our character abroad—and may we all and ever—in the language of the Father of his Country—“frown indignantly” on all attempts to dissever it. (Applause.) It was formed amidst the agitation of the whole European world. The subsequent storms which convulsed that quarter of the globe reached us likewise, and what carried us safely through them? What but this constitution of the United States? With Him at the helm, the constitution was the ark which bore us over the political ocean of the world, agitated by a thousand whirlpools, as if Eolus had let loose all his winds—and while in Europe there was but one Palinurus who is generally spoken of as the pilot who “weathered the storm” we had in America a yet greater pilot, who not only “weathered” the storm, but controlled it. (Loud applause.) This constitution therefore, is the rallying point of all true Whigs, and should be so, forever. (Vehement cheers.) If we were now to say, because we suffer some temporary grievance from its provisions, that therefore we would destroy it, get rid of it, we should act as wisely as if we struck down the sun from heaven, because the moon sometimes eclipses his light, or a cloud passes over his dise.
General Prefecture of Upper California.

Your Excellency:

In my note on the 5th of last March, I informed the supreme government of the arrival of several families coming from the United States, who came from the Sacramento River, and of the measures taken to make them leave the department in the coming month of May, for not having brought the legal passports; and of the news communicated by an officer who also entered by the same road a few days afterwards, with an armed party, announcing that during the past winter a considerable number of individuals who were persecuted for their religious opinions were to leave the states for this country; and here I should inform your excellency of the result of the line of conduct observed by the said officer, to whose affairs I referred in my note of the 6th instant, making reference to my sally from this point in consequence of the intimation given to Don J.C. Fremont, that he should retire from the within limits of this department, as was expressly instructed in the order of 12th July, 1844.

This officer, failing in the respect due to the laws of the republic and the authorities of the country introduced himself into the midst of the population of the department with a respectable force, under pretext of coming with a scientific commission from his government; and treating with contempt the notice referred to, he took possession of the heights of the Sierra nearest to this point, distant about nine leagues, having only made a verbal answer as to what would be in the conduct of the military command under him in his camp, which was, that they did not intend to obey the order to retire, but would remain on that spot prepared to resist any force that should attack on them.

It not being possible to endure such a haughty answer, in obedience to the authorities of this place, all the neighborhood collected at this command with the most lively enthusiasm, and having organized a force of 150 men, I went to the vicinity of the Sierra where the said Fremont had entrenched [parapetado] himself under the American flag which he had had the audacity to raise there. I was prepared to attack him in the night of the 10th of the same month, when the said officer taking advantage of the darkness, abandoned the fortification, without doubt precipitately, as we found there the next day some iron instruments and other things belonging to his equipment, and, in trying to find the trail, to know which direction they took, it was impossible for me to know on account of their having withdrawn in complete dispersion: this obliged me to stay for some days in that neighborhood until, by some individuals who came from the valley of the Tulares to my camp, I was informed that the adventurers were taking the road by the river to the north into the desert country.

The wish to give the supreme government immediate knowledge of this event has rendered it necessary for me to hire a vessel which will sail at once for Acapulco, carrying Captain Andres Castillero, commissioner for the supreme government in this department, which individual, notwithstanding his delicate health, undertakes this step alone in a wish to do a service to this country in particular and the nation in general.

The accompanying letter, translated into Spanish, written to the American consul at this port by Capt. Fremont from the camp he occupied during the days referred to, will be proof of the decision made by this individual to maintain his position, without doubt in the hope of uniting to his forces the American adventurers who are disseminated among the pueblos of the department; but this did not happen, on account of the rapid movements made by the population of the north in consequence of my foresight alarming them in a manner which should suffocate in its cradle and such extravagant design, as it effectually did in the province of Sonora, in which there are indications of having intended to second the views of Captain Fremont, on which affair I occupy myself with some caution to investigate the truth of such event with all suitable precaution, operating with the military commandant of that frontier Lieutenant Colonel Mariano Guadalupe Vallejo.

This will enable your excellency to lay all the matter before his excellency the Senior President of the republic, accepting at the same time my assurances of obedience and respect.

God and liberty, Monterey, in Upper California, April 1st, 1846.

JOSE CASTRO

TO THE DEPARTMENT OF WAR AND NAVY.

Official letters from Mr. Larkin, United States consul at Monterey, of Upper California, to Mr. Buchanan, Secretary of State.

Prefecture of the Second District.
The undersigned, prefect of this district, has the honor of applying to the consul of the United States of the north, by this note, asking if he will favor the prefectory under his charge with an information of the object or commission with which an officer (now residing in your house) has arrived at this district with troops from the aforesaid republic, and has advanced as far as the river Sacramento, that he may be able to do the same to his excellency the governor of the department.

The undersigned embraces this opportunity of renewing to the senior consul of the United States his highest respect and consideration.

MANUEL CASTRO

TO THOMAS O. LARKIN
CONSUL UNITED STATES, MONTEREY.

----------------------------------------
Consulate of the United States of America,
Monterey, California, January 29th, 1846.

The undersigned, consul of the United States of America, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this morning; requesting information respecting the motives Capt. J.C. Fremont, of the United States army, has in visiting this country. The undersigned is informed by Capt. Fremont that he has been ordered to survey the most practicable route from the United States to the Pacific ocean—that he has left his company consisting of fifty hired men (not of the United States army) on the frontiers of this department for the purpose of resting themselves and animals. He has come himself to Monterey to obtain clothing, and funds to purchase animals and provisions; and when his men are recruited, intends to continue his journey to the Oregon territory.

The undersigned has the honor to offer to the senior prefect the highest esteem and consideration.

THOMAS O. LARKIN

TO THE SENIOR PREFECT OF THE SECOND DISTRICT, D. MANUAL CASTRO

----------------------------------------
Prefecture of the Second District.

The undersigned, prefect of this district, has received the note of the consul of the United States, Mr. Thomas O. Larkin, dated 6th inst.; and in answer thereto, has the honor to say that far from replying in it that he will order that captain of the United States army, J.C. Fremont, to leave immediately with his force of armed troops (according to the acceptation of the word camp which he uses in his communication) the limits of this department, transgressing the principles established amongst civilized nations, he defends his unjust introduction. The undersigned, when he ordered Capt. Fremont to march back, founded himself on repeated orders and decrees of the supreme government of the Mexican republic which prohibits the introduction not only of troops belonging to any power, but even that of foreigners who do not come provided with legal passports, and not on false reports and false appearances, as the consul of the United States says in his said note. The undersigned promises the consul of the United States that as far as lays in his power, those persons who are subject to the laws of the country and may harass the subjects of his nation, who are under the protection of said laws, shall be punished according to the same, after the necessary proof shall be given and the necessary formalities gone through. The undersigned makes known to the consul of the United States; that if he desires to avoid that the force of Capt. Fremont may come to an unfortunate end in meeting with the force of this department, he ought to inform said Capt. Fremont that since he entered this department with an armed force, whether through malice or error, he must now either blindly obeys the authorities, or, on the contrary, experience the misfortunes which he has sought by his crimes.

God and Liberty! Monterey, March 8th, 1846.

The undersigned reiterates, &c. &c.

[No.79]

Consulate of the U.S. Monterey California, March 6th, 1846
Sir: The undersigned, consul of the United States, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your official note yesterday containing a copy of your letter and orders to Capt. J.C. Fremont, United States army, now camped near the Salines river with his men, to leave this country immediately.

The undersigned understood that your letter was yesterday carried to Captain Fremont by officer having some eight or ten men under his charge, and that at this moment there is a large number of armed men collecting in this town for the purpose of going to the camp of that American officer; he would therefore take the liberty of saying, that although he is well aware that you, as a Mexican officer and patriot, are bound to take every step that may redound to the integrity and interest of your country, he would further observe that his countrymen must not be unnecessarily harassed from causes that may arise from false reports and false appearances, and would recommend that if any party is going to the camp of Capt. Fremont that it may be commanded by a trustworthy and experienced officer, which may prevent affairs, on the meeting of the two parties, from being brought to some unhappy conclusion.

The undersigned has the honor to subscribe himself as your most obedient servant,

THOMAS O. LARKIN

To Senor Jose Castro, commandant general, and D. Manuel Castro, Perfecto of the second district, California

[Copy No.80]

Consulate of the U.S.,
Monterey, California, March 8, 1846.

Sir: With this you have my consolar answer to the general and prefecto’s letter to you of last week, of which I had the honor to receive copies from them; I also add the honor and prefecto’s second letter to me of this day. By your messenger of last week, I forwarded some United States newspapers, a Spanish grammar, some magazines, and English copies of the general and prefecto’s letters to you on the 5th instant. I then informed you that there was an American brig (brig Hannah, of Salem) at anchor in this port, bound to Mazatlan, whose supercargo I had requested to remain here until the third day, to enable you to send letters to the United States, if you were so inclined. I cannot tell whether my letter reached you, but heard of your man being almost at your camp the day before yesterday. I have now to inform you (and my information is derived from the current reports of the day) that General Castro was on the plain last night, with about sixty people; many more from the rancho joined him to day; at this moment some forty men are preparing to leave Monterey to join the party. I should think tomorrow, he might have two hundred men, perhaps more; many of the common people will join through choice, others by being so ordered by the general. Among the other class, there are some looking on the affair with indifference, some perhaps with favor to either side, as their friendship to the present authorities, or their own interests may govern them. Respecting the result there are various opinions. It is not for me to point to you your line of conduct; you have your government instructions; my knowledge of your character obliges me to believe you will follow them; you are, of course, taking every care and safeguard to protect your men, but not knowing your actual situation, and the people who surround you, your care may prove to be insufficient. You are officially ordered to leave the country; I am sure you will use your own discretion on the subject; your danger may remain in supposing that no uncommon means will be taken for your expulsion, although the expression of the common people under the passions of the moment, breathe vengeance in every form against you. I cannot conclude that so much will be put in force, should they succeed in overpowering you. Therefore only wish you to suppose yourself in a situation where you must take every measure to prevent a surprise from those you may consider partly friends. Should my ideas be correct, the act perhaps will originate, not from their heads, or the respectability of the country, but from those of a more headstrong class, who have fought so many (called) battles, may consider themselves invincible.

Your encamping so near town has caused much excitement – the natives are firm in the belief that they will break you up, and that you can be entirely destroyed by their power. In all probability they will attack you; the result either way may cause trouble hereafter to resident Americans. I, myself, have no fear on the subject, yet believe the present state of affairs may cause an interruption to business. Should it be impossible or inconvenient for you to leave California at present, I think, in a proper representation to the general and prefecto, an arrangement could be made for your camp to be continued, but at some greater distance; which arrangement I should advise, if you can offer it. I never make to this government an unreasonable request, therefore never expect a denial, and have for many years found them well disposed to me. You cannot well leave your people. Should you wish to see me, I will immediately visit your camp. Please answer directly by the bearer.

I am yours, very Truly in heart,

THOMAS O. LARKIN.

Captain J.C. Fremont,
United States army, Alisal

Note in pencil from Captain Fremont to the consul Larkin, from his entrenched camp at Alisal, on the Sierra, thirty miles from Monterey, March 10, 1846.
My dear sir: I this moment received your letters, and without waiting to read them, acknowledge the receipt which the courier requires immediately. I am making myself as strong as possible in the intention that if we are unjustly attacked we will fight to extremity and refuse quarter, trusting to our country to avenge our death. No one has reached our camp, and from the heights we are able to see troops (with the glass) mustering at St. John’s and preparing cannon. I thank you for your kindness and good wishes, and would write more at length as to my intentions did I not fear that my letter would be intercepted. We have in no wise done wrong to the people or the authorities of the country, and if we are hemmed in an assaulted here, we will die, every man of us, under the flag of our country.

Very truly yours,

J.C. FREMONT

P.S. I am encamped on the top of the Sierra, at the headwaters of a stream which strikes the road to Monterey, at the house of Don Joaquin Gomez.

THOMAS O. LARKIN, ESQ.
CONSUL OF THE UNITED STATES, MONTEREY.

[No.35]
Consulate of the United States,
Monterey, California, March 4, 1846.

Sir: The undersigned has the honor to inform the Hon. Secretary that Captain J.C. Fremont arrived within this department in January Last; with his party of fifty men, and was at the house of the undersigned a few days, during the last month, for the purpose of getting funds for refitting and clothing his party; which he received as far as could be procured. He is now in this city surveying, and will be again at this consular house during this month. He then proceeds for the Oregon, returns here in May, and expects to be in Washington about September. To this gentleman is due from the government unqualified praise for the patience, industry, and indefatigable perseverance in the attaining the object he is engaged in.

Captain Fremont passed three degrees south of Fort Hall, having taken a route supposed to be a desert, which made his distance to California eight or nine hundred less. He considers the distance from Independence to Monterey about one thousand nine hundred miles. He describes the new route he followed far preferable, not only on account of the less distance, but it is less mountainous, with good, pasturage and well watered. The second day of his arrival in Monterey, he visited the commandant general, prefecto, and alcalde; and by verbal request of the general, informed him officially of his object in visiting California. The undersigned forwards, with this, the two annexed letters respecting Captain Fremont’s arrival.

I am, sir, with the highest respect and consideration, your most obedient servant,

THOMAS O. LARKIN.

To the Hon. Secretary of State, &c.

[No.36]
Consulate of the United States of America,
Monterey. March 5, 1846

Sir: The undersigned has the honor to forward to the Department of State the accompanying translations of letters this day received in this consulate. Captain J.C. Fremont has, for near one month, been slowly traveling; and encamping within this district, (say within eighty miles of this town.) Last week information was received by the prefect from some alcalde, respecting a horse or mule of Captain Fremont, claimed by a Californian. (I understand that the animal came from the States.) Last night notice was received that some of Captain Fremont’s party had offered an insult to some person or persons on a farm. The general, has this day sent out ten or fifteen men, with letters to Captain Fremont, ordering him away. I am not aware that any of the party have committed any excesses, and do not suppose such to be the case.

I am, respectfully, &c.,

THOMAS O. LARKIN.

To the Hon. Secretary of State, &c.

Commandant General of Upper California:
With this date, I say to Captain J.C. Fremont the following: "At seven o’clock this morning the commandant general was given to understand that you, and the party under your command have entered the towns of this department; and such being prohibited by our laws, I find myself obliged to advertise you that on the receipt of this you will immediately retire beyond the limits of this same department, such being the orders of the supreme government; and the subscriber is obliged to see them complied with. And the undersigned has the honor of transcribing the same to the consul of the United States of America for his knowledge of the same.

God and Liberty!
Monterey, March 5, 1846.
JOSE CASTRO.

Mr. Thomas O. Larkin, Consul U. States of America in this port.

Prefecture of the Second District,
Monterey, March 6, 1846.

Captain J.C. Fremont:

Sir: I have learned with surprise that you, against the laws of the authorities of Mexico, have introduced yourself into the town of this departmental district, under my charge, with an armed force, under a commission which must have been given you by your government only to survey its own proper lands.

In consequence, this prefecture now orders that you will immediately, on receipt of this, without any pretext, return with your people out of the limits of this territory. If not, this office will take the necessary measures to cause respect to this determination. I have the honor to transcribe this to you for your intelligence that you may act in the case as belongs to your office, and that he may comply with the expressed orders.

God and Liberty.

[No. 37]

Consulate of the United States,
Monterey, March 9, 1846

Sir: Enclosed, you have a copy of my answer to the general and prefecto of this place, one to Capt. Fremont, and the second letter from the prefect. Captain Fremont is eight or nine leagues from this place, encamped, intending to move as soon as the state of his horses will permit. There will be two or three hundred people collected together to-morrow, with the intention of attacking the camp. Capt. Fremont has about fifty men- all men in confidence, and remarkably well armed. Neither himself or men have any fears respecting the result of the present state of affairs; yet, be the result for or against him, it may prove a disadvantage to the resident Americans in California. I have at some [risk] despatched out two couriers to the camp with duplicate letters, and this letter I send to Santa Barbara, in expectation of finding a vessel bound to Mazatlan. Having over one-half of my hospital expenses of 1844 cut off, and know not why, and even my bill for a flag, I do not feel disposed to hazard much for government, though the life of Captain Fremont and party may need it. I hardly know how to act. I have only received on letter (of June) from the department for the year 1845. In the month of February, Captain Fremont, in my company, visited the general, prefecto, and alcalde of this place, and informed them of his business; and there was no objection made. Within twenty days, the general says he has received direct and specific orders from Mexico not to allow Captain Fremont to enter California; which, perhaps, accounts for the change of feelings with the people — I am, sir, with the highest respect and consideration, your obedient servant,

THOMAS O. LARKIN.

[No.38.]

Consulate of the U.S. of America,
Monterey, March 27, 1846.

Sir: Captain J.C. Fremont, of the United States army, has arrived at this United States consular house in Monterey, on the 27th of January, 1846. Being very anxious to join his party of fifty men at the second place of rendezvous, without the settlement, they having missed the first place by mistake, he remained but two days, in which time, with myself, he visited the commanding general, prefecto, alcalde, and Col. Alvarado, informing them that he was surveying the nearest route from the United States to the Pacific ocean. This information, and that his men were not United States soldiers, was also, by myself officially given to the prefecto. Having obtained funds and supplies from myself, he returned to his camp; it being well known in Monterey that he was to return when he collected his men. Some fifteen of twenty days after this, captain Fremont, with his party, encamped at a vacant rancho belonging to Captain Fisher, (about ninety miles from here,) to recruit his men and animals. From there, he proceeded towards Santa Cruz, making short journeys. On the 3d of March, he encamped on the rancho of Mr. E.P. Hartwell, where he received letters from the general and prefecto, ordering him out of the country, and to obey the order without any pretext whatever, or immediate measures would be taken to compel him to do so. This, not corresponding with assurances received at Monterey, it was not answered, and he gave orders to hoist the United States flag the next morning as the only protection his men were to look to. From the 7th to the 10th of March, they fortified their camp with a breastwork of logs. Encamped on a high hill which commanded a view of the surrounding country, they could see (with the use of spy-glasses) the general and his troops, numbering about two hundred men, at their camp, in the mission of St. John’s, preparing their cannon. On the 9th instant, I sent duplicate letters; one by an American, who lost his papers, and the other by a Californian, to Captain Fremont informing him of the movements of the Californians. The California courier returned to the consulate in about nine or ten hours, bringing a letter from Captain Fremont, having traveled in that time sixty miles. He reported being well treated by Capt. Fremont and his men; and that two thousand of his countrymen would not be sufficient to compel him to leave the country, although his party was so small. At the earnest request of the alcalde for a translation of Captain Fremont’s letter, it was given, and immediately dispatched to the general at St. John’s; and one also to the governor of the Puebla of los Angeles. The general informed the alcalde on the night of the 10th instant, the Captain Fremont had left his encampment, and that he (the general) should pursue and attack him the first opportunity, and chastise him for hoisting a foreign flag in California. In the post script of the same letter, the general stated that Captain Fremont had crossed a small river, and was then about three miles distant from them; but the general made no preparation to follow him. On the morning of the 11th, Gen. Castro sent John Gilroy, an Englishman long resident in this country, to make offers of arrangement to Captain Fremont. On his arrival with his party that morning, the camp fires were still burning. He found in the camp the staff used for the flag, tent poles, (cut on the spot,) some old clothes, and two old and useless pack saddles, which the Californians have magnified into munitions of war. Gen. Castro informed his party that he had received various messages from the camp of Captain Fremont, threatening to exterminate the Californians, &c., (but will hardly name his messenger, nor did they put any confidence in it themselves.) From the 11th to the 13th, the natives had returned to their respective homes, to resume their customary occupations. A few people that were ordered to march from San Francisco to join the general at his camp, returned to their homes. On the 12th, a proclamation was put up by the general, in the billiard room, (not the usual place,) informing the inhabitants that a band of highwaymen, ("bandoleros") under Captain Fremont, of the United States army, had come with in the town of this department; and that he, with two hundred patriots, had driven them out, and sent them into the back country. Some of the officers of the two hundred patriots (and more were expected to join them) arrived in Monterey, and reported that the cowards had run, and that they had driven them to the Sacramento river; some added that they drove them into the bulrushes, on the plains of the Sacramento; and that, in their haste, they had left some of their best horses behind. The horses proved to be those belonging to the Californians themselves, and had strayed into Captain Fremont’s band. (being an everyday occurrence in California and, on raising camp, they were turned out and left behind. Instead of the Americans being driven out of the country, they traveled less distance, for three or four days, than the natives did in returning to Monterey- moving from four to six miles per day, in order to recruit. One of the complaints made by the general was that three men, when drinking, went to the house of Angel Castro (an uncle of the general) to purchase some beef for the camp, and insulted his family. On the 7th, I personally called upon Don Angel, for the truth of the story, and was informed by him (the father himself) that he was frightened by one of the Americans insisting on his daughter drinking with him. On ordering him to leave the house, he resisted, but was put out by his own companions, he drawing a pistol while they were putting him out. Don Angel mounted a horse and rode off to Captain Fremont’s, about one mile distant, who on hearing the case, came to the house immediately, and called up the family to inquire into the affair. On the examination, he asked the father what he should do with the men. He requested them to be punished, which was promised; and was told, if he would send a boy, a fine of five dollars should be sent to him, (he being alcalde.) The boy returned with ten dollars from the camp, which settled the business, although there had been nothing of consequence transacted; yet Captain Fremont was anxious not to let the people of the country have any cause of complaint against him.

The undersigned has the honor to subscribe himself, your most obedient servant,

THOMAS O. LARKIN

To the Hon. Secretary of state, &c.

[No. 39]

Consulate of the U.S. of America,
Monterey, April 2, 1846

Sir: In giving my first information to the department respecting Captain Fremont’s arrival in California, I did not anticipate such an extensive correspondence as it has now reached. Captain Fremont was well received in this place, and to the last day we heard of him, by the natives individually, who sold him provisions, and liked his presence. During his encampment, thirty or forty miles from here, dispatches were received by the commandant, General Jose Castro, (a native of Monterey) from Mexico, ordering him to drive Captain Fremont out of this department; which order, with one hundred and seventy or two hundred men present, and over one hundred more daily expected, he pretended to execute. Capt. Fremont left his camp a few hours after he received the undersigned’s letter of the 9th of March, (not from right of General Castro,) as he had been preparing the week before to travel. It is supposed he has gone to St.
Barbara, where an American was sent by the undersigned, in February, with funds and provisions for his use. From there he proceeds on his journey, according to his instructions from his department in Washington. Although from the correspondence it may appear that in the centre of a strange country, among a whole people with real or apparent hostile intentions towards him, the: Captain Fremont was in much danger, it can be believed that he was only annoyed.
Whether he will visit Monterey after this unexpected affair, or not, is uncertain.

The undersigned has not supposed, during the whole affair, that General Castro, wished to go after Captain Fremont; and was very confident that, with all California, he would not have attacked him even had he been sure of destroying the whole party, as five times their number could have taken their place before the unexpected battle.
Captain Fremont received verbal applications from English and Americans to join his party; and could have mustered as many men as the natives. He was careful not to do so. Although he discharged five or six of his men, he took no others in their place. On the return of General Castro, he published a flaming proclamation to the citizens, informing them that a band of bandeleros, (highwaymen or freebooters, under Captain Fremont of the United States army, had come into this district; but with the company of two hundred patriots he had driven them away., and exhorted his companions and countrymen to be always ready to repel others of the same class. This proclamation was missing from the place where it was put up on the third day.

The undersigned has written to the general for a copy. To this day there has been no answer received. Duplicate copies of consular letters to Captain Fremont, and in the hands of General Castro, he having taken them from one of the consular's couriers, promising to forward them as directed. These copies he promised to return, but has not done so.
This government is about sending a commissioner to-Mexico (as the undersigned believes) to report the country in danger of revolution from the Americans. By this we understand in California, (foreigners,) that some Americans (who left Capt. Fremont)are joining the Indians to attack the farms, and others were about to take possession of a town in the upper part of the bay of San Francisco; and that Sn. W. Hastings (author of the history of California) is laying off a town in New Helvetia for the Mormons. None of this information (in the opinion of the undersigned can be relied upon) is to be given to the President to urge upon him the necessity of giving General Castro two hundred men, (he prefers not many men, nor any Mexican general,) with sufficient funds to protect the country. As a general thing, Hastings's book is very untrue and absurd. He brought a number to this country, which do his countrymen no good, and perhaps injures them. No general English reader will read one quarter of the book. The arrival of Capt. Fremont has revived the excitement in California respecting the emigration, and the fears of the Californians losing their country. The undersigned believes that if a new flag was respectfully planted, it would receive the good will of much of the wealth and respectability of the country. Those who live by office, and the absence of law, would faintly struggle against a change.
Many natives and foreigners of wealth and pursuits, are already calculation on the hopes, fears and expectations from the apparent coming change now before them, from the great influx of strangers.

In the mean time, the undersigned has the pleasure of saying that, with every department of office in this country he is on the best terms of friendship, as far as appearances are before him.

With the highest respect and esteem, I am your obedient servant,

THOMAS O. LARKIN.

To the Hon. Secretary of State, &c.

Monterey, March 5th, 1846.

Sir: I have just received two letters from the commandant general of California, and prefecto of this district, who inform me they have sent you official letters, enclosing me the copies. The following is a translation.

I remain, dear sir, yours sincerely,

THOMAS O. LARKIN.

To Capt. J.C. Fremont, United State Army.

[No. 82]

Consulate of the Untied States,
Monterey, California, March 9th, 1846.

Sir: Captain J.C. Fremont, with a party of fifty men, has been within the limits of California about two months; within a few days encamped about eight leagues from this town, resting his men d animals; he has received two letters from the general and prefecto, wherein he his ordered to leave this country, or they will take measures to compel him. They sent me copies of the same, which [. . . ] have sent in English to Captain Fremont. I have not heard from the camp since. This morning I wrote to Capt. Fremont in duplicate, one by a native, the other by a foreigner. By to-morrow, there will be collected together nearly three hundred men, with the intention to drive out the strangers; and, if required, there will be by the next week a much larger body collected. Should this force be used against Captain Fremont, much blood will be spilt. His party, though of only fifty in number, have from three to six guns, rifles, and pistols each, and are very determined, both commander and men, having every confidence in each other. It was the intention of Capt. Fremont to leave this week, if his animals were in good condition; perhaps he may not be willing, as the people wish to force him; he was at my house alone, in February, and, in company with me, visited the general, prefecto, and alcalde, informed them of his orders to survey the nearest route to the Pacific, and had come into California to purchase provisions, clothes, and horses; no objection was made at the time. Since then the general states that he has received by the Hannah, positive orders from Mexico to drive Captain Fremont from the country.

I shall send his letter open to Consul Parrott, of Mazatlan, with copies of this week’s correspondence. If there is a fight between these people and Captain Fremont, be the result for or against him, the American residents are under some apprehensions of their safety hereafter. I would therefore request you, if in your power, to dispatch a sloop-of-war to this port from Mazatlan, on the receipt of this. I understand there were, in December, five of our ships of war then in that port. Should this be the case, I hope it will not be inconvenient to comply with this request. I have looked for the Portsmouth over two months. Capt. Montgomery informed me he was to return.

I remain, sirs, your respectful servant,

THOMAS O. LARKIN.

To the commander of any American ship-of-war, in San Blas or Mazatlan.

[No. 83]

Consulate of the United States
Monterey, California, March 9th, 1846.

Sir: Enclosed with this you will receive several copies of correspondence in this town, for the present week, also an official letter for the captain of any of our ships of war, you may have in your port on your receiving this letter. It is impossible to say whether Senor Castro, the prefecto, and the general will attack Capt. Fremont; we expect such will be the case. I am just informed by Senor Arce, the general’s secretary, who has just come from the general’s cap, (St. John’s) that the whole country will be raised to force Capt. Fremont, if they require so many. Senor Arce further says, the camp of the Americans is near Mr. Hartnell’s rancho, on a high hill, with his flag flying; of the latter I am not certain. AS you are acquainted with this country and its people, you will advise with our naval captains on the subject of sailing immediately for this port. If the vessel is not actually obliged to go elsewhere, it is my earnest desire she sails for Monterey on the receipt of this, although every thing may end peaceably among us.

Believe me to be, yours sincerely,

THOMAS O. LARKIN.

Consulate of the United States.
Monterey, California, March 10th, 1846.

Sir: Your letter of yesterday I received last night at 8 o’clock: I thank you for the same; it took from me a weight of uneasiness respecting your situation. The alcalde of Monterey has requested of me a copy in Spanish of your letter. Not knowing what you might approve of in the case, I had some objection; on second thoughts I considered that the alcalde having given the courier a passport for (without which he would no go) carrying of the letters both ways, were made public, and people might put a wrong construction on our correspondence, I gave it to him with the following additions. I also considered the letter contained nothing of importance to keep secret, and now annex my letter of this morning to the alcalde. AS you may not have a copy of your letter I send you one. My native courier said he was well treated by you—that two thousand men could not drive you. In all cases of couriers orders your men have no hints or words with them, as it is magnified: this one said a man pointed to a tree, and said there’s your life; he expected to be led to you [. . . ] says you have sixty-two men, well armed, &c., &c., &c.

You will, without thought of expense or trouble, call on me, or send to me, in every case of need, not only as your consul, but your friend and countryman.

I am yours, truly,

THOMAS O. LARKIN

Capt. J.C. Fremont, U.S. army.

[No.86]
Consulate of the United States
Monterey, California. March 10, 1846

Sir: I am not confident that Captain Fremont may approve of my giving you a copy of his hasty wrote letter, [but] as you allowed the courier to travel to the camp and return, and hoping the letter may, on being known bring affairs to some better understanding, I send you the translation you request. It may be that the authorities of this department expect something from me as United States consul under the present state of affairs, yet I know nothing that I can do. I have verbally offered my services whenever required, and now do the same in writing. Captain Fremont has his own instructions, and is not to be ordered by this consulate; yet I would with pleasure allay the present sensation if in my power.

I can only add, that I would respectfully advise that you would in your letter to the general today, say that I would take the liberty to propose that he should send a letter to Captain Fremont, requesting one hour’s conversation before any extreme measure’s are taken; as I am in the firm opinion, should that officer be attacked, much bloodshed will ensue, that may cause not only loss of life to many of the present parties, but cause hereafter much expense, trouble, and perhaps further loss of life to many of out respective nations, and I am satisfied that no present or future advantage will be obtained by the country from the circumstances as they now appear. I have reason to believe that Captain Fremont only waits a few days to rest his horses, (having purchased his provision) and intends to remove immediately from California; yet it may be impossible for him to do so while surrounded by people with hostile intentions towards him. Will you please send a copy of this letter to the commandant general, D. Jose Castro? I have the honor to remain yours, respectfully,

THOMAS O. LARKIN

Private letter from Captain Fremont to Mrs. Fremont,
April 1, 1846 Sacramento River, (Latitude 40) April 1, 1846.

It is hard to say when I shall see you, but about the middle of the next month, at latest, I will start for home. The Spaniards were somewhat rude and inhospitable below, and ordered us out of the country, after having given me permission to winter there. My sense of duty did not permit me to fight them, but we retired slowly and growingly before a force of three of four hundred men, and three pieces of artillery. Without a shadow of a cause, the governor suddenly raised the whole country against us, issuing a false and scandalous proclamation. Of course, I did not dare to compromise the United States, against which appearances would have been strong, but, though it was in my power to increase my party by many Americans, I retrained from committing a solitary act of hostility or impropriety. For my own part, I have become disgusted with everything belonging to the Mexicans. Our government will not require me to return by the southern route against the will of this government; I shall therefore return by the heads of the Missouri, going through a pass of which your father knows, and be at Westport about 1st September. I go in about two weeks through from the Tlamath lake to the Walamath valley, to make a reconnaissance of the pass which I mentioned to you before. Say many kind things for me to all the family. Glad will I be when finally we turn our faces homeward.

Private letter from Capt. Fremont to Senator Benton,
May 24, 1846 Sacramento River, (lat.40) May 24, 1846.

My Dear Sir: Most unexpectedly, and in a remote region of the northern mountains, I had the great pleasure to receive your letters. An express from Mr. Gillespie overtook me, the man being Neal, whom you will remember as having been left by me here in the last expedition. No other man there would have had the courage and resolution to follow us. I had the good fortune to save the lives of Mr. Gillespie and party from the Indians. In a charge at night by the Tlamath Indians I lost thirteen men killed and had one dangerously wounded, being then with a detached party of fourteen men. You will regret to hear that among the killed was my old companion, Basil LaJeunesse. We afterwards fought the nation from one extremity to the other, and have ever since been fighting, until our entrance into the lower Sacramento valley. I have but a faint hope that this note will reach you before I do; but the object for which I write is a pressing one and therefore I make the experiment. The Tlamath lake on our last map I find to be only an expansion of the river above, which passes by an outlet through a small range of mountains into a large body of water to the southward. This is the true Tlamath lake, and the heart of the Tlamath nation. It is on the east side of a range of mountains, (the Cascade.) Directly west, and comparatively near at hand, is the Umpqua river. Here the British have a post. Why do they keep it there? The trade in fur will not justify it. If there is to be any war with England, it is of great importance that they should instantly be driven from this and similar posts before they furnish the Indians with fire arms, and engage them in their service. These Indians are considered by the Willamette missionaries (who have been able to have only knowledge of those in the north) as the most savage and warlike Indians on the continent. So said Mr. Lee. This post maintains an intercourse with the Tlamaths and other mountain Indians, and furnishes them with the tomahawks and iron arrow-heads, with which they fought us. They are the bravest Indians we have ever seen; our people (my camp, Carson, &c.) consider them far beyond the Blackfeet, who are by no means so daring. You know that the Indians along the line of the Columbia are well supplied with fire arms, ammunition, and horses—hardly a man having less than forty or fifty of the latter; that they are brave, friendly to the British, and unfriendly to us. These things may be worthy of Mr. Buchanan’s attention. Your letter led me to expect some communication from him. I received nothing. I shall now proceed directly homewards, by the Colorado, but cannot arrive at the frontier until late in September. I saw a notice of your illness in the papers, and your letter relieved me of much anxiety. I trust that I will be able to force my way through this rough
My dear sir: when Mr. Gillespie overtook me in the middle of May, we were encamped on the northern shore of the Greater Tlamath Lake. Snow was falling steadily and heavily in the mountains, which entirely surrounded and dominate the elevated valley region into which we had penetrated; in the east, and north, and west, barriers absolutely impassable barred our road; we had no provisions; our animals were already feeble, and while any other way was open, I could not bring myself to attempt such a doubtful enterprise as a passage of these unknown mountains in the dead of winter. Every day snow was falling; and in the face of the depressing influence exercised on the people by the loss of our men, and the unpromising appearance of things, I judged it inexpedient to pursue our journey farther in this direction, and determined to retrace my steps, and carry out the views of the government by reaching the frontier on the line of the Colorado river. I had scarcely reached the lower Sacramento, when General Castro, then in the north (at Sonoma, in the department of Sonoma, north of the bay of San Francisco, commanded by General Vallejo,) declared his determination immediately to proceed against the foreigners settled in the country, for whose expulsion an order had just been issued by the governor of the Californias. For these purposes Castro immediately assembled a force at the Mission of Santa Clara, a strong place, on the northern shore of the Francisco bay. You will remember how grossly outraged and insulted we had already been by this officer; many in my own camp, and throughout the country thought that I should not have retreated March last. I’m humiliated and humbled; one of the main objects proposed by this expedition had been entirely defeated, and it was the opinion of the officers of the squadron (so I was informed by Mr. Gillespie) that I could not again retreat consistently with any military reputation. Unable to procure supplies elsewhere, I had sent by Mr. Gillespie Captain Montgomery, commanding the United States ship of war Portsmouth, then lying at Monterey, a small requisition for such supplies as were indispensably necessary to leave the valley; and my animals were now in such a state that I could not get out of the valley, without reaching the country which lies on the west side of them in an entirely destitute condition. Having carefully examined my position, and foreseeing, I think, clearly, ALL the consequences which may eventuate to me from such a step, I determined to take such active and anticipatory measures as should seem to me most expedient to protect my party and justify my own character. I was well aware of the grave responsibility which I assumed but I was also determined that having once decided to do so, I would assume it and its consequences fully and entirely, and go through with the business completely to the end. I regret that, by a sudden emergency, I have only an hour for writing to all friends and that therefore from the absence of detail, what I say to you will not be clearly understood. Castro’s first measure was an attempt to unite the Indian population of the Joaquin and Sacramento valleys, and the neighboring mountains, to burn the crops of the foreigners and otherwise proceed immediately against them. These Indians are extremely numerous, and the success of his measure would have been very destructive; but he failed entirely. On the 6th of June I decided on the courses which I would pursue, and immediately concerted my operations with the foreigners inhabiting the Sacramento valley. A few days afterwards, one of Castro’s officers, with a party of 14 men, attempted to pass a drove of 200 horses from Sonoma to Santa Clara, via New Helvetia, with the avowed purpose of bringing troops into the country. On the 11th they were surprised at daylight on the Cosumne river by a party of twelve from my camp. The horses were taken, but they were [the men] dismissed without injury. At daybreak on the 15th, the military fort of Sonoma was taken by surprise, with 9 brass pieces of artillery; 250 stand of muskets, some other arms, and a quantity of ammunition. General Vallejo, his brother, (Captain Vallejo,) Col. Grenxdon, and some others were taken prisoners, and placed at New Helvetia, a fortified post at my command. In the meantime a launch had reached New Helvetia with stores from the ship Portsmouth, now lying at Yerba Buena, on Francisco bay. News of General Castro’s proceedings against me in March had reached Commodore Sloat at Mazatlan at the end of that month, and he had immediately dispatched the ship Portsmouth to Monterey, with general instructions to protect American interests in California.

These enterprises accomplished, I proceeded to the American settlements on the Sacramento, and the Rio de los Americanos, to obtain reinforcements of men and rifles.

The information brought by Mr. Gillespie to Captain Montgomery, in relation to my position, induced that officer immediately to proceed to Yerba Buena, whence he had dispatched his launch to me. I immediately wrote to him, by return of the boat, describing to him fully my position and intentions, in order that he might not, by supposing me to be acting under orders from our government, unwittingly commit himself in affording me other than such assistance as his instructions would authorize him naturally to offer an officer charged with an important public duty; or, in fine, to any citizen of the United States.

Information having reached me from the commanding officer at Sonoma, that his post was threatened with an attack by a force under Gen. Castro, I raised camp on the American fork in the afternoon of the 23d, and, accompanied by Mr. Gillespie, at two in the morning of the 25th, reached Sonoma, with 90 mounted riflemen, having marched 80 miles. Our people still held the place, only one division of Castro’s force, a squadron of cavalry, numbering 70 men, and commanded by Joaquin de la Torre, (one of his best officers,) having succeeded in crossing the straits, (Francisco bay.) This force had attacked an advanced party of twenty Americans, and (was) defeated with the loss of two killed and two or three wounded. The Americans lost none. This was an unexpected check to the Californians, who had announced their intentions to defeat our people without firing a gun; to beat out their brains with their “tapaderos,” and destroy them “con cuchillos pueros.” They were led to use this expression from the circumstance that a few days previous they had captured two of our men (an express,) and after wounding, had bound them to trees and cut them to pieces while alive, with an exaggeration of cruelty, which no Indian would be capable of. In a few days de la torre was driven from the Army, who left Washington a few days since for New York, whence he will sail for Chagres, cross the isthmus of Panama, and proceed to Monterey, on the Pacific Coast, as to supersede Col. Stevenson, in the command of the California expedition, Colonel Mason outranks Col. S., and is expected to arrive in California before him, and also before Gen. Kearney, who, on his arrival, will relieve Colonel Mason. [SCM]

Capt. G.K. Lewis, was the bearer of his melancholy intelligence. He left Monterey on the 13th ult., and came by the route through San Antonia.

When Capt. L. quit Monterey it was the general opinion of the army that Ampudia had not evacuated Saltilla, but had marched with a formidable force towards Montelova, to intercept Gen. Whool’s division in their march from Presidio, an operation which the armistice did not forbid his undertaking. No direct information, but strong presumptive evidence fortified this impression. Hall and myself are arranging the Government, &c., trying to get thee machine in operation. It is a very arduous matter - the laws are all in Spanish, and every thing is done through and interpreter, and there is much in the laws conflicting with our constitution to be altered. The officers and citizens of the department, for all the counties above and around here, have come in and taken the oath of allegiance. - The Indians are citizens in the full acceptation of the term, and are by far the bravest and some of them the wealthiest portion of the north of the territory.” [SCM]

Com. Robert Field Stockton’s proclamation to the people of California

On my approach to this place with the forces under my command, Jose Castro, the commandant-general of California, buried his artillery, and abandoned his fortified camp of the “Mesa,” and fled, it is believed, towards Mexico.

With the sailors, the marines, and the California battalion of mounted riflemen, we entered the “City of Angels,” the capital of California, on the 13th of August, and hoisted the North American flag.

The flag of the United States is now flying from every commanding position in the Territory, and California is entirely free from Mexican dominion.

The Territory of California now belongs to the United States, and will be governed, as soon as circumstances may permit, by officers and laws similar to those by which the other territories of the United States are regulated and protected.

But until the Governor, the Secretary of Council are appointed, and the various civil departments of the Government are arranged, military law will prevail, and the Commander-in-chief will be the Governor and protector of the territory.

In the mean time the people will be permitted, and are now requested, to meet in their several towns and departments, at such time and place as they may see fit, to elect civil officers to fill the places of those who decline to continue in office, and to administer the laws according to the former usages of the territory.

In all cases where the people fail to elect, the commander-in-chief and Governor will make the appointments himself.

All persons, of whatever religion or nation, who faithfully adhere to the new government, will be zealously and thoroughly protected in the liberty of conscience, their persons and property.

No persons will be permitted to remain in the territory who do not agree to support the existing government, and all military men who desire to remain are required to take an oath that they will not take up arms against it, or do or say anything to disturb its peace.

Nor will any persons, come from where they may, be permitted to settle in the territory, who do not pledge themselves to be, in all respects, obedient to the laws which may be from time to time enacted by the proper authorities of the territory.

All persons who, withough special permission, are found with arms outside of their own houses, will be considered as enemies, and will be shipped out of the country.

All thieves will be put to hard labor on the public works, and there kept until compensation is made for the property stolen.

The California battalion of mounted riflemen will be kept in the service of the territory, and constantly on duty, to prevent and punish any aggressions by the Indians, or any other persons, upon the property of individuals, or the peace of the territory; and California shall hereafter be so governed and defended as to give security to the inhabitants, and to defy the power of Mexico.
It is required that all persons shall remain in their houses from ten at night until sunrise in the morning during the time this territory is under military law.

F.F. STOCKTON,
Commander-in-Chief and Governor of the Territory of California.

GENERAL ORDERS No. 51.

The following paragraph of “General Orders,” No. 29, of May 20, 1841, is republished, and made applicable to the theatre of war in Mexico:

III. “The President directs, that hereafter all officers of every branch of the service, assigned to duty with the Florida Army, shall only be relieved, or be transferred, through the orders of the General or other officer commanding the troops; and when it may be transferred, through the orders of the General or other officer commanding the troops; and when it may be necessary to withdraw any officer of the staff from duty there, the requisite instructions will be communicated through the Adjutant General’s Office.”

BY COMMAND OF MAJOR GENERAL SCOTT:
W.G. FREEMAN,
Assistant Adjutant General.
WAR WITH MEXICO.

The war is becoming every day and every way more eventful, and begins seriously to compromise national existence. It is probably that the whole of the Californias are, or very soon will be in the undisputed possession of the United States forces. At least they are irretrievably lost to Mexico. The operations of the American squadron in the Pacific and the diversion of Captain Fremont’s detachment in the interior, have in a great measure anticipated the intended operations of the “Army of the North” under General Kearney, and the principal part of that army will now no doubt be directed to proceed to join the “Army of the Centre” under General Wool. Interesting details from each of the divisions of the army, as well as of the operations of the navy, are inserted in this number under their appropriate heads.

The movement of a considerable portion of General Wool’s forces will very probably be in like manner diverted to a considerable extent, from its intended direction, in order to aid the ulterior movements of General Taylor’s division. General Taylor has communicated with General Wool on the subject, and will no doubt avail of so much of the forces of the latter, as can now be spared from the divisions destined against Chihuahua. General Wool has detached one thousand men to take possession of Moncloa.

We have no later dates from Monterey, than those of the 29th ult. Given under the head of Army of Occupation, nor had they any later at Matamoras on the 7th instant. Robert M. McLane, Esq. who left Washington on the 23d October, reached Matamoras on the 4th instant, and left ath evening for Camargo, on his way for headquarters, which he would probably reach by the 11th. The Matamoras Flag expresses the opinion, from certain “unmistakable indications,” that the dispatches of which Mr. McLane is bearer, will modify to some extent, the orders previously sent to General Taylor by Major Graham, and adds—“We believe, that in view of the answer of the Mexican government or rulers, to our pacific proposition, the President has concluded to establish and garrison posts along our Southern boundary, from Tampico, to a point on the Pacific, several degrees south of latitude 42; that he will appoint territorial Governors, Judges, and other ministerial officers; that the U.S. revenue laws will be extended over the new country; that people of all classes will be taught to read, and furnished with cheap goods; and that large supplies of human happiness and virtue will be speedily introduced.”

The regular troops had all been removed from Matamoros; the last company proceeded up the river on the 4th inst. The 3d Regiment Ohio, and 3d Indiana volunteers, are now the sole guardians of the city. Fort Brown is likewise garrisoned by the Ohio troops. The remainder of the two regiments, with the exception of two companies of Indians, stationed at Reynosa, are encamped on the bank of the river, just below the town.

Colonel M’Kee’s 2nd regiment of Kentucky infantry were under marching orders for Monterey, three companies have already left Camargo. The Georgia regiment had probably reached Gen. Taylor’s camp. General Marshall’s regiment of Kentucky mounted men were encamped four or five miles below Camargo. Some companies of Col. Ormsby’s regiment of Kentucky infantry were at Camargo. The Tennessee regiment of mounted men were encamped a short distance below Matamoros.

The recruits for the regular army are sent forward to Monterey as they arrive.

The Executive at Washington, in consequence of the new features of the contest, and the probability from indications evinced not only by Santa Anna, but by the Mexican people, that the war may be protracted, have deemed it expedient to order more formidable operations than have heretofore been resorted to. Not only is the Gulf squadron to be placed upon a far more effective footing, with a view to the occupation of the Mexican ports upon the Gulf, but there the probability is, that the final demonstrations upon the city of Mexico will be made from that direction. A Cabinet council it is said, was held at Washington on Saturday evening last, at which several distinguished officers of the Navy attended. The Commander-in-chief of the U.S. Army, General SCOTT, has received orders, to repair, with his Staff, to the seat of war. He will probably repair to the coast, and take the immediate command of the operations, with General PATTerson as commander of the division. General SCOTT left Washington on the 24th for New York. It is intimated also, that Commodore STEWART will proceed to the Gulf in a ship of the line, as speedily as one can be fitted out for the purpose, to take command of the squadron. We judge from these movements that it has been found advisable to delegate a larger discretion to the commander entrusted with the active operations. Than hitherto been extended. The inconvenience of managing a campaign in a foreign country, when orders for every considerable movement have to be obtained from Washington, is obvious, and has already occasioned serious delay and heavy expenses. At every stop beyond our own borders, these inconveniences would be increased.

The intelligence from Mexico, (under out Mexican head,) evidences any thing rather than a disposition to accept President Polk’s overtures for a negotiation of peace. Yet if we credit the New York Journal of Commerce, which certainly has access to official authority, a correspondence is actually going on between Mr. Buchanan, secretary of state, and an agent of the Mexican government now in this country, who insists that the disposition and decision of the Mexican government in deferring the propositions of President Polk to their ensuing congress, has been misconstrued. The agent himself, in August and September last, urged in strong language to the Mexican government the entertainment of the propositions to negotiate. Their constitution denied them the power. He says to Mr. Buchanan, "I think you have failed to view in a true light, the reply sent. * * "It is not improbable indeed, that you may receive a proposition." * * * "An honorable peace to Mexico, you are pledged to assent to, by the tenor of your late dispatches to Mexican minister of foreign relations." * * * "I send you reasons to believe pacific sentiments of an honorable nature, exists in the minds of the rulers of Mexico.

The President will hardly allow any overtures to divert him from active operations. It is rumored that his message will ask of congress an additional forty million dollars and 50,000 troops, to prosecute with was with. [KMK]

MEXICO.

The account inserted in our last, that Santa Anna had laid his hands upon a conducta, with $2,000,000, on its way from the mines to the coast, for the purpose of being shipped on board the British steamer, and of his forwarding his own obligations instead of the cash, was probably unfounded. Santa Anna would hardly venture to incur the responsibility, in his present difficulties, of touching John Bull in so sensible a nerve. A writer in the N. Orleans Tropic, avers that the seizure was made with the contenance of the British authorities, for the purpose of aiding the Mexicans with funds for the moment. For our own part, we are better content that Santa Anna did not get the two millions that he wished to avail himself of out of our treasury. If old John allows him to finger his cash, we doubt his being able to get an insurance for its future forthcoming, work the tack however he may.

The probability is, that Santa Anna detained only the amount that would have been levied at the seaport as export duty upon the metal.

The British steamer Tay arrived at Havana on the 6th with Vera Cruz dates to the 1st November. A Vera Cruz date of the 31st nit. Says—"A conducta arrived at Mexico on the 20th instant, from Guanajuato, with about $1,200,000, so that money was again abundant there. Another had left San Luis de Potosi on the 16th inst. for Tampico, with upwards of a million, and was to arrive at the end of the month. The British sloop Electra has sailed to Tampico, probably on purpose to receive on board the specie for shipment. Two private conductas arrived here from Mexico, with silver bars and about 200,000 hard dollars.

"At the middle of this month, private letters from Mexico stated that Mr. Bankhead had offered the mediation of England, and that the ministershad been in session for two days, to deliberate on the subject, but nothing farther has transpired since."

Don Felix Rivera was among the passengers in the Tay, on his way to Europe, on some mission from the government, one object of which it was said was to negotiate a loan of $30,000,000 by mortgaging the church property. It was to be submitted at teh next session of congress. The Mexicans seem determined to fight as long as possible.

Senor Mier y Teran, a rich merchant at the capital, had advanced $20,000 to pay the troops at San Juan de Ulua, and $30,000 more to be forwarded to Vera Cruz to meet demands against the government there. Of the loan which was authorized to be obtained from private individuals, the sum of $175,000 had been raised.

The Tay had 102 passengers, an unusual number, supposed to indicate that many, either Mexicans or foreigners, were quitting Mexico to escape the dangers of war.

The Republicano of the 27th ult. States that the English have offered to mediate between us at Mexico, and that the British fleet at Lisbon has been ordered to Vera Cruz.

The late revolution in Mexico was effected by a union of the partizans of Santa Anna with the federalists. The federalists are divided into two parties, the Puros—conservatives,—and the Moderados—republicans, and Santa Anna holds the balance of power between them. Salas, in the executive chair, is a conservative. Gomez Farias, president of the council of government instituted on the 1st ultimo, is a moderado.

General Salas, who was at the head of the government, attempted to raise a forced loan. Great disaffection ensued. In the turmoil Senor Rejon, secretary of state, Senor Pacheco, minister of justice, and other members of the government resigned. The first has been succeeded by Senor D. Jose Maria Lafragua, and the second by D. Joaquin Ladron de Guevara. Private letters received in Mexico from San Luis Potosi say that these nominations are entirely acceptable to Santa Anna, although they were old opponents of his.

Finally an attempt was made to assassinate Salas, and he deemed it expedient to quit the capital for Tacubaya, and reported the state of affairs to Santa Anna. The latter disapproved of his departure, and he returned to Mexico on the 29th. Meantime Santa Anna officially noticed the proceeding by publishing the following—

GEN. SANTA ANNA TO GEN. ALMONTE.

To His Excellency the Minister of War:

Sir: By the reception of your circular of the 19th instant, I have learned with extremem regret that our foreign enemies, by means of their disguised agents, attempted on the evening of that day a serious outrage, from which it appears that they were endeavoring to dispossess his excellency of the supreme executive power, which circumstances gave rise to a series of alarms, and would have produced the most disastrous consequences had it not been opportunely discovered at the moment.

I rejoice exceedingly that the tranquility and public confidence remain firmly established in this state, and conforming myself to the wishes of the supreme government, I shall take good care that it is preserved. I beg leave to assure your excellency, on the part of myself and the troops under my command, that no other thought is given place to here except a burning desire for revenge against our foreign enemy, to fulfil our obligations to the country, and to repel the suggestions of those who endeavor to distract us from such noble objects. I have the honor to reiterate to your excellency my consideration and high respect.

God and Liberty.
Headquarters, San Luis Potosi,
October 23d, 1846.
ANTONIO LOPEZ DE SANTA ANNA.

Santa Anna is evidently concentrating all his forces at San Luis Potosi. What their amount was at the last dates, is not mentioned. Some accounts by a direction overland, have swelled them to nearly 20,000. He had undoubtedly ordered Saltillo to be evacuated, and the forces from thence are marching to San Luis. He has also ordered the forces from Tampico, designing it is said, to make no defence of that place.

The enemies of Santa Anna accuse him of a design of making himself dictator. Whe he has a sufficient army concentrated, it will be in his power at any moment to do so. In his letter announcing the settlement of the difficulties, he repudiates the idea and asserts that no human power will induce him to accept of any office.

The government of San Luis de Potosi had passed a decree proclaiming Santa Anna Chief of the republic, with the sole power to appoint the president pro tem.

Gen. Valencia had been selected by Santa Anna as his second in command, and was expected at San Luis with 5000 or 6000 men. It was pretended there was much enthusiasm in favor of Santa Anna at San Luis, and that he expected to raise a large body of troops, and that Gen Cortazar had raised 2500 to 3000 volunteers.

There is not the least intimation of any expectation or desire for peace on the part of the Mexicans.

They were busily employed increasing the defences of Vera Cruz, who garrison is said to be 4000 men and further reinforcements arriving.

Alvarado had been made a city in compliment for its brilliant and successful defence against Com. Conner.

YUCATAN. The schr. Javen Leonidas, arrived at New Orleans on the 17th, from Campeachy, which she left on the 2d. The New Orleans Times, says: "She brought likewise despatches for the state department at Washington containing, we are informed, full accounts of the origin and progress of the quarrels between the different sections of the peninsula of Yucatan, and copies of the pronunciamentos made by Campeachy and Laguna, in favor of the independence of the state and its total separation from the Mexican republic.

"The American squadron was exercising a rigid surveillance along the coast, ordering of all Yucatanese vessels that attempted to enter any of the ports between Tabasco and the Rio Grande, the entire line having been declared under blockade.

"It appears that Campeachy and Laguna are in earnest, in their efforts to maintain the independence of Yucatan, while Merida is equally bent upon securing the union of that state to Mexico. Since the pronunciamento in Merida, of the 25th of August, declaring the re-annexation accomplished, great discontent has prevailed in Campeachy and Laguna. In both these towns, the disinclination augmented until the citizens by common consent, agreed to repudiate the connection, and raise the flag of Yucatanese independence. Merida, it seems, is the principal customer of Mexico, and will reap many advantages from the removal of all commercial restrictions upon the entrance of her products into Mexican ports. Hence she is particularly interested in effecting the incorporation of Yucatan into the republic. On the other hand, Campeachy and Laguna have no such interest at stake, but fear the suspension and total destruction of their large foreign commerce by blockade, in the event of taking part with Mexico. This is the real secret of the various intrigues and intestine bickerings between the several towns of Yucatan.” [KMK]

NRR 71.196-71.197 November 28, 1846 Disease in our Army, letters describing state of affairs

“ARMY OF OCCUPATION.”

Brasos Santiago dates to the 5th, the Matamoros Flag to the 4th ist. and Monterey dates to the 29th October have been received at New Orleans. From these we learn that the health of the troops at Monterey was not so good, diarrhea and chills and fevers prevailed, brought on probably by too free indulgence in fruit, &c. The Mexicans at Monterey appear as yet not so well disposed towards our folks as at Matamoros. Major Eaton, bearer of dispatches sent from Washington prior to hearing of the taking of Monterey had reached headquarters. Major Graham, who was sent subsequently to hearing of that victory, was met between Camargo and Monterey, on the 27th, and probably reached the latter place on the following day, with the orders of our government to terminate the armistice and to pursue the enemy without delay.

The report that the Mexicans had not evacuated Saltillo is contradicted. Santa Anna’s orders to evacuate reached here on the 10th and the last of the Mexican forces on the 15th October. They were concentrating their forces at San Luis Potosi, where Santa Anna was said by some accounts to have 12,000 men, and no less than 37 generals! Other accounts diminish his actually for to about 3,000. It is doubted whether Santa Anna would venture to detain the specie that he stopped at San Luis Potosi, belonging to the British, for fear of offending that government. There was a rumor at Monterey on the 29th, so says a letter from the distinguished officer, that Bustamente had gone north, in the direction of Chihuahua, to meet General Wool. “And further,” says said letter, “it is positively stated that the Indians are killing and laying waste all before them in the latter state.” [KMK]

Monterey, Mexico, October 20, 1846.

I can only repeat that I have no news to send. No movements have been made in the army and non are contemplated at present. The health of the army is bad, a very heavy disproportion of officers and men being on the sick list. Dysentery and intermittent fevers are the prevailing complaints; many are suffering with both, and such unfortunates can well exclaim, “Our sufferings is intolerable.” I speak feelingly on the subject for I am one of the doubly stricken. The 8th infantry, for illustration, numbers about 300 men; last evening only 164 appeared at parade, the residue either being sick or wounded, or on guard. A fully appointed regiment ought to have about forty commissioned officers; the 8th has thirteen in the field, four of whom are sick to day, and one, (Lieut. Wainwright), wounded and sick. The 7th infantry came out to Corpus Christi with about 500 men, and all the officers but three or four. It now numbers 306 men, and last evening only 138 appeared on parade, the residue, being sick, wounded, or on guard. These are tolerably fair samples of the health of the army.

It is rumored and believed here that Santa Anna, in consequence of information obtained from the captured dispatches from our government to Gen. Taylor, is preparing to send a strong force to Tampico. Santa Anna is at San Luis Potosi, or was a few days since.

The weather is getting so cool at night and morning that fires would be comfortable; in truth, they are necessary to real comfort; but there is not a solitary fireplace in Monterey! As to fruit, we have enough. The road between Saltillo and this place is lined with donkeys and mules, loaded with apples, oranges, pears, lemons, pomegranates, figs, bananas, &c. All these grow in Monterey, but the two armies here nearly cleared the vast number of orchards of their fruits. The market, near the main plaza, is filled with meat, vegetables, and fruit. As for the curiosities, the scenery, the habits of this singular people, and many rich scenes I have come across here, my notes will enable me to pen descriptions of them for your readers when in health and leisure.

Gen. Taylor, with the 1st and 2d divisions, is still in camp at Pecan Grove, or San Domingo woods. General Worth is acting governor of Monterey, and keeps everything in perfect order.

Mier, Mexico, October 30. I have again taken advantage of a cessation of hostilities to return home, and am now speeding on my way as fast as possible. We left Monterey on the 24th October; with a train of fifty wagons, escorted by a detachment of dragoons under Lieut. Campbell. We have in our company a number of wounded officers and men, and others who have been discharged on account of sickness.

I called on the commanding officer just before leaving, and found them in good spirits. All send compliments and kind wishes to their friends. General Taylor assured me that he should make no movement further than to take possession of Saltillo until he received reinforcements. The volunteer and regular troops had been so reduced by sickness and death, and discharges, that his forces were too weak for the responsible work before him. The people at Monterey and this side seem more spiteful towards us than ever. From the former place they are constantly moving towards San Luis Potosi. I am so confident in the wisdom of our government, that I am sure a new policy will be pursued in the future operations of our army in Mexico. It is useless to conciliate; this has been demonstrated. It is useless for us to expend our means in the enemy’s country, for they charge the highest prices, and receive our money with one hand, while they would cut out throats with the other. As to their disunions, they do us more harm than good.

Point Isabel, November 4. I am waiting impatiently for a steamship to start for New Orleans. The Virginia is here, and will probably start to-morrow, but there are about two hundred persons who wish to go in her. Major Dashiell is here also, waiting impatiently for a conveyance. He informs me that before leaving Monterey a messenger had arrived, six days from Gen. Wool. That officer was within a short distance of Monclova, with his command, and with fifty days’ provisions. It was understood at Monterey that Gen. Wool had been ordered by Gen. Taylor to send a detachment of his troops to Chihuahua, and then join the army at Monterey. I think you will find I am correct in my opinion that no important movement will be made by Gen. Taylor until he receives considerable reinforcements. His own opinion on the subject is certainly pretty good evidence. As to the armistice being overruled by our government, this fact will make little or no difference. I believe Gen. Taylor hoped and expected that would be so.

Balize, (La.) November 13.

The Virginia has arrived with us at last, but we have had “a tough time of it,” I can assure you. We left the Brasos on the evening of the 4th, with one hundred and fifty passengers, most of whom were discharged volunteers. Half of these people were wounded or sick, some having lost their legs, others their arms, and others being wounded in their arms and legs. Night before last, a discharged soldier, who was wounded in the battles of last May, and had been in the hospital at Point Isabel ever since, died on board, and was buried at sea. Had a severe gale caught us, four or five more undoubtedly would have died. Will you believe me when I tell you that, with all these sick and wounded and dying men, not a surgeon or a nurse was sent along to attend upon them, not a particle of medicine furnished, not a patch of linen for dressing wounds? Such is the truth, and such, I understood, is the usual manner in which the men who have been out to fight our battles, but who are unfortunate enough to get wounded or become sick, are sent home like old horses turned out to die! The Virginia has no accommodation for passengers, having but eight berths, and you may be assured that the condition of the sick was horrible. Capt. Tucker did all in his power to alleviate their sufferings, but, of course, not much could be done without means. [Correspondence New Orleans Picayune. [KMK]

NRR 71.197-11/28/1846 Jersey Blues

Jersey Blues. It is highly complimentary to the character of our state that New Jersey has given two governors of the newly acquired territories of Mexico. Captain Stockton who has taken possession of California, and General Kearney, who has become governor of Santa Fe, are both, we believe, native Jerseymen. Capt. John Drake Sloat, now in command of the United States squadron in the Pacific, and Captain Stringham, of the United States war ship Ohio, we are gratified to state, are also both citizens in the adjoining county of Orange- the former born and brought up at Goshen in that county. Captain Aulick, also, in command of one of the ships of the line, we believe, was formerly from, or is the descendant of a revolutionary veteran in this county. Surely in this region we have no reason to blush for the fame of Jeresymen. [SCM]

NRR 71.197 November 28, 1846 account of the interview between Gen. Pedro Ampudia and Gen. Zachary Taylor at Monterey Generals Ampudia and Taylor.-The New Orleans Delta says that the interview between Gens. Taylor and Ampudia, in relation to the capitulation of Monterey, has been described to its editors by a gentleman who was present, as a very rich scene, in which the two chief actors were in fine contrast.

Ampudia was all courtesy and fine words, big speeches, great volubility, with an abundance of gesticulations, shrugs, nods, alternate smiles and frowns, and that whole catalogue of silent language, with which persons of French origin are wont to help the expression of their ideas. Gen Ampudia is of a French family, and was born in the West Indies.

Gen. Taylor, on the other hand, was as dry as a chip, as plain as a pipe-stem, and as short as piecrust. Dressed in his best coat, (which by the bylas if it had served some half a dozen campaigns,) with his glazed oil cloth cap, strapless pants, and old fashioned white vest, he looked more like an old farmer, lately elected militia colonel, who had put on his every day suit, with the slightest imaginable sign of military toggery, to distinguish him from a crowd of mere civilians. In his reply to Ampudia's long harangues, he used such direct, blunt and emphatic language, that the valorous Mexican was thrown all aback and “had nothing to say.”

Ampudia opened the interview by stating that his forces were too large to be conquered by Gen. Taylor's army—that he had an abundance of ammunition 7000 infantry and 3000 cavalry, with 40 cannon, and the best artillerists in the world—that his loss was very small—and he felt confident he could defend the city against a much stronger force than that under Gen. Taylor’s command—but that from motives of humanity—to spare the effusion of blood—to save the lives of helpless women and children—he was willing so far to compromise the glory of the great Mexican nation as to surrender the city provided he was allowed to retire with his whole force, and carry the public property with him, and all the arms and munitions of war. When he had finished his magnificent oration, which in the style of his celebrated proclamation, was garnished with numerous allusions to the stupendous power and unfading glory and renown of magnanimous Mexico, old Zack quietly stuck his hands deep into his breaches pockets, cocked his head a littl on one side, and gently raising his grizly eyebrows, that the bold little black eye lurking beneath might have full play upon the grandiloquent Mexican, replied in these few but expressive words:

“Gen. Ampudia, we came here to take Monterey, and we are going to do it on such terms as please us. I wish you good morning.” And the old General hobbled off on his two short little legs, leaving the Mexican General and Staff in the

NRR 71.197 Apprehensions about winter forage at Santa Fe, large number of men left unemployed there

“ARMY OF THE NORTH”

Upper California. – Santa Fe. The St. Louis Republican of the 16th inst. Announces the arrival in that city of Major Fitzpatrick, U. S. Indian agent for the Oregon territory. He was just from Santa Fe, having left that town on the 14th October.

It was intended that Major Fitzpatrick should accompany Gen. Kearney on his expedition to California, as a guide, his superior knowledge of that country making it very desirable that he should accompany the general. He accordingly did so; but, when about 175 miles from Santa Fe, down the Rio Grande, the command was met by an express from Col. Fremont, with information as to the situation of affairs in Upper California. This party consisted of sixteen. They left Puebla de los Angeles with fifty mules, each carrying about one bushel of dried corn, and when they met Gen. Kearney, such was the expedition with which they had traveled, and the dangers of the route, that only eighteen mules survived. They were thirty-one days on the route. From the express, Gen. Kearney learned that Upper California was completely in possession of her American forces, the Mexicans having been driven out of the territory; that Col. Fremont was acting as provisional governor of that department, and the whole country was quiet.

On the reception of this news, Gen. Kearney determined to dispense with the services of a portion of his force, taking only so many men as were deemed necessary for an escort. He therefore selected one hundred men for this purpose, and ordered the remainder back to Santa Fe. He was accompanied by Captains Johnson, Turner, and Moore, Lieuts. Hammond and Love, and Lieut. Emory, of Topographical Engineers. With this command he recommenced his expedition – taking with him three of the persons who had formed a part of the express company, as guides, and thus relieving Major Fitzpatrick of his duty. He returned with the remainder of the company to Santa Fe, and started thence on the 14th ult. For this city. He will proceed immediately for Washington, having in his charge dispatches from Com. Stockton, commander of the American fleet on the Pacific, for the government.

We learn, further, that the permission given to Capt. Hudson, of the Laclede Rangers, to organize a company of mounted volunteers, to go with the Mormons, on their expedition to California, was countermanded. The Mormons were, therefore, to go without a mounted escort. It was expected that Col. Price, with about 150 men of his regiment, would proceed to California, but this was not positively determined.

There was nothing new at Santa Fe. Much apprehension was felt as to the supply of forage for the horses and cattle, and it was feared that many of them would be lost during the winter. In returning home, many wagons, containing provisions, were met, broken down, and teams had given out. Major F. met Col. Thompson 300 miles from Santa Fe; he had recovered his horses, which had been stolen from him – as heretofore noticed – and was proceeding on his route. Major F. frequently diverged from the road, so as to find grass for his animals, and for this reason saw nothing of Dr. Penn, who left Santa Fe some days before him.

Major F. brings information of the death of a young man named Cowie, whose father resides in this city. He went out with Lieut. Fremont, but at the time belonged to the California volunteers. He was captured by the Mexicans, and most inhumanly tortured to death. He also mentions the death of Bazile Lajeunesse, who has friends in this country. He, and two other persons, were killed by the Klamet Indians, on the route from Oregon to California.

The change in Gen. Kearney’s disposition of his forces will leave a large number of men unemployed at Santa Fe. The regiment under the command of Col. Doniphan had not marched for Chihuahua, but that was their destination. Even then a very considerable military force would be left at Santa Fe – probably not less than fifteen hundred men – and, unless the surrounding Indians should afford them something to do, their career promises to be a very quiet and uninteresting one. NRR 71.198 November 28, 1846 second attack on Alvarado

THE ATTACK UPON ALVARADO, AND THE PROPOSED ATTACK ON TOBASCO

There was a general regret, if we are not mistaken, on witnessing, not only in letters from our gulf squadron, but in official reports from the commander himself, which have been published, expressions of such deep mortification at the result of the attacks upon Alvarado, and an anticipation on the part of the writers of these accounts, that severe censure would be heaped upon those engaged in those affairs by their countrymen. The people, as well as the government of this country, know well enough that our navy, nor any other navy, can surmount impossibilities, navigate where there is not sufficient water, nor achieve victories without adequate means. What it seemed hardly worth while to attempt, for any useful object in view, has been attempted, rather than endure the idea of inactivity. An inhospitable coast was the only enemy dreaded. Who expected our officers to do more than take the chances of fortune in wind and weather, and...
We took occasion yesterday to make some remarks upon the failure of Commodore Conner in his attempt to take the city Alvarado, a result which, we suppose, naval men must have foreseen, if they had known the situation of the city to be assailed, and the difficulties of getting vessels into an assailing position; but especially must any man thus informed, have seen the forces under the real command of Com. Conner, were wholly insufficient for the object. One of the greatest dangers of a military man is to underrate his enemy. But now that the failure has taken place, we are to look out for the assault upon Tabasco - if, indeed, such an assault should really have been ordered. It is possible that instead of running down to the mouth of the river Tabasco, Com. Conner may try another attack with the aid of some troops to invest the town from the water side.

But if Tabasco is to be the object of attack, under Com. Perry, all ordinary experience would indicate that there must be a different and a larger force, than that which failed at Alvarado. The city of Tabasco is about ninety miles up the river, and not like Alvarado, within a few miles of the mouth. The month of Tabasco river is fortified with a pretty strong fort. There is, also, a small town, called Frontere, and the custom house. - But there is a bar off this river as, indeed, there is all along the coast; and there are only twelve feet of water on this bar, really one foot less than Alvarado. The fleet which Com. Perry has at his command is too small for any attack. The Mississippi steamer cannot come within gun-shot of the fort. At Frontere, indeed, neither fort nor town is visible at the bar, and all the guns which Com. P. can take in, are about sixteen 12-pounders, and three 18-pounders, viz: six in the cutter Forward, six in the McLane, and four in the Vixen; and the little schooners Petrel, Bonita, and the Reefer, each carries one 18-pounder. To these may be added the prize schooner Nonata, with four 42-pound carronades. These are all that can be taken over the bar and the two steamers must tow, the two, and the other three vessels.

In the fall of 1840, Com. Moore, of the Texan navy, entered the mouth of the Tabasco river, took possession of the fort, which had only forty men, placed it in charge of troops from Yucatan, and then ascended the river with the following vessels:

- The Austin, a twenty gun ship, viz: eighteen 24, and two 18-pounders.
- The schooner St. Bernard, with seven 12-pounders.
- The steamer Zavala, carrying eight 18-pounders.

These vessels drew the following water, viz: the Austin, eleven feet; St. Bernard, eight feet, and the steamer Zavala, nine feet. To these vessels was added the Yucatan brig Yman, carrying six 12-pounders, and a long 18. (This vessel was afterwards captured by the Mexicans.) All of these sailing vessels were towed by the steamer, and forty-eight hours were consumed in ascending to Tabasco, against a current of from three to four miles an hour. Com. Moore, with his force, took the city, though defended by two forts. He levied a contribution of $25,000 upon the city, before which he lay twenty days, and then departed.

We mention these facts to show that such things can be done, and also to show how they can be done, I will be seen that the force said to be under Com. Perry, is wholly insufficient for the proposed purpose and that to attempt to cross the bar at Tabasco, accompanied as he is, would be a step so rash, as to call for censure from some quarters. Success alone could excuse, scarcely any event would justify the measure.

But why should Tabasco be made the point of attack? It is no in the way of the city of Mexico. Its conquest would not facilitate the movement of our troops towards the center of the country, nor enable them to retreat, if necessary, with greater facility and safety. There is nothing at Tabasco, but Tabasco, and about ten thousand inhabitants, who when conquered, would probably come on board the vessels, and dance with the conquerors, and be as ready the next day to join in a plan to drive them off. But Alvarado is different. At that place there are, we believe, a considerable portion of the Mexican fleet, viz:

- The steamer Rejerador, carrying one long 24, and two 18-pounders.
- The brig Euchatache, with sixteen 18 pounders, and one long 18.
- The brig Santa Anna, with twelve 18 pounders.
- Brigg Yman, captured from the Yucataneees, carrying six 12 pounders, and one long 18.
- Schooner Eagle, with six 18-pounders, and one long 32.
- Schooner Campechiani, with four 12 pounders.

Now the possession of the Alvarado, and the conquest of these vessels, would have been a good day’s work. But this could not be done, for the force at command was wholly insufficient, and thus by frittering away the means, the hopes, and the enterprise of the navy, upon ill advised projects, we see that right arm of national defence suffering, and a gallant Pennsylvanian laboring under the mortification of a failure, when proper means, and sufficient and easily obtained force, would have insured success.

The honor of the navy, the honor of the nation, is concerned in a proper management of this part of the war against Mexico, and every American has a right to demand of the navy department, the employment against assailed points, of a force reasonably large for the object. It is cheapest, it is safest, it is right.

The coast of the gulf seems not to be well understood by any one that directs, and there is in consequence, a continual danger.
The United States Gazette furnishes the following interested article upon the subject: "When the fleet under Com. Perry had been last heard from they were immediately off Tabasco, and were but waiting for a violent swell to subside before passing over the bar to attack the place.

"The squadron consisted of the Mississippi, (flagship) Com. Perry; the Vixen, Com‘r. Sands; revenue cutter McLane, Capt. Howard; revenue cutter Forward, Capt. Jones; prize schr. Nonato, Lieut. Hazard; schr. Reefer, Lieut. Sterrell; and schr. Bonita. Besides these, there were twelve, besides the crews of the respective vessels number two hundred men, principally marines from the Raritan and Cumberland." [KMK]

BOMBARDMENT OF TABASCO

An Officer of the navy furnishes the New Orleans Picayune with details from which it appears that:

One of the principal objects of the expedition was, to capture several vessels that were lying off the town – they were all taken. When the city was summoned to surrender, the people were all in favor of yielding at once. The governor and soldiery opposed it. Time was given for all peaceable persons, women and children, to get out of harm’s way; but the governor would not allow any one to leave, so that it is feared most of those killed during the bombardment were not soldiers. Some of the regulars were killed. Had it not been that the execution was principally done upon inoffensive person, the city would have been demolished, with the exception of the residences of foreign consuls and the hospitals. [KMK]

NRR 71.200-201 November 28, 1846 Gen. Zachary Taylor's official account of taking of Monterey
Sir: I have now the honor to submit a detailed report of the recent operations before Monterey, resulting in the capitulation of that city.

The information received on the route from Seralvo, and particularly the continual appearance in our front of the Mexican cavalry, which had a slight skirmish with our advance at the village of Ramas, induced the belief, as we approached Monterey, that the enemy would defend that place. Upon reaching the neighborhood of the city on the morning of the 19th of September, this belief was fully confirmed. It was ascertained that he occupied the town in force; that a large work had been constructed commanding all the northern approaches; and that the Bishop’s Palace, and some heights in its vicinity near the Altillo road, had also been fortified and occupied with troops and artillery. It was known, from information previously received, that the eastern approaches were commanded by several small works in the lower edge of the city.

The configuration of the heights and gorges in the direction of the Saltillo road, as visible from the point attained by our advance on the morning of the 19th, led me to suspect that it was practicable to turn all the works in that direction, and thus cut the enemy’s line of communication. After establishing my camp at the “Walnut Springs,” three miles from Monterey, the nearest suitable position, it was accordingly, my first care to order a close reconnaissance of the ground in question, which was executed on the evening of the 19th by the engineering officers under the direction of Major Mansfield. A reconnaissance of the eastern approaches was at the same time made by Capt. Williams, topographical engineer. The examination made by Major Mansfield proved the entire practicability of throwing forward a column to the Saltillo road, and thus turning the position of the enemy. Deeming this to be an operation of essential importance, orders were given to Brevet Brig. Gen. Worth, commanding the second division, to march with his command on the 20th; to turn the hill of the Bishop’s Palace; to occupy a position on the Saltillo road, and to carry the enemy’s detachment works in that quarter, where practicable. The first regiment of Texas mounted volunteers, under command of Col. Hays, was associated with the second division on this service. Capt. Sanders, engineers, and Lieut. Meade, topographical engineers, were also ordered to report to General Worth for duty with his column.

At 2 o’clock P. M. on the 20th, the second division took up its march. It was soon discovered, by officers who were reconnoitering the town, and communicated to Gen. Worth, that its movement had been perceived, and that the enemy was throwing reinforcements towards the Bishop’s Palace and the height which commands it. To divert his attention as far as practicable, the first division, under Brig. Gen. Twiggs, and field division of volunteers, under Major Gen. Butler, were displayed in front of the town until dark. Arrangements were made at the same time to place in battery during the night, at a suitable distance from the enemy’s main work the citadel, two 24-pounder howitzers and a 10-inch mortar, with a view to open a fire on the following day, when I proposed to make a diversion in favor of Gen. Worth’s movement. The 4th infantry covered this battery during the night. Gen. Worth had in the mean time reached and occupied for the night a defensive position just without range of a battery above the Bishop’s Palace, having made a reconnaissance as far as the Saltillo road.

Before proceeding to report the operations of the 21st and following days, I beg leave to state that I shall mention in detail only those which were conducted against the eastern extremity of the city or elsewhere, under my immediate direction, referring you for the particulars of Gen. Worth’s operations, which were entirely detached, to his own full report transmitted herewith.

Early on the morning of the 21st, I received a note from Gen. Worth, written at half past 9 o’clock the night before, suggesting what I had already intended, a strong diversion against the center and left of the town, to favor his enterprise against the heights in rear. The infantry and artillery of the first division, and the field division of volunteers, were ordered under arms and took the direction of the city, leaving one company of each regiment as a camp guard. The 2d dragoons, under Lieut. Col. May, and Col. Wood’s regiment of Texas mounted volunteers, under the immediate direction of Gen. Henderson, were directed to the right, to support Gen. Worth, if necessary, and to make an impression, if practicable, upon the upper quarter of the city. Upon approaching the mortar battery, the 1st and 3d regiments of infantry and battalion of Baltimore and Washington volunteers, with Capt. Bragg’s field battery – the whole under the command of the Lieut. Col. Garland – were directed towards the lower part of the town, with orders to make a strong demonstration, and to carry one of the enemy’s advanced works, if it could be done without too heavy loss. Major Mansfield, engineers, and Capt. Williams and Lieut. Pope, topographical engineers, accompanied this column, Major Mansfield being charged with its direction, and the designation of points of attack. In the mean time the mortar, served by Capt. Ramsay, of the ordnance, and the howitzer battery under Capt. Webster, 1st artillery, and opened their fire upon the citadel, which was deliberately sustained, and answered from the work. – Gen. Butler’s division had now taken up a position in the rear of this battery, when the discharges of artillery, mingled finally with a rapid fire of small arms, showed that Lieut. Col. Garland’s command had become warmly engaged. I now deemed it necessary to support this attack, and accordingly ordered the 4th infantry and three regiments of Gen. Butler’s division to march at once by the left flank in the direction of the advanced work at the lower extremity of the town, leaving one regiment (1st Kentucky) to cover the mortar and howitzer battery. – By some mistake, two companies of the 4th infantry did not receive this order, and consequently did not join the advance companies until some time afterwards.

Lieut. Colonel Garland’s command had approached the town in direction to the right of the advanced work (No. 1) at the northeastern angle of the city, and the engineer officer, covered by skirmishers, had succeeded in entering the suburbs & gaining cover. The remainder of this command now advanced and entered the town under a heavy fire of... artillery from the citadel and the works on the left, and of musketry from the houses and small works in front. A movement to the right was attempted with a view to gain the rear of No. 1, and carry that work, but the troops were so much exposed to a fire which they could not effectually return, and had already sustained such severe loss, particularly in officers, that it was deemed best to withdraw them to a more secure position. Capt. Backus, 1st infantry, however, with a portion of his own and other companies, had gained the roof of a tannery, which looked directly into the gorge of No. 1, and from which he poured a most destructive fire into that work and upon the strong building in its rear. This fire happily coincided in point of time with the advance of a portion of the volunteer division upon No. 1, and contributed largely to the fall of that strong and important work.

The three regiments of the volunteer division under the immediate command of Major. Gen. Butler had in the mean time advanced in the direction of No. 1. The leading brigade, under Brigadier Gen. Quitman, continued its advance upon the work, preceded by three companies of the 4th infantry, while Gen. Butler, with the 1st Ohio regiment, entered the town to the right. The companies of the 4th infantry had advanced within short range of the work, when they were received by a fire that almost in one moment struck down one-third of the officers and men, rendered it necessary to retire and effect a conjunction with the two other companies then advancing. Gen. Quitman's brigade, though suffering most severely, particularly in the Tennessee regiment, continued its advance, and finally carried the work in handsome style, as well as the strong building in its rear. Five pieces of artillery, a considerable supply of ammunition, and thirty prisoners, including three officers, fell into our hands. Major Gen. Butler, with the 1st Ohio regiment, after entering the edge of the town, discovered that nothing was to be accomplished in his front, and at this point, yielding to the suggestions of several officers, I ordered a retrograde movement; but learning almost immediately from one of my staff that the battery No. 1 was in our possession, the order was countermanded, and I determined to hold the battery and the defences already gained. Gen. Butler, with the 1st Ohio regiment, then entered the town at a point further to the left, and marched in the direction of the battery No. 2. While making an examination with a view to ascertain the possibility of carrying this second work by storm, the general was wounded and soon after compelled to quit the field. As the strength of the No. 2, and the heavy musketry fire flanking the approach, rendered it impossible to carry it without great loss, the 1st Ohio regiment was withdrawn from the town.

Fragments of the various regiments engaged were now under cover of the captured battery and some buildings in its front and on the right. The field batteries of Capt. Bragg and Ridgely were also partially covered by the battery. An incessant fire was kept up on this position from battery No. 2 and other works on its right, and from the citadel, on all our approaches. General Twiggs, though quite unwell, joined me at this point, and was instrumental in causing the artillery captured from the enemy to be placed in battery, and served by Capt. Ridgely against No. 2 until the arrival of Capt. Webster's howitzer battery, which took its place. In the mean time I directed such men as could be collected of the 1st, 3d, and 4th regiments and Baltimore battalion to enter the town, penetrating to the right, and carry the second battery, if possible. This command, under Lieut. Col. Garland, advanced beyond the bridge "Purisima," when finding it impracticable to gain the rear of the second battery, a portion of it sustained themselves for some time in that advanced position; but as no permanent impression could be made at that point, and the main object of the general operation had been effected, the command, including a section of Capt. Ridgely's battery, which had joined it, was withdrawn to battery No. 1. During the absence of this column, a demonstration of cavalry was reported in the direction of the citadel. Captain Bragg, who was at hand, immediately galloped with his battery to a suitable position, from which a few discharges effectually dispersed the enemy. Captain Miller, 1st infantry, was dispatched with a mixed command, to support the battery on this service. – The enemy's lancers had previously charged upon the Ohio and a part of the Mississippi regiment, near some fields at a distance from the edge of the town, and had been repulsed with considerable loss. A demonstration of cavalry on the opposite side of the river was also dispersed in the course of the afternoon by Capt. Ridgely's battery, and the squadrons returned to the city. At the approach of evening all the troops that had been engaged were ordered back to camp except Capt. Ridgely's battery and the regular infantry of the first division, who were detailed as a guard for the works during the night, under command of Lieut. Col. Garland. One battalion of the first Kentucky regiment was ordered to reinforce this command. Intrenching tools were procured, and addition strength was given to the works, and protection to the men, by working parties during the night, under the direction of Lieut. Scarritt, engineers.

The main object proposed in the morning had been effected. A powerful diversion had been made to favor the operations of the 2d division, one of the enemy's advanced works had been carried, and we now had a strong foothold in the town. But this had not been accomplished without a very heavy loss embracing some of our most gallant and promising officers. Capt. Williams, topographical engineers, Lieuts. Terrett and Dilworth, 1st infantry, Lieut. Woods, 2d infantry, Capt. Morris and Field, Brevet Major Barbour, Lieuts. Irwin and Hazlitt, 3d infantry, Lieut. Hoskins, 4th infantry, Lieut. Col. Watson, Baltimore battalion, Captain Allen and Lieut. Putman, Tennessee regiment, and Lieut. Hett, Ohio regiment, were killed, or have since died of wounds received in this engagement, while the number and rank of the officers wounded gives additional proof of the obstinacy of the contest, and the good conduct of our troops. The number of killed and wounded incident to the operations in the lower part of the city on the 21st is 394.

Early in the morning of this day, (21st,) the advance of the 2d division had encountered the enemy in force, and after a brief and sharp conflict, repulsed him with heavy loss. Gen. Worth then succeeded in gaining a position on the Saltillo road, thus cutting the enemy's line of communication. From the position the two heights south of the Saltillo road were carried in succession, and the gun taken in one of them turned upon the Bishop's Palace. – These important successes were fortunately obtained with comparatively small loss, Capt. McKavett, 8th infantry, being the only officer killed.

The 22d day of September passed without any active operations in the lower part of the city. The citadel and other works continued to fire at parties exposed to their range, and at the work now occupied by our troops. The guard left in it the preceding night, except Capt. Ridgely's company, was relieved at mid-day by Gen. Quitman's brigade. Capt. Bragg's battery was thrown under cover in front of the town to repel any demonstration of cavalry in that quarter. At dawn of day, the height above the Bishop’s Palace was carried, and soon after meridian the Palace itself was taken and its guns turned upon the fugitive garrison. The object for which the 2d division was detached had thus been completely accomplished, and I felt confident that with a strong force occupying the road and heights in his rear, and a good position below the city in our possession, the enemy could not possibly maintain the town.

During the night of the 22d, the enemy evacuated nearly all his defences in the lower part of the city. This was reported to me early in the morning of the 23d by Gen. Quitman, who had already mediated an assault upon those works. I immediately sent instructions to that officer, leaving it to his discretion to enter the city, covering his men by the houses and walls, and advance carefully as far as he might deem prudent. After ordering the remainder of the troops as a reserve, under the orders of Brigadier General Twigg, I repaired to the abandoned works, and discovered that a portion of Gen. Quitman’s brigade had entered the town, and were successfully forcing their way towards the principal plaza. I then ordered up the 2d regiment of Texas mounted volunteers, who entered the city, dismounted, and under the immediate orders of Gen. Henderson, co-operated with Gen. Quitman’s brigade. Capt. Bragg’s battery was also ordered up, supported by the 3d infantry; and after firing for some time at the cathedral, a portion of it was like wise thrown into the town. Our troops advanced from house to house, and from square to square, until they reached a street but one square in the rear of the principal plaza, in and near which the enemy’s force was mainly concentrated. This advance was conducted vigorously but with due caution, and, although destructive to the enemy, was attended with small loss on our part. Capt. Ridgely, in the mean time, had served a captured piece in battery No. 1 against the city, until the advance of our men rendered it imprudent to fire in the direction of the cathedral. I was now satisfied that we could operate successfully in the city, and that the enemy that had retired from the lower portion of it to make a stand behind hi barricades. As Gen. Quitman’s brigade had been on duty the previous night, I determined to withdraw the troops to the evacuated works, and concert with Gen. Worth a combined attack upon the town. The troops accordingly feel back deliberately, in good order and resumed their original positions, Gen. Quitman’s brigade being relieved after nightfall by that of Gen. Hamer. On my return to camp, I met an officer with the intelligence that Gen. Worth, induced by the firing in the lower part of the city, was about making an attack at the upper extremity, which had also been evacuated by the enemy to a considerable distance. I regretted that this information had not inexpedient to change my orders, and accordingly returned to camp. A note from Gen. Worth, written at eleven o’clock P. M., informed me that he had advanced to within a short distance of the principal plaza, and that the mortar (which had been sent to his division in the morning) was doing good execution within effective range of the enemy’s position. Desiring to make no further attempt upon the city without complete concert as to the lines and mode of approach, I instructed that officer to suspend his advance until I could have an interview with him on the following morning at his headquarters.

Early on the morning of the 24th I received, through Col. Moreno, a communication from Gen. Ampudia, proposing to evacuate the town; which, with the answer, were forwarded with my first dispatch. I arranged with Col. Moreno a cessation of fire until 12 o’clock, at which hour I would receive the answer of the Mexican general at General Worth’s headquarters to which I soon repaired. In the mean time, Gen. Ampudia had signified to Gen. Worth his desire for a personal interview with me, to which I acceded, and which finally resulted in a capitulation, placing the town and the materiel of war, with certain exceptions, in our possession. A copy of that capitulation was transmitted with my first dispatch.

Upon occupying the city, it was discovered to be of great strength in itself, and to have its approaches carefully and strongly fortified. The town and works were armed with 42 pieces of cannon, well supplied with ammunition, and manned with a force of at least 7,000 troops of the line, and from 2000 to 3000 irregulars. The force under my orders before Monterey, as exhibited by the accompanying return, was 425 officers, and 6,220 men. Our artillery consisted of one 10 inch mortar, two 24 pounder howitzers, and four light field batteries of four guns each – the mortar being the only piece suitable to the operation of a siege.

Our loss is twelve officers and one hundred and eight men killed; thirty one officers and three hundred and thirty seven men wounded. That of the enemy is not known, but is believed considerably to exceed our own.

I take pleasure in bringing to the note of the government the good conduct of the troops, both regulars and volunteers, which has been conspicuous throughout the operations. I am proud to bear testimony of their coolness and constancy in battle, and the cheerfulness with which they have submitted to exposure and privation. To the general officer’s commanding divisions – Major Generals Butler and Henderson, and Brigadier Generals Twigg and Worth – I must express my obligations for the efficient aid which they have rendered in their respective commands. I was unfortunately deprived, early on the 21st, of the valuable services of Major General Butler, who was disabled by a wound received in the attack on the city. Major General Henderson, commanding the Texas volunteers, has given me important aid in the organization of his command, and its subsequent operations. Brigadier Gen. Twigg rendered important services with his division, and as the second in command after Major General Butler was disabled. Brigadier General Worth was intrusted with an important detachment, which rendered his operations independent of my own. Those operations were conducted with ability, and crowned with complete success.

I desire also to notice Brigadier General Hamer and Quitman, commanding brigades in Gen. Butler’s division. Lieutenant Colonels Garland and Wilson, commanding brigades in General Twigg’s division, Colonels Mitchell, Campbell, Davis, and Wood, commanding the Ohio, Tennessee, Mississippi, and 2d Texas regiments, respectively, and Majors Lear, Allen, and Abercrombie, commanding the 3d, 4th, and 1st regiments of infantry; all of whom served under my eye and conducted their commands with coolness and gallantry against the enemy. Colonel Mitchell, Lieut. Colonel M’Clung, Mississippi regiment, Major Lear, 3d infantry, and Major Alexander, Tennessee regiment, were all severely wounded, as were Captain Lamotte, Lieut. Graham, 4th infantry, Adj. Armstrong, Ohio regiment, Lieuts. Scudder and Allen, Tennessee regiment, and Lieut. Howard Mississippi regiment, while leading their men against the enemy’s position on the 21st and 23d. After the fall of Col. Mitchell, the command of the 1st Ohio regiment devolved upon Lieut. Col. Weller; that of the 3d infantry, after the fall of Major Lear, devolved in succession upon Captain Bainbridge and Captain Henry, former being also wounded.
The following named officers have been favorably noticed by their commanders: Lieut. Col. Anderson, and Adjutant Herman, Tennessee regiment; Lieut. Col. M’Clung, Capts. Cooper and Downing, Lieuts. Patterson, Calhoun, Moore, Russel, and Cook, Mississippi regiment; also Sergeant Maj. Hearlan, Mississippi regiment, and Major Price and Capt. J. R. Smith, unattached but serving with it. I beg leave also to call attention to Captain Johnson, Ohio regiment, and Lieut. Hooker, 1st artillery, serving on the staff of Gen. Hamer, and Lieut. Nichols, 2d artillery, on that of Gen. Quitman. Capts. Bragg and Ridgely served with their batteries during the operation under my own observation, and is part under my immediate orders, and exhibited distinguished skill and gallantry. Capt. Webster, 1st artillery, assisted by Lieuts. Donalds and Bowen, rendered good service with the howitzer battery, which was much exposed to the enemy’s fire on the 21st.

From the nature of the operations, the 2d dragoons were not brought into action, but were usefully employed under the direction of Lieut. Col. May as escorts, and in keeping open our communications. – The 1st Kentucky regiment was also prevented from participating in the action of the 21st, but rendered highly important services under Col Ormsby, in covering the mortar battery, and holding in check the enemy’s cavalry during the day.

I have noticed above the officers whose conduct either fell under my own immediate eye, or is noticed only in minor reports which are forwarded. – For further mention of individuals, I beg leave to refer to the reports of division commanders herewith respectfully transmitted. I fully concur in their recommendations, and desire that they may be considered as part of my own report.

From the officers of my personal staff and of the engineers, topographical engineers, and ordinance associated with me, I have derived valued and different assistance during the operations. Col. Whitting, assistant quartermaster general, Colonels Crogham and Belknap, inspectors general, Major Bliss, assistant adjutant general, Capt. Sibley, assistant quartermaster, Captain Waggamah, commissary of subsistence, Capt. Eaton and Lieut Garnett, aids de camp, and Majs Kirby and Van Buren, pay department, served near my person, and were ever prompt in all situations, in the communication of my orders and instructions. I must express my particular obligations to Brevet Majr Mansfield and Lieut. Scarritt, corps of engineers. They both rendered most important services in reconnoitering the enemy’s position, conducting troops in attack, and strengthening the works captured from the enemy. Maj. Mansfield, though wounded on the 21st, remained on duty during that and the following day, until confined by his wound to camp.

Captain Williams, topographical engineers, to my great regret and the loss of the service, was mortally wounded while fearlessly exposing himself in the attack on the 21st. Lieut. Pope, of the same corps, was active and zealous throughout the operation. Maj. Monroe, chief of the artillery, Maj Craig and Capt. Ramsay of the ordnance, were assiduous in the performance of their proper duties. The former superintended the mortar service on the 22d, as particularly mentioned in the report of General Worth, to which I also refer for the services of the engineer and topographical officers detached with the second division.

Surgeon Craig, medical director, was actively employed in the important duties of his department, and the medical staff generally were unremitting in their attentions to the numerous wounded – their duties with the regular regiments being rendered uncommonly arduous by the small number serving in the field.

I respectfully enclosed herewith, in addition to the reports of division commanders, a held return of the force before Monterey, on the 21st September – a return of killed, wounded, and missing during the operations – and two topographical sketches – one exhibiting all the movements around Monterey – the other on a larger scale frustration more particularly the operations in the lower quarter of the city – prepared respectively by Lieuts. Meade and Pope, topographical engineers.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your ob’t serv’t.

Z. TAYLOR
Major General U. S. A. Com.

The ADJUTANT GENERAL of the army,
Washington, D. C.
[KMK]
John C. Hays, a native of Middle Tennessee, came to Texas early in the year 1839, I believe, and settling a San Antonio, commenced business as a land agent and surveyor. This calling was, then, exceedingly dangerous, for it was rare indeed that a surveying party went beyond the settlements without a rencontre with either Mexicans, Camanches, Beediis, Wacoes, Towackanies, Keechies, or straggling bands of some other hostile tribe infesting the western frontier of Texas. In these encounters, Hays, though hardly a man in age, soon obtained a reputation for coolness, judgment, courage, energy, and a knowledge of frontier life and Indian and Mexican character, which induced the government of Texas to render to him the command of its first company of rangers, which was organized in the winter of 1840 and '41. Sometime afterwards, when it was found necessary to raise two more ranging companies, Capt. Hays was invested with the command of the battalion, with the rank of major, and he and "his men" continued to serve as rangers until the annexation. He is not more than 30 years of age (if so old) and weights from 130 to 140 pounds. I need say nothing to you concerning his remarkable soldierly qualities, for the pens and voices of such men as Balie Peyton and Gen. Worth have already told the world that it holds few such warriors as Jack Hays.

In western Texas, where, from habit, all men are good Indian and Mexican fighters, modesty is his most remarkable trait; for it is no uncommon thing to hear an over-modest man characterized as being almost as modest as Jack Hays. Indeed, I question whether there is a man in Taylor's army who has as poor an opinion of the merits and services of H. as himself. He thinks much and speaks little, and that little always to the purpose. There never lived a commander more idolized by his men; for his word is their law. Now, as they are regular frontier men, and of course, notoriously restless under any other restraint, his perfect control of them attracted much curiosity, and many inquiries in Texas before its annexation. Their experience with him as a soldier has given him their confidence; but his rigid and exact justice to him, his habits of living and faring as roughly as any private in the regiment: when on duty, and of treating each comrade in arms as in all respect his equal when not on duty, are probably the reason why the boys, one and all, are so willing, without a murmur, to live on parched corn, ride 70 or 80 miles without demounting for five minutes at a time, or to fight Mexicans with pick axes, when Hays deems either necessary.

His men, who, in the estimation of Gen. Worth, are the best light troops in the world, are just the men to be led by such an officer.

Out of the four hundred I presume at least three hundred and fifty are farmers and stock raisers in a small way on the Colorado, Navidad, Layacea, Guadaloupe, and San Antonio, rivers in western Texas.

From the time of the battle of San Jacinto up to forty-one, when formed into regular ranging companies, they defended the frontier on their own book without pay, employment, provision, or even ammunition at the expense of the government. Whenever Indians or Mexicans approached the settlements runners were dispatched up and down the rivers I have before named to sound the alarm, and on such notice these now composing Hay's "first regiment of Texas rangers" rarely required more than six hours to prepare for a campaign of three months; for, after all, catching their horses, running fifty . . ., and parching and grinding a half bushel of corn for cold flour or pan . . as the Mexicans term it, were the only preparation necessary. Hot or cold, wet or dry, they carried no tents, and required no other provisions than fresh beef, which was usually driven with them. Once in a while a green horn, on his first campaign, would pack a . . . but he would soon learn that boys who had to fight for nothing and find their own horse flesh and ammunition could it about as well on "..." surplus. In fact, after . . . experience with such a life, few at least of those then, would be troubled with the care of any other provisions with beef, or with any other equipment than shooting irons, bowie knife, a pair of old blankets, a Mexican saddletree, and a good horse; which, with leather breeches, indomitable perseverance, an extra shirt, a light heart, great capacity for endurance and sworn hatred to Mexicans and Indians, make up the Texas ranger.

Suffer me to digress for a moment in order to say that having been "one" four or five times with these men, I claim to know what is necessary for the true comforts of the soldier in active service. With this knowledge, I was not a little amused the other day, on reading the Baltimore bill of complaints against the government and Gen. William O. Butler, I can well imagine the fun the young gentlemen correspondent of the Sun would afford to a squad or Hays’ men, on telling his griefs over their camp fire. I refer to the writer who growls about no sugar when his coffee is ready, and no bread when there is beef enough. Verify, if the boys had not smelt "carni" for a fortnight, they would quit the very interesting work, (under such circumstances,) of roasting ribs to "roast" such a customer after their own fashion; and Heaven help the grumbler who falls into their hands.

But to continue. When the government of Texas organized these men into regular companies, they first began to receive pay, and, perhaps, half of those now with Hays, gave up their farms and took to soldiering for a livelihood.

Capt. Ben. McCulloch, who commands the first company of his regiment, (to which ... of the Picayune, is attached;) G. T. Howard, who was lately dispatched to Santa Fe by the president, and has since joined Wool's force, to which he will soon be what McCulloch is to the main army; poor Gillespie, who was killed in battle, and Hancock Chevallie, originally of Richmond, VA., were Hays’ right hand men in the frontier campaigns of Texas. McCulloch is a native of Tennessee, near the Alabama line, and came to Texas from the latter state, settling in Gonzales county, as a surveyor. He served one of the two field pieces in the battle of San Jacinto, "the twin sisters," as the Texans dubbed them, and there, for the first time, distinguished himself. He is the hero of what is known as the Plumb creek fight with the Indians who burnt Linnville. Howard is a native of this city, and commanded in the famous court house fight in the town of San Antonio, when he found it necessary to close the door, and with nineteen men, to fight thirty-seven Camanches, both parties being completely armed. In this melee, he himself received four wounds, and lost nine men killed, all the rest of the command being more or less wounded. But seen of the Indians got out of the room alive; and of those, six were subsequently killed in the street. Gillespie is either a native of Virginia or Tennessee; and being the lieutenant of the first company of rangers, was chosen its captain when Hays was promoted to the command of the original battalion. Indeed, all these gentlemen are distinguished frontier officers, having long since won their way to fame in Texas, in, I may almost write, a hundred well-fought battles. S. W. Walker, the Capt. Walker of the beginning of this campaign, who, by the by, is from this city also, is now the lieutenant colonel of the regiment, having fairly earned his election in the events of the month prior the battles of the 8th and 9th of May last. Ever since the organization of the ranging corps, he has been one of their number; though, heretofore, I do not know that he was distinguished beyond his comrades generally. Before the annexation f Texas, and election for a lieutenant of the 1st company (Gillespie’s) took place, and Edward Ratcliffe, a brother to Daniel Ratcliffe, Esq., of this city, was chosen, Walker being his competitor. Ratcliffe, poor fellow, was killed in the little fight between nine men; under Walker, and a party of Mexicans, which took place a few days prior to the battle on the 8th of May.

But when I think of these men, facts crowd so fast on my memory, that I might write you about them until daybreak. A personal knowledge of at least three fourths of the men of the regiment, teaches me that Col. Balie Peyton has not praised them beyond their true desserts in saying that –

“Amongst the volunteers, none have shown more conspicuously than the 1st regiment of Texas mounted riflemen, commanded by that chevalier Bayard, Col. J. C. Hays, better known as Jack Hays. This corps, from the colonel to the private, has fully sustained its former reputation. In the first affairs in which Gen. Worth’s division was engaged on the morning of the 21st, Col. Hays, with several companies of his mounted riflemen, were thrown forward to open the bail, which he did most beautifully, encountering and shooting in the presence of the general the colonel of dragoons who commanded the enemy’s forces. In scaling heights, storming batteries, and clambering over walls and house-tops, the voice of the gallant colonel, and the reports of the unerring rifle of the ranger, were over heard in the yon. – The courage and constancy, and subordination of this corps is the theme of admiration in the army.” [KMK]

NKR 71.209 December 5, 1846 review of the condition of affairs

NKR 71.209 California’s occupied, Mexican ports in possession, position of the armies, Gen. Winfield Scott and Com. Charles Stewart to assume command and Veracruz the next point of attack, move-making with that view

WAR WITH MEXICO

The conquest of the Californias, the occupation of Santa Fe, and that of the province of Chihuahua may be considered as effected. The entire valley of the Rio Grande will soon be in our occupation and the mountain passes beyond Monterey, as far as Saltillo, are probably by this time occupied by American troops. Much of the sparse & principally “savage” population of these remote provinces, have never been fairly subjected at any time to Mexican authority. Adventurers have here and there located themselves and maintained a frontier independence, whist submitting so far to Mexican government as they could distinguish to be to their interest at the moment, and defying authority whenever they thought proper. – The question with all of these, at present is, which government, Mexico or the United States, is likely to afford the best protection, the most indulgence, the cheapest supplies and the best prices for what they have to dispose of?

These questions are decided. The choice has no doubt been made. The forms of ratification alone remain to be adjusted. The forms will be far more difficult of adjustment at Washington, than within the late Mexican boundaries.

The ports of the entire coast of Mexico, the Pacific on one side, and the Gulf of Mexico on the other, may be considered as either in possession of the United States forces, or closely blockaded, so as to be no longer ports to Mexico, except by the sufferance of one squadron.

All this notwithstanding, there is no doubt that the intelligence which our government are now in possession of, has led them to conclude that this war is not likely to be terminated so speedily as they had, until a few days past, flattered both themselves and the people of this country that it would be. These is no longer a lingering hope that Santa Anna, or that the people of central Mexico are not seriously determined to maintain their nationality and resist invasion to the last extremity.

This prospect has awakened our government to the necessity of adopting measures which are now in progress, materially changing the whole project of invasion. The services, talents, and experience of the commander-in-chief, Gen. Scott, heretofore confined to bureau duties at the seat of government, are called into more active requisition. He proceeded last week, with his suite, to New York, where he embarked for New Orleans, and will embark from that port.
for Point Isabel, and thence to Tampico, which has just been taken possession of by the American squadron under Commodore Conner. To this point, troops have been ordered, and are now hurried on from various directions. A considerable proportion of the forces under Gen. Taylor posted along the line from Point Isabel to Monterey, for the security of his rear and the safe transport of his supplies, are understood to have been ordered to proceed under Gen. Patterson’s command, towards Tampico. – Marching an army from Monterey, by the Saltillo route, to the city of Mexico, is supposed to have been abandoned. It is stated and believed that Gen. Taylor, early last spring, expressed to the department of war his opinion that it would be impolitic, if not impracticable, to reach Mexico by that route. His advice was probably overruled by suggestions of others less qualified to judge. However that may have been, Gen. Taylor was ordered to advance, first, from Corpus Christi to the Rio Grande, from Matamoros to Camargo, from Camargo to Monterey, and from Monterey to Saltillo, and from thence onward. Instead of exercising his own discretion, he has OBEYED ORDERS, up to the receipt of the very last. We have no doubt that it was the united recommendation of the principal officers under General Taylor’s command, as well as of that general himself, forwarded after the conclusions of the armistice at Monterey, that contributed to influence our government to relinquish or materially modify their design of progress in that direction, and to countermand their previous orders.

The impression now is, that the most formidable movement will be from some point on the gulf, either Tampico, Vera Cruz, or some other place, much nearer to the “Hall of the Montezumas,” and to, and from which supplies or reinforcements may be forwarded without on third of the cost of either time or expense, that would be required by the Saltillo route. To concentrate an adequate force at this new point, and furnish it with ample supplies for a successful invasion through the thickly populated portion of Mexico to its capital, will require some months. Mean time, whatever has been taken possession of, must be held by our army and navy.

There are indications also, more emphatic than on several former occasions, that Vera Cruz is to be attacked both by sea and land. Our taking possession of that place would be nearly as sever a blow to Mexico as the taking of the city of Mexico itself. Com. STEWART, one of the most experienced officers of the navy, has proceeded to Washington, by direction of the executive, and the impression here is, that the command of the naval operations in the gulf, and hoist his broad pendant on board one of our heaviest ships of the line, now fitting out for that purpose. Com. MORRIS left Washington on the 2d inst. for New York, it is said, with a view of procuring bombs and other materiel for an attack on Vera Cruz. Gen. Scott and Com. Stewart are directly to act in concert, and the largest powers have no doubt been confided to their joint discretion for the management of the invasion and conquest of Mexico. No officers in our service have the advantage of more experience; by age if it qualifies for counsel, is apt, in an equal degree to disqualify for active operations, either at sea or in the field.

Our latest dates from Brazos San Jago, are to the 21st ult. The Baltimore committee to bring home the remains of the Maryland heroes that fell that Monterey, reached Brazos on the 19th from New Orleans. No intelligence from Monterey later than heretofore given.

From New Orleans we learn that the steamship Alabama, of N. O., has been purchased by the U. S. government for $90,000.

The steamer Neptune, was to leave Brazos for Tampico on the 21st inst., with seven companies of regulars of the second regiment artillery under the command of Col. Belton. The steamer Sea was taking in the field battery, consisting of to 18-pounders and sixteen 6-pounders.

The U. S. steamer Mississippi, Com. Perry’s flagship, left the Balize on the 23d ult for Tampico.

The schr. J. T. Bertine, from New Orleans for Matagorda, with government stores, was wrecked on the 9th ult. – vessel and cargo a total loss. [KMK]

NNR 71.209 December 5, 1846 condensed table of killed and wounded at Monterey

| KILLED AND WOUNDED AT THE SIEGE OF MONTEREY |

We are indebted to the N. O. Picayune for the following recapitulation, prepared from the returns which were inserted in a late number of the Register – page 182. “This,” says the P. “makes the sum total of killed and wounded 550. If to these were added a few classed as missing, it would bring up our loss nearly to the figure we once gave – namely, 561.”

"ARMY OF THE CENTRE"
MARCH FROM SAN ANTONIO DE BEXAR TO THE RIO GRANDE

Camp near Presidio de Rio Grande
Mexico, October 13, 1846

SIR: In compliance with your instructions, I have the honor to submit, herewith, a brief report of your route and march from San Antonio de Bexar to the Rio Grande:

First day, September 29th – The march commenced at 9 o’clock in the morning; and in about one hour, the dry bed of the Alazon Arroyo was crossed, water being found there only at uncertain periods. After leaving this narrow valley, the land rises, and is somewhat rolling, but, with the exception of the lines of shrubbery which skirt the water courses, is generally destitute of vegetation. The Leon is about three miles from Alazon, and the Medio four or five miles from Leon. These streams are seldom dry. The Medina, distant about twenty-six miles from San Antonio, was forded at 4 o’clock P. M. – This is a fine stream of water, rising N. W. of San Antonio, and a never failing tributary of the river of that name. The village of Castroville is located here; the inhabitants are mostly German. The place is yet in its infancy, and, of course, incapable of furnishing supplies of any sort to any considerable extent. It is understood that several hundred bushels of corn have been procured in the vicinity this season. The camp was a mile west of the village. – On the right bank of the river the grazing was not good; the dragoon horses, were, therefore, sent over the river, where the grass had not suffered from the fire.

Second day – It was 7 o’clock this morning when we left the camp. In a short time we reached a hill of considerable height, in descending which, the axle-tree of an ammunition wagon was broken. The main body, however, passed on, after the necessary means were taken for repairs, and entered upon a wild and broken country, differing very much from that traversed the day before. The Quije was crossed about 10 o’clock, distant from the Medina about nine miles. The land here is fertile, and near it a small German settlement is formed, but there is no evidence of prosperity in its appearance, and the people complain of much sickness. From the Quije to the Alamos there is a distance of five miles, and thence to the Hondo is about seven miles. The country is rolling and rocky; has more timber than is usual in Texas, among which the stunted live oak, the only kind found here, is most conspicuous. The Hondo is good water, but is not a continuous stream; near our encampment the water was found only in pools. We reached this position at 2 o’clock P. M.

Third day – The march of this day commenced a few minutes before sunrise. Soon after leaving camp, the column entered upon an open prairie, presenting the worst features of the hog wallow species; which in wet weather would be almost impassable. The Seco is nearly seven miles from the Hondo, and, from its name, is probably dry at certain seasons.

The Sabinal was crossed a few minutes after 12 o’clock, where we found the advance, under Colonel Harney, in camp. The soil through which the road of to-day passes is generally of clay, with superficial deposits of gravel. Distance of to-day about twenty miles.

Fourth day – The whole body started this morning at 5 o’clock. The country traversed throughout the day is thickly covered with herbs and dwarf shrubs, but the trees are few and of little size. Stony creek is about seven miles from the Sabinal, and from it to the west branch of the Frio the distance is nearly the same. The second dragons, infantry, and volunteers were encamped at this place, while the first dragons and artillery passed on over a road of almost solid limestone, shaded at intervals by scraggy live oaks to the Leona, where we arrived about 12 o’clock. It was necessary to cut down the banks of this creek preparatory to the passage of the train which, after the labors of the pioneers, was successfully accomplished. The water of this stream is the best on the route, and it is asserted that the quantity is annually increasing. In its immediate vicinity, on the left bank, the soil is rich, and covered with an unusually dense growth of timber. The grazing is not good.

Fifth day – After leaving the bottom of the Leona, the country presents the usual appearance of the prairie, is of a sterile and unproductive character, stony, and without much timber. We came in sight of the Nueces in three hours’ march, distant about ten miles from the Leona. On the left bank of the river there is an open prairie; but either from fires or previous encampments, furnished a very scanty supply of grass.

Sixth day – The Nueces was forded about 6 o’clock in the morning, after which the column entered upon a desert region, abounding in dwarf specimens of chaparral and mezquite, and a luxurious growth of prickly pear. Between the Nueces and the Mina, an interval of seven or eight miles, the soil is of clay, with the exception of a belt of sand about half a mile in width, nearly midway between the streams. The banks of the Mina required a little labor to render the ford practicable. Traversing a continuation of the same desert waste, we arrived at the channel of the Erquipula about 10 o’clock. This was found perfectly dry, and made is necessary to proceed to the Chaparaoza, distant about ten miles from the Mina, which we reached about noon. The water here was in stagnant pools, separated from the natural bed of the stream.

Seventh day – From the Chaparaoza the road lies through a hog wallow prairie, extending a mile or two, which then becomes sandy, and abounds in the usual amount of thorny vegetation. The Saline, or Salidito, is five or six miles distant from the Chaparaoza; its name indicates that its waters are brackish, and Mexican guides so report them; such however is not the fact; and in purity of flavor it is hardly surpassed by any stream on the route. A temporary bridge of branches required a few repairs before the passage of the artillery and baggage wagons was effected. Passing over a region of the country of the same uninviting aspect as before, we reached the Picoza, about fifteen miles from the Chaparaoza, which, like the latter, consisted only of a detached pools of bad water, and so thickly surrounded with the prickly pear as almost to elude the search. The grazing here was poor, and it was deemed advisable to proceed further. Four miles in advance we came upon a series of pools, the waters of which are somewhat brackish, and to which, doubtless, the name of Salidito, was originally given, now misapplied, as above stated, to a stream of pure fresh water. After halting here a short time, intelligence was received that there was good water ahead; and in about an hour’s march we reached another collection of ponds, which, in high water, are supposed to form a rivulet, whose confluence with the Cuevas, ten or eleven miles farther west, it is conjectured, forms the Norita. The fuel at this place was scarce, and the grazing scanty. – Distance to-day twenty-two miles.

Eighth day – The country traversed to-day is generally flat, an supports but a very scattered growth of vegetation. We encamped on the banks of the supposed Cuevas. Fuel was with difficulty procured here, and even the prickly pear was reduced to a dwarf. The water was in ponds, muddy and unpalatable. This encampment was continued until the 8th; it having been determined to await the arrival of the troops under Colonel Harney, and effect a concentration of both detachments, before proceeding to the Rio Grande, distant about twelve miles. – These troops came up on the 7th, about 10 o’clock, A. M.

Tenth day – The army arrived at the Rio Grande this day at 11 o’clock A. M. The road is very winding, and passes over several narrow and deep ravines, which were crossed, however, without much difficulty. The country is hilly, the vegetation stunted and scattered, and the soil of indifferent quality.

The line of march is known as Wool’s road. It is more circuitous than the old Presidio route; but by crossing the streams nearer their source, it is perhaps practicable for an army during a greater portion of the year. Its general direction is southwesterly; the southing being mostly made west of the Nueces.

It may be added that the march was accomplished under circumstances no less favorable than was the success which attended it remarkable. It had been preceded by a drought of several weeks, which had not only rendered the road hard and in good condition for traveling, but had reduced the streams to a fordable depth. Over many of the latter it would be very difficult to construct bridges during freshets, and to ford them at such times would be impossible. A large portion of the route lies through a country, the soil of which is of such a nature that even light rains would convert the roads into a condition so as to be impassable for loaded wagons, even if the streams offered no obstacles. It is presumed that east of the Nueces, during all seasons, there is an ample supply of water; west of that river, however, the streams are generally shallow, and soon become dry. It cannot be doubted, therefore, that droughts of long duration are favorable to military operations in this country.

The temperature during the march has been very unequal, and its extremes appear somewhat remarkable. On some days the mercury has ranged from 90° to 95° Fahrenheit, and at night it has sunk to 48°. These nights, though cold, have been favorable, as the heavy deposits of dew thereby produced greatly improved the grazing, and might have proved, if necessary, a substitute for water.

Very respectfully, I am, sir,
Your obedient servant,
C. P. KINGSBURY
Lieutenant Ordinance.

Brigadier General J. E. WOOL, Com’dng Centre Division Army of Mexico
AMPUDIA’S PROCLAMATION,

The general commanding the Army of the North to the people of these departments:

Fellow Citizens: Occupied before all things else in providing for the defence of the rights and integrity of the territory of our beloved republic against the enemy that has invaded her soil, the supreme government thought proper to entrust to me the command of the patriotic troops destined on the northern frontier to this holy purpose. I accepted with enthusiasm, the post assigned me – [for the zeal with which I have ever defended the holy cause of the people is notorious to every one] – and in the beginning of the month assumed the direction of such means as were in my power to repel the advance of the enemy, But fearing that the charge would prove too great for my feeble abilities, I solicited the worthy and most excellent Senor Gen. Don Juan Neponuceno Almonte to come and relieve me from the command of the army, presuming that the illustrious conqueror of Panuco would on his return to Mexico resume the reins of our national government.

On the 19th instant the enemy having appeared in the vicinity of Monterey and encamped in the San Comingo woods – their camp being one league in length and three leagues in circumference, I ordered their movements to be carefully observed, and hostilities to be commenced forthwith; the generals and other officers, who were under my command, of every branch of the service, being all decided to risk combat rather than retreat.

The redoubts of the Citadel and of the new Cathedral opened their fires the same day upon the enemy, who were occupied during that and he succeeding day in reconnoitering and preparing for the attack.

On the 21st, the assault was made by a formidable body of their troops, chiefly of the regular army upon the bridge of the Purisima and our redoubts of the Teneria and Rincon del Diablo, but they were gloriously driven back by our valiant veterans, with a positive loss to our adversaries of fifteen hundred men.

On the morning of the 22d, Gen. Taylor directed his column of attack against the Bishop's hill, an elevation commanding the city, and although in their first advance they were repulsed in a skirmish, a full brigade of regular troops returned to the charge. – Unfortunately two pieces of cannon and a mortar, which defended the position, go out of order and became useless, and, although as soon as advised of it, I sent a reinforcement of infantry, with two pieces of light artillery, to their aid, it reached the hill too late – the enemy had already succeeded in obtaining possession of the castle.

This accident compelled me to concentrate my force in the Plaza, in order to present to the foe a more vigorous defence, and to repel on the 23d as was done, the assaults made by them through the streets and houses of the city. But, as under these circumstances, I suffered great scarcity of ammunition and provisions, and in spite of the ardor with which the entire army, both regulars and auxiliaries, were animated, I proposed to the American general a parley, which resulted in an understanding by which the honor of the nation and the army, the personnel of the division under my command, its arms and equipments were preserved.

This is a true statement of the operations of the campaign up to the 24th inst., and if an inadequate supply of means and other circumstances have led to this result, we have yet no cause for a moment's dismay, for the republic will now put forward all her elements of greatness: and with one single victory, which we may, shaft, and must obtain, will solve the problem definitely in favor of our arms.

People of the East: The event which occurred at Monterey is of little moment. The favorite general of the Mexicans, and worthy and most excellent Senor Don Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna, will promptly take charge, in person, of the direction of the campaign. Let the sacred fire of patriotism continue to burn in our bosoms, and without fiel we will triumph over our enemies.

PEDRO DE AMPUDIA

Com. Matthew Calbraith Perry's official account of affair at Tabasco

A detailed account of the proceedings of the expedition under my command along the eastern coast of Mexico.

I left the anchorage at St. John Lizardo on the evening of the 16th of October, with the steamer "Mississippi," having on The next daylight I captured, off the bar of Alvarado, the American barque "Coosa," found in treasonable communication with the enemy: and the same day the "Vixen" chased and boarded the American schooner "Portia." The "Coosa" was dispatched to this place as a price, and the "Portia" was permitted to proceed, her papers having been endorsed. From the day of our leaving "Alvarado" (the 17th) up to the 22d, we had a succession of very bad weather, which gave me much trouble in keeping my little command together. During the interval however, we captured and sent in the Mexican schooner "Telegraph." On the 23d, all the vessels, with the exception of the "Reefer," (previously separated in a gale) reached the bar of the river Tabasco; and having determined on attacking the commercial town of Frontera, at the mouth of the river, and the city of Tabasco, situated 74 miles higher up, I placed myself on board of the "Vixen," leaving the "Mississippi" in command of Commander Adams, at anchor outside, and taking in tow the "Bonita" and "Forward," with the barges containing the detachment under command of Captain Forrest, I crossed the bar, the "Nonata" following under sail.

The "Vixen" with this heavy drag steadily ascended the stream against a four-knot current and arriving near to Frontera, I discovered two steamers (of which I had received previous information) firing up, doubtless in the hope of escape, but the "Vixen" proceeded ahead; followed by the other vessels and all the vessels in port were in our possession, excepting only the schooner "Amado," which vessel, attempting to escape up the river, was pursued by Lieut. Commandant Benham in the "Bonita," and captured.

Desirous of reaching Tabasco before they would have time for increasing their defences, the detachment under Captain Forrest was placed on board the largest of the captured steamers, the "Petrita," and barges in tow, and the "Vixen," with the "Bonita," left Frontera at half past 9 the next morning. Lieut. Walsh being left in command of the place.

After steaming all night, and encountering various incidents arising from the rapidity of the current and the circuitous course of the stream, we arrived at 9 the next morning in sight of Fort Aceachappa, intended to command a most difficult pass of the river.

On our approach, the men employed in preparing the guns for service fled, and we passed it unmolested, but I was careful to cause the guns to be spiked.

Anticipating serious resistance at this place, arrangement had been made for landing Capt. Forrest with his detachment a mile below the fort, to march up and carry it by storm.

At noon, all the vessels anchored in line of battle in front of the city at half-musket range, when I immediately summoned it to surrender, the boats meanwhile being employed in securing five merchant vessels found at anchor in port.

To my summons sent by a flag with Capt. Forrest, a refusal to capitulate was returned, with an invitation to me to fire as soon as I pleased. Suspecting, as I did, that this answer was given more in bravado than in earnest, and being extremely reluctant to destroy the place, I entertained the hope that a few shots fired over the buildings would have caused a surrender. According I directed the guns of the "Vixen" alone to be fired, and at the flag staff, sending an order to all the vessels to avoid, so far as possible, in case of a general fire, injury to the houses distinguished by consular flags.

At the third discharge from the "Vixen," the flag disappeared from the staff. On seeing it down, I ordered the firing to cease, and sent Captain Forrest again ashore to learn whether it had been cut down by our shot, or purposely struck; the reply was, that it had been shot away, and the city would not be surrendered.

I now directed Capt. Forrest, with the force under his command, to land and take position in the city, commanded by our guns. This movement brought on a scattering fire of musketry from various parts of the city, which was returned by the flotilla.

Perceiving towards evening that the enemy did us but little injury, though openly exposed on the decks of the small vessels, and their balls passing through our slight bulwarks, and apprehending, from the proverbial heedlessness of sailors, that should they and the marines be attacked in the narrow streets after dark, they would be cut off by sharp-shooters from the houses, I ordered the detachment to be re-embarked.

In this position the vessels remained all night, the crews lying at their quarters ready to return the fire of the artillery of the enemy, which I was supposed they would have had the courage to have brought down under the cover of the night to the openings of the streets opposite to our vessels, but they left us undisturbed.

Learning that the merchants, and other citizens of the city, were desirous that a capitulation should be made, but were overruled by the governor, who, regardless of consequences, and secure himself against attack, was content that the city should be destroyed rather than surrender, I determined from motives of humanity not fire gain, but to pass down to Frontera with my prizes.
In the morning, however, the fire was recommenced from the shore, and was necessarily returned, but with renewed orders to regard the consular houses so far as they could be distinguished. In the midst of the fire, a flag of truce was displayed on shore, on perceiving which, I caused the firing again to cease, and Captain Forrest was sent to meet its bearer, who submitted a written communication addressed to me, a copy of which with a copy of my replay, marked B and C will be found enclosed.

As an assurance of my sincerity, I now hoisted a white flag, and directed the prizes to drop down the stream, intending to follow with the flotilla; but, in violation of the understanding implied in the beforementioned correspondence, the enemy, in discovering that one of the prizes had drifted ashore in front of the city, collected a large force within and behind the houses in the vicinity, an commenced a furious fire upon her. Lieut. Parker, of this ship, in command of the prize, defended her in the most gallant manner, and ultimately succeeded in getting her again afloat, having one of her men killed and two wounded.

It was in carrying an order to Lieutenant Parker that Lieutenant Morris was wounded. He had been of infinite service to me from the time we left Lizardo, and conducting himself during the bombardment with remarkable deliberation and coolness, he approached the prize in a line to cover his boat, and though apparently regardful of the safety of the officers and men of the boat, who were seated, he stood erect himself, and the ball struck him in the throat. No one can deplore the fate of this very valuable young officer more than myself. – His loss is irreparable to the service and to his family.

It may well be supposed that on perceiving the attack upon the prize, I reopened upon the city, which again silenced their fire. I now proceeded with the flotilla and prizes down the river. One of the prizes, a small schooner of the little value, having grounded in a dangerous pass, and knowing that it would be difficult to extricate her without causing inconvenient delay, I ordered her to be burned.

We arrived safely at Frontera on the evening of the 26th, the "Vixen" having towed down the river five vessels and several barges.

From Frontera I dispatched my prizes to this place; an after destroying all the vessels and craft found in the river of too little value to be manned, I proceeded on the 31st to rejoin you, leaving the "McLane" and "Forward" at anchor opposite Frontera to continue the blockade of the river and to afford protection and shelter to the neutral merchants, residents of the place, who professed themselves in apprehension of violence from the Mexican soldiery should they be left unprotected.

Our our way to this place the prize steamer Petrita, in company and in sight of this vessel, captured the American brig "Plymouth," found engaged in landing a cargo upon the enemy's coast.

M. C. PERRY

In regard to the "McLane" I propose to make a special communication.

P. S. – I omitted to mention, that while lying off the bar of Tabasco, this ship boarded the Campeachy schooner "Fortuna" and the French brig "Jenne Amadee," on the papers of both of which a notification of blockade was endorsed. [KMK]

NRR 71.218 December 5, 1846  addition to the official report of the affair at Tabasco

U. S. STEAMER MISSISSIPPI St. John Lizardo, near Vera Cruz, Nov 3d, 1846.

SIRS: It seems to be just and proper, and it is certainly gratifying task, to make known to you for the information of the department, the excellent conduct of the officers and men who served under my command in the late expedition to Tabasco. The enterprise and spirit displayed by them, on every occasion, gave sufficient evidence that in scenes more sanguinary they would do full honor to the corps.

I was particularly indebted to Capt. Forrest for his promptitude; cheerfulness, and judgment in carrying out my instructions.

To commander sands, and officers and men of the "Vixen," to Commander Adams; to Lieuts. Commanding Benham, Sterrett, and Hazard, and their respective officers and men; to Capt. Edson, and Lieuts. Gist, Winslow, Walsh, Hunt, and Parker, and their detachments – in a word, to all and every one – I am under lasting obligations for the zeal and energy with which they seconded my plans.

I am, sir, respectfully, Your obedient servant,

Commodore David Conner, commander-in-chief U. S. naval forces, Gulf of Mexico

[KMK]
SIR – Pursuant to the instructions of the Major General commanding, on the 21st instant, at about 8 o’clock A. M. I marched my division, (with the exception of one company from each infantry regiment, left to guard the camp), and placed it in order of battle, under cover, immediately in rear of the mortar and howitzer battery, my left resting on the main road to Monterey. I had been in position but a short time when I received the General’s further orders to move as speedily as practicable, with three regiments, to the support of General Twiggs’s division, then engaged in an attempt to carry the enemy’s first battery on our left. To expedite this movement, I marched the three nearest regiments, commanded respectively by Col. s Davis, Campbell, and Mitchell, by the left flank, leaving Col. Ormsby to sustain the batteries. Finding the rifle regiment in front, that of Col. Campbell was ordered to take its place. The two last mentioned regiments constituting General Quitman’s field brigade, he took the immediate command of them, and moved off with spirit and promptness in the direction indicated by the enemy’s line of fire. Having seen General Quitman’s brigade fairly in motion, I turned my attention to that of General Hamer, now consisting of the Ohio regiment only. Pursuing the instructions of the Major General, I felt my way gradually, without any knowledge of the localities, into that part of the city bordering on the enemy’s continuous line of batteries, assailed at every step by heavy fines in front and flank. After having traversed several squares, I met Major Mansfield, the engineer who had conducted the movement of General Twiggs’ division on the first battery. He informed me of the failure of that attack, and advised the withdrawal of my command, as there could no longer be any object in advancing further, warning me at the same that if I advanced I must meet a fire that would sweep all before it. Knowing the Major General commanding to be but a short distance in the rear, I galloped back and communicated this information, in consequence of which he gave the order to retrograde, and the movement was commenced accordingly. In a short time, however, it was known that General Quitman’s brigade had not only stormed the battery in question, but had also carried a stone house of considerable strength connected with the first, and occupied by the enemy’s infantry. The direction of Gen. Hamer’s brigade was at once hanged, and the city re-entered by another route, which, after about a half hour’s march under a destructive fire, brought it within, say one hundred yards of the enemy’s second fort, called El Diablo. A very slight reconnaissance sufficed to convince me that this was a position of no ordinary strength. – Still feeling its importance, after consulting with a part of my staff as to its practicability, I had resolved to attempt carrying it by storm, and was in the act of directing the advance, when I received a wound which compelled me to halt. Col. Mitchell was at the same time wounded at the head of his regiment, as was his adjutant. The men were falling fast under the converging fire of at least three distinct batteries, that continually swept the intervening space through which it was necessary to pass. – The loss of blood, too, from my wound rendered it necessary that I should quit the field; and I had discovered at a second glance that the position was covered by a heavy fire of musketry from other works directly in its rear, that I had not seen in the first hasty examination. Under all these discouragements, I was most reluctant compelled, on surrendering the command, to advise the withdrawal of the troops to a less exposed position. There is a possibility that the work might have been carried, but not without excessive loss, and if carried, I feel assured it would have been untenable.

Accordingly, the division under Gen. Hamer, on whom devolved the command, moved to a new position near the captured fort and within sustaining distance of our field batteries on the left. The troops remained in and near this position, and under fire of the enemy’s batteries until late in the day. For the details of the after proceedings of the day, I refer to Gen. Hamer’s report.

It is with no . . . . pride and gratification that I bear testimony of the gallantry and good conduct of my command. Were proof . . . . one is . . . . casualties of the day. That part of my division properly in the field did not exceed eleven hundred of which number full one fifth were either killed or wounded. The fact that troops for the first time under fire should have suffered such loss without shrinking, in a continuous struggle for more than two hours, and mainly against a sheltered and inaccessible foe, finds but few parallels, and is of itself an eulogium to which I need no add. That there were some more prominent for skill and gallantry than others, even in a contest where all were brave, there can be no doubt; and I leave to those better qualified from their situations than myself the pleasing though delicate task of reporting upon their respective merits.

Of my brigadiers, however, it is proper that I should myself speak. Gen. Hamer was placed in a situation where nothing brilliant could be achieved, but which at every moment imperatively demanded prudence, and calm unbending courage. It is but justice to him to say that I found him equal to the emergency.

General Quitman had before him a field in which military genius and skill were called into requisition, and honors could be fairly won, and I but echo the general voice in saying that he nobly availed himself of the occasion.

My special thanks are due to Major L. Thomas, assistant adjutant general; Gen. A. Sidney Johnston, of Texas, acting inspector general, and Lieut. G. W. Lay, aid-de-camp, who not only displayed great gallantry and coolness, but, by their professional skill, activity, and energy, rendered valuable service throughout the action. After my withdrawal they remained with the troops in the field.
Surgeon R. P. Hunt, my volunteer aid-de-camp, also evinced great coolness, and conveyed promptly the orders confided to him.

On my way back to camp, I found the Kentucky regiment, under the command of Col. Ormsby, drawn up in find order to repel a threatened charge from a large body of Mexican cavalry then in view. Though necessarily kept from the held of action proper they occupied a most important position, and had two men wounded in defending it.

I make no mention of the movement of Captain Webster’s howitzer battery, which was withdrawn from division and placed under charge of the chief of artillery.

Enclosed are the reports of Brigadiers General Hamer and Quitman of the operations of their respective brigades; also, a statement in detail of the loss sustained by the division.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant.

W. O. BUTLER,
Maj. Gen. Com’dg. Field Division Volunteers

NRR 71.220 December 5, 1846 Gen. Thomas Lyon Hamer's report on the Battle of Monterey

Headquarters First Division of Volunteers,

Camp near Monterey, September 28, 1846

SIR – I have transmitted to Major General Butler a report of the operations of this first brigade of this division on the 21st instant; but it becomes my duty as a commandant of the division, to send you an account of the movements of both brigades during the remaining days of our attack upon Monterey.

For a full statement of the points occupied and the services rendered by the second brigade, I respectfully refer you to the report of Brigadier General Quitman, who accompanied the brigade, and whose communication to me is herewith sent. I was not with them to witness their gallantry; but from the General’s report, they are all entitled to great credit for the courage, energy, and zeal displayed on the 23d, in pushing their attack so far into the city, and sustaining themselves under the galling fires of the enemy, who had such decided advantages over them in their barricades and other defences.

On the mornings of the 23d, the first brigade was ordered out in front of the city, and took a position near the infantry of Gen. Twiggs’ command, where we remained until the afternoon. Whilst on the plain we could distinctly hear the discharges of small arms, occasionally between Gen. Quitman’s and Gen. Henderson’s command and the forces of the enemy in the city. When they were ordered to retire from the city and return to camp, the first brigade was directed to march to the town and occupy the fort taken on the 21st; the one above it, “El Diablo,” which had been abandoned by the enemy the previous evening, and tannery between them. – We obeyed the order, approaching them under a regular fire of balls and shells, which fortunately did us no injury.

Capt. Webster’s battery formed part of my command and, after stationing the brigade, I directed them to throw a couple of shells from his 24 pound howitzers into the plaza, where it was understood the principal force of the enemy was collected. He did so; and, as far as we could discover, with a great precision and considerable effect. Subsequently information confirmed our opinions in regard to the injury and alarm produced by these shells. During the night, General Worth threw several in the same direction from the batteries on the western side of the city, proving to the Mexicans that they were assailable in this form from both flanks.

Through the whole night the enemy threw up rockets from the plaza and from the citadel; no doubt expecting a night attack, and adopted this method to discover the approach of our troops.

Early on the morning of the 24th, we had made every preparation for renewing the attack upon the city, when we were suddenly arrested by a bugle with a flag of truce approaching the fort. It was accompanied by Col. Moreno, one of Gen. Ampudia’s aids, bearing a letter to the General-in-Chief. He was conducted to me by Lieut. Col. Rogers, from the upper fort, and I furnished him a horse and escort to Major General Taylor’s quarters in camp. – The firing on both sides was suspended until a conference could be held. This led to the capitulation by which the city was surrendered.

I have in my former report expressed my opinion in regard to the coolness and gallantry displayed by the officers and men under my command; and have only to add that their conduct, from the firing of the first to the last gun, was of the most meritorious character, richly deserving the approbation of their superior officers, and the gratitude of their countrymen.
Being ordered on the morning of the 22d to relieve Dol. Garland’s command, which had during the preceding night occupied the redoubt and fortifications taken on the 21st, my command marched from their encampment about 9 o’clock in the morning. Col Campbell, of the Tennessee regiment, being indisposed from the fatigue and exposure of the preceding day, the command of his regiment devolved on Lieut. Colonel Anderson. Both regiments were much reduced by the casualties of the preceding day, and the necessary details for the care of the wounded. – The much necessarily exposed the brigade for a short distance to a severe fire of artillery from the works still in possession of the enemy on this side of the city, and from the cross fire of the citadel. We were not allowed to reach our post without some loss. Private Dubois, of Captain Crump’s company of the Mississippi riflemen, was killed, and two men of the same company wounded before entering the work. The redoubt and adjacent works being occupied by my brigade and Lieut. Ridgely’s battery, a portion of the troops were engaged under the direction of Lieutenant J. Scarrett, of engineers, to strengthening our position on the side next to town.

At intervals during the whole day until 9 o’clock at night, the enemy kept up from their fortifications and from the citadel discharges of shell, round shot, and grape. It was in the forenoon of this day that, by the aid of our glasses, we were presented with a full view of the storming of the Bishop’s Palace by troops under Gen. Worth on the heights beyond the city. The shout by which our brave volunteers greeted the display of the American flag on the palace was returned by the enemy from their works near us by a tremendous fire of round shot and grape upon us without effect. During the day plans of assault on the adjacent Mexican works were considered of, but in the evening my attention was drawn to a line of about 1,500 Mexican infantry at some distance in the rear of their works. The presence of this force, amounting to nearly three times our effective number, which appeared to be posted for the protection of the works, induced me to give up all idea of forcing the works without reinforcements. During the night several reconnaissances were made with details of Captain Whitfield’s company in the direction of the redoubt “El Diablo.” Frequent signals between the different posts of the enemy during the night kept us on the alert; and at first dawn on the day on the 23d, it was discovered that had abandoned, or were abandoning, the strong works nearest to us. Colonel Davis, with a portion of his command, supported by Lieut. Colonel Anderson, with two companies of the Tennessee regiment, was ordered to take possession of the works. This was promptly done. The enemy had withdrawn their artillery during the night, and nothing of value fell into our hands but some prisoners and ammunition. From this work, which commanded a view of the cathedral and a portion of the great plaza of the city, we perceived another half moon or triangular redoubt in advance of us, and on our right, which appeared to be connected with heavy stone buildings and walls adjoining the block of the city. Having reported my observations to the Commanding General, who had approached the field of our operations, I received permission to advance upon the defences of the city in this direction, and, if deemed practicable, to occupy them. It was sufficiently apparent that all the approaches to the city on this side were strongly fortified. Wishing to proceed with caution, under the qualified permission of the Commanding General, I sent out a party of riflemen, under Lieut. Graves, to reconnoiter, supporting them at some distance by a company of Tennessee infantry, under Captain McMurry. Some active movements of the enemy in the vicinity induced me to halt this party, and to order out Colonel Davis, with two companies of his command and two companies of Tennessee troops, to advance on these works. As the troops advanced, armed men were seen flying at their approach. Upon reaching the redoubt which had attracted our attention, we perceived that it was open, and exposed to the fire of the enemy from the stone buildings and walls in the rear. It was therefore necessary to select a another position less exposed. Posting the two companies of infantry in a position to defend the lodgment we had effected, I directed Colonel Davis to post his command as he might deem most advantageous for defence or active operations, intending here to await further orders or reinforcements. In reconnoitering the place several shots were fired at Colonel Davis by the enemy and several files of the riflemen who had advanced to the slope of the breastworks, (No. 1), which had been thrown across the street for the defence of the city, returned the fire. A volley from the enemy succeeded. Our party having been reinforced by additions from the riflemen and infantry, a brisk firing was soon opened on both sides, the enemy from the house tops and parapets attempting to drive us from the lodgment we had effected. A considerable body of the enemy, securely posted on the top of a large building on our left, which partially overlooked the breastwork No. 1, continued to pour in their fire, and killed private Pryce, of company K, whose gallant conduct at the breastwork had attracted the attention of both his Colonel and myself. From this commencement, in a short time the action became general. The enemy appearing to be in great force and firing upon our troops from every position of apparent security, I dispatched my aid, Lieutenant Nichols, with orders to advance the whole of my brigade which could be spared from the redoubts occupied by us. A portion of the Mississippi regiment, under Major Bradford, advanced to the support of the troops engaged, but Lieut. Col. Anderson, with a part of the Tennessee regiment, was required to remain for the protection of the redoubts in our possession. With this additional force more active operations upon the city were begun. Detachments of our troops advanced, penetrating into buildings and occupying the flat roofs of houses, and, by gradual approaches, driving the enemy back. They had been engaged more than an hour, when they were reinforced by a detachment of dismounted Texan rangers, commanded by General Henderson, with whose active and effectual cooperations the attack upon the city was gradually, but successfully prosecuted. Buildings, streets, and courts were occupied by our troops without much loss, until, after being engaged for about five hours, having advanced within less than two squares of the great plaza, apprehensive that we might fall within the range of our own artillery, which had been brought up to our support and our ammunition being nearly exhausted; active operations were ordered to cease until the effect of the batteries, which had been brought forward in one of the principal streets, could be seen. It being found that the barricades in the neighborhood of the plaza were too strong to be battered down by our own light artillery, the Commanding general, who had taken position in the city, ordered the troops gradually and slowly to retire to defences taken in the morning. This was done in good order, and the enemy occasionally firing upon us, but not venturing to take possession of the part of the town we had occupied. Our forces had scarce retired from their advanced position in the city when we heard the commencement of the attack of the division under General Worth on the opposite side of town. The force under my command had been engaged from eight o'clock in the morning to three P. M. It should be recorded, to the credit of the volunteer troops, that the greater portion of them had been without sustenance since the morning of the 22d, and exposed throughout the very inclement and rainy night of the 23d, to sever duty without blankets or overcoats, and yet not a murmur was heard among them – their alacrity remained unabated to the last moment. The character of this affair, the troops being necessarily separated into small parties, gave frequent occasion to the exhibition of individual courage and daring. The instances occurred so frequently in which both officers and men distinguished themselves, that to recount those which feel under my own observation, or which were brought to my notice by officers, would extend this report to an improper length. It is my duty and pleasure to mention the fact that veteran Gen. Lamar, of Texas, joined my command as a volunteer in the commencement of the attack on the city, and by his counsel and example aided and encouraged the troops. Major E. R. Price, of Natchez, and Capt. J. R. Smith, of Louisiana, both from the recently disbanded Louisiana volunteer in the commencement of the attack on the city, and by his counsel and example aided and encouraged the troops. Major E. R. Price, of Natchez, and Capt. J. R. Smith, of Louisiana, both from the recently disbanded Louisiana

NRR 71.221 December 5, 1846 Gen. David Emanuel Twiggs' report on the Battle of Monterey

Headquarters 1st division Army of Occupation,

Camp near Monterey, Sept. 29, 1846

SIR – For the information of the major general commanding the army of occupation I have the honor to make the following report of the operations of the divisions of the army under my command against the enemy in position at Monterey. On the morning of the 21st instant my division advanced towards the city. Lieut. Col. J. Garland’s brigade, composed of the 3d and 4th regiments of regular infantry and Capt. B Bragg’s horse artillery, Lieut. Col. H. Wilson’s brigade, composed of the 1st regiment of regular infantry and the Washington and Baltimore battalion of volunteers, were ordered to the east and lower end of the city, to make a diversion in favor of Brevet Big. Gen. W. J. Worth’s division, which as operation against the west and upper part of the city. It being deemed practicable, an assault was ordered against two of the enemy’s advanced works. The regular force of my division was thrown to the right of the two works, with orders to take possession of some houses in the city on the right and rear of the enemy’s advanced position, with a view of annoying them in flank and rear. The “Washington and Baltimore battalion” was ordered on the road leading directly to the works. Under a most galling and destructive fire from three batteries of small arms from all the adjacent houses and some walls, my divisions advanced as rapidly as the ground and the stern opposition of the enemy would admit of. The 1st, 3d, and 4th regiments of infantry gained the position to which they were ordered, and annoyed the enemy in flank and rear, until he was obliged to evacuate his two advanced works, which were hotly pressed by Gen. Butler’s division of volunteers, and the Washington and Baltimore battalion, under command of Lieut. Col. Watson.

The 3d and 4th advanced still further into the city, but finding the streets strongly barricaded by heavy masses of masonry, behind which batteries were placed, and the houses filled with tight troops, were obliged to retire to the works first taken by the volunteers. The position of the enemy’s batteries, and the arrangement of his defences, in every street and corner, rendered it necessary for the regular troops who advanced into the city to be separated, each company being led by its captain or immediate commander, and for the time acting independently. After a most manly struggle of some six hours, my men succeeded, after various repulses, in driving the enemy from each and every of his positions in the suburbs. The 3d infantry, commanded by Major W. W. Lear, and part of the 4th, all under the command of Lieutenant Colonel J. Garland, led off towards the right, and in the direction of one of the enemy’s strongest works in front of a bridge in the city. – Captain B. Bragg’s battery accompanied the command, under a destructive fire, which killed and disabled several of his men and horses, until directed to retire beyond the range of small arms. In this desperate struggle the 3d infantry and Captain L. N. Morris and G. P. Field, Brevet Major P. N. Barbour, First Lieutenant and Adjutant D. S. Irvin, and Second Lieutenant R. Hazlitt, killed, together with several non-commissioned officers and men, and its commanding officers, Major W. W. Lear, and Capt. H. Bainbridge, wounded, the former dangerously and the
A cessation of hostilities on the morning of the 24th stopped our further progress, and gave us time to collect the of the city. When night closed our operations on the 23d, our men had advanced to within two squares of the center working their way from house to house, supported by Captains R. Ridgely's and B. Bragg's batteries, driving the enemy collecting and conveying the wounded to our camp. On the 23d the advance into the city was resumed, the infantry, commanded by Lieut. Col. A. May, were not brought into action. They were, however, actively and usefully employed in Owing to the position of the enemy and the nature of the ground, the two squadrons, of the 2d dragoons, occupied this position until the morning of the 22d. Very materially in driving the enemy from them. Captain J. H. Lamotte, of the 1st, with his company, was mortally wounded by a twelve pounder before entering the town. The remainder of Capt. J. H. Lamotte's company being now without an officers, was incorporated with the others of the regiment. Capt. A. S. Miller's company 1st infantry was actively employed in driving the enemy from his hedges and stone fences near the advanced work, and having succeeded, with considerable less, took command of what remained of companies C, E, G, and K, 1st infantry, accompanied by Lieut. S. Hambleton, acting adjutant, Brevet Major J. J. Abercrombie, commanding the regiment, having been wounded, and Lieut. J. C. Terrett, his adjutant, and moved to repel a threatened attack on Capt. B. Bragg's battery by a body of lancers; after which his command joined Gen. Hamer's brigade, operating in the suburbs, and there remained 'till close of the day. The Baltimore and Washington battalion, commanded by the gallant Lieut. Col. Wm. H. Watson, who was killed whilst advancing under a heavy fire into the city, served in co-operation with the regular infantry. After their commander fell the companies were detached and did good service till the close of the day.

The number of killed and wounded in that assault shows with what obstinacy each position was defended by the enemy, as well as the gallantry and good conduct displayed by our officers and men.

Capt. B. Bragg's company, having suffered severely, after advancing some distance into the city, was obliged to withdraw to a point out of range of the enemy's small arms. Capt. R. Ridgely, with one section of his battery, annoyed the enemy's advanced works for some time in the commencement of the assault, but was obliged to retire out of the range of their batteries that were playing on him. Having used a twelve pounder taken from the first work against the enemy till the ammunition gave out, he was sent with one section of his own battery still further in advance; out, being unable to accomplish much against the enemy's heavy breastworks, returned to and occupied with it battery the first work taken from the enemy. Captains R. Ridgely and B. Bragg, and their subalterns, W. H. Shover, G. H. Thomas, J. F. Reynolds, C. S. Kilburn, and S. G. French, deserve the highest praise for their skill and good conduct under the heaviest fire of the enemy, which, when an opportunity offered, was concentrated on them. In the advanced works referred to were taken four officers and sixteen men, prisoners of war, together with five pieces of ordinance, some ammunition, and small arms. Having thrown up some slight breastworks, the 1st, 3d, and 4th infantry, and Capt. R. Ridgely's battery, occupied this position until the morning of the 22d.

Owing to the position of the enemy and the nature of the ground, the two squadrons, of the 2d dragoons, commanded by Lieut. Col. A. May, were not brought into action. They were, however, actively and usefully employed in collecting and conveying the wounded to our camp. On the 23d the advance into the city was resumed, the infantry, working their way from house to house, supported by Captains R. Ridgely's and B. Bragg's batteries, driving the enemy before them. When night closed our operations on the 23d, our men had advanced to within two squares of the center of the city.

A cessation of hostilities on the morning of the 24th stopped our further progress, and gave us time to collect the wounded and bury the dead. The operating strength of my command on the morning of the 21st was sixty three officers and ten hundred and twenty-two men, and out of that number were killed and wounded fifteen officers and one hundred and sixty-four men. I enclose herewith a tabular statement of the killed, wounded, and missing. Of the field officers, I take pleasure in noticing the conduct of the late and lamented Col. W. H. Watson, of the Washington and Baltimore battalion of volunteers, who fell at the head of his command, whilst gallantly leading it against the enemy's works, as also that of Major W. W. Lear, commanding the 3d infantry, who was dangerously wounded in the same assault, for which good service I present his name for praise and promotion. Lieutenants G. W. F. Wood, 1st infantry, and W. T. H. Brooks, 3d infantry, were actively and usefully employed as acting assistant and adjutant generals, the former to Lieut. Col. H. Wilson, 4th infantry, and the latter to Lieut. Col. J. Garland, of the 3d brigade. They were both dismounted by the enemy's artillery.

My staff officers, Lieut. D. C. Buell, 3d infantry, acting Assistant Adjutant General, and Lieut. P. W. McDonald, 2d dragoons, Aid-de-Camp, rendered me valuable and meritorious services, in exposed positions, during the time my division was engaged with the enemy.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. E. TWIGGS,

Major W. W. S. BLISS
Asst. Adj’t. Gen. Army of Occupation NOTE – After Major W. W. Lear and Capt. H. Bainbridge left the 3d infantry wounded, that regiment was led and commanded by Captain W. S. Henry, 3d infantry, until the close of the day. [KMK]
SIR: I have the honor to report that, in obedience to the verbal orders of the General-in-Chief, the division under my command, composed of Lieutenant Colonel Duncan’s battery of horse artillery, artillery battalion, (Lieutenant Colonel Childs,) and eighth regiment (Captain Scriven,) constituting the first brigade, under lieutenant Colonel Stanford, Lieutenant Mackall’s battery horse artillery, fifth infantry, (Major Scott,) seventh, (Captain Miles,) and one company Louisiana volunteers, (Captain Blanchard,) second brigade, under Brigadier General Persifer F. S., . . . (colonel of rifles,) and Colonel Hays’ regiment of Texan mounted riflemen, moved from the main camp at El Bosque de St. Comingo at 2 P. M. on the 20th.

My instructions were by a detour to . . . endeavor to find and reach the Saltillo road, through thorough reconnaissance of the approaches to the route from that direction, to enroll supplies and reinforcements, and if practicable, carry the heights.

Owing to the difficulties of the ground after leaving the Marin, and before striking the Presquina Grande road, the division had reached only six miles – in consequence of the delay in making the route practicable for artillery, which service was executed by Captain Sanders – at 6 P. M., and was halted just without the range of a gun battery upon the summit of an isolated hill, called Lomadne Independencia, and way on the ascent of which was the Bishop’s Palace. Thence a reconnaissance was made, under cover of detachments of Hay’s Texans, to the intersection of the Presquina Grande route, then in our possession with the Saltillo road. This examination resulted in the conviction that the grounds in our front and on our left, in advance, constituted at the same time the weak and the strong points of the enemy’s position, and entered mainly into the defences of the city – the weak point because commanding the only lines of retreat and of supply in the direction of Saltillo, and controlling that in direction of Presquina Grande, the strong point, because of the peculiarly defensive character of the hills and gorges, and of the very careful and skilful manner with which they had been fortified and guarded. It was clearly indicated that our further advance would be strenuously resisted.

On the morning of the 21st, the division was put in motion, and with such formation as to present the readiest order of battle on any point of assault. At ... o’clock the advance, consisting of Hays’ Texans supported by the light companies 1st brigade, under Capt. C. F. Smith, (both extended, as the valley widened or contracted,) closely followed by Duncan’s light artillery, and battalion, heads of columns, on turning an angle of the mountain, at a hacienda called San Jeronimo, came upon a strong force of cavalry and infantry, mostly the former. A conflict immediately ensued. The Texans received the heavy charge of cavalry with their unerring rifles and usual gallantry; the light companies opened a rapid and well-directed fire; Duncan’s battery was in action in one minute, (promptly supported by a section of Mackall’s,) delivering its fire over the heads of our men. Ere the close of the combat, which lasted but fifteen minutes, the first brigade had formed to the front, on the right and left, and delivered its fire, – The second brigade was held in reserve, the ground not admitting of its deployment. The enemy retired in disorder, (leaving on the ground one hundred killed and wounded; among the former Don Juan N. Najira, colonel of the permanent regiment of laneers,) upon the Saltillo road and was closely pursued until we got possession of the gorge, where all the debouches from Monterey unite, whereby the force just defeated, as also reinforcement and supplies from that direction, were excluded from entering the city. At this important point the division was halted, and attention directed toward the mountain forts which envelop the city on its western and south western faces. Soon discovering, however, that our position brought us within effective range of the batteries, the troops were advanced some eight hundred yards further on the Saltillo road.

The examination thus far had manifested, besides the importance of the positions, the impracticability of any effective operations against the city, until possessed of the exterior forts and batteries. Independent, however, of ulterior objects, the occupation of these heights became indispensable to the restoration of our line of communication with headquarters, necessarily abandoned for the moment in order to secure the gorges of the Saltillo road. At 12 M. a force was detached under Captain C. F. Smith, with orders to storm the batteries on the crest of the nearest hill, called Federacion, and after taking that to carry the fort called Soldada, on the ridge of the same height, retired about 600 yards. The two effectually guarded the slopes and roads in either valley, and consequently the approaches to the city. – This command consisted of four companies (K 2d, B 3d, and G and H, 4th infantry) of the artillery battalion, and Green’s McGowans, R. A. Gillespie’s, Chandler’s, Ballowe’s, and McCulloch’s companies of Texan riflemen, under Major Chevalier, acting in co-operation – in all about three hundred effectives. It was impossible to mask the movement of the storm-party. On approaching the base of the mountain the guns of both batteries opened a plunging fire, and numerous light troops were seen descending and arranging themselves at favorable points on the slopes. Perceiving these indications of determined resistance, Capt. Miles was detached with the 7th to support and co-operate with the first party. In a short time the fire became general, the enemy gradually yielding and retiring up the rugged acclivity, and our men as steadily pursuing. The appearance of heavy reinforcements on the summit, and the cardinal importance of the operation demanding further support, the 5th, under Major Scott, and Blanchard’s company of volunteers were immediately detached, accompanied by Brigadier General Smith, who was instructed to take direction in that quarter. On reaching the advance parties, Gen. Smith discovered that, under favor of the ground, he could, by diverting a portion of the force to the right, and moving it obliquely up the hill, carry the Soldada simultaneously with the Federacion. He accordingly very judiciously pointed and accompanied the 5th, 7th, and Blanchard’s company in that direction. Capt. Smith’s command having most gallantly carried the first object of attack, promptly turned the captured gun – a nine-pounder – upon the second, and moved on with his main body to participate in the assault upon Soldada; which was carried in gallant style by the forces under Scott, Miles, Blanchard, and Hays, (who had been detached on special service, but who returned in time to share with fifty of his men in the first assault, and to take a prominent part in the second,) the whole directed by Gen. Smith.
At this point we secured another 9 pounder, and immediately both pieces were brought to bear upon the Bishop’s Palace, situated upon and midway on the southern slope of the hill Independencia, a valley of only six hundred yards intervening. We had no secured an important advantage, and yet but half the work was done. The possession of these heights only made the more apparent the controlling importance of those opposite and the necessity of occupying the palace. A violent storm ensued, and night closing in, operations for the day ceased. The troops had now been thirty-six hours without food, and constantly taxed to the utmost physical exertions. Such as could be permitted slept with arms in hand, subjected to a pelting storm, and without covering, till 3 A.M., when they were aroused to carry the hill Independencia.

Lieut. Col. Childs was assisted to lead this storming party; consisting of three companies, I and G 4th and A 3d (artillery battalion;) three companies 8th infantry, (A, B, and C,) under Captain Scriven, with two hundred Texan riflemen, under Col. Hays and Lieut. Col. Walker, (captain of rifles,) acting in co-operation. The command moved at three, conducted to its point of ascent by Captain Sanders, military, and Lieut. Meade, topographical engineers. Favored by the weather, it reached by dawn of day within about one hundred yards of the crest, in which position, among the clefs of rock, a body of the enemy had been stationed the previous evening in apparent anticipation of attack. The enemy’s retreating fire was ineffectual, and not returned until Colonel Child’s and Hays’ command had reached within a few yards of the summit, when a well directed and destructive fire, followed by the bayonet of the regulars and rush of the Texans placed us in possession of the work. The cannon having been previously withdrawn, no impression could be made upon the massive walls of the palace or its outworks without artillery, except at enormous sacrifice.

Meanwhile, to reinforce the position, the 5th, Major Scott, and Blanchard’s volunteers, had been passed from the first heights, and reached the second in time to participate in the operations against the palace.

After many affairs of light troops and several feints a heavy sortie was made, sustained by a strong corps of cavalry, with desperate resolution, to repossess the heights. Such a move had been anticipated and prepared for. Lieut. Col. Childs had advanced, under cover, two companies of light troops under command of captain Vinton, acting major, and judiciously drawn up the main body of his command, flanked on the right by Hays and left by Walker’s Texans. The enemy advanced boldly, was repulsed by one general discharge from all arms, and fled in confusion, closely pressed by Childs and Hays, preceded by the light troops under Vinton; and, while they fled past our troops, entered the palace and fort. In a few moments the unpretending flag of the Union had replaced the gaudy standard of Mexico. The captured guns – one six inch howitzer, one twelve, and two nine pounder brass guns, together with Duncan’s and Mackall’s field batteries, which came up at a gallop, were in full and effective play upon the retiring and confused masses that filled the street (of which we had the prolongation) leading to the nearest plaza, la capella, also crowded with troops. At this moment the enemy’s loss was heavy. The investment was now complete. Except the force necessary to hold positions on Independencia and serve the guns, (shifted to points whence the shot could be made to reach the great plaza,) the division was now concentrated around the palace, and preparation to assault the city on the following day, or sooner, should the general in chief either so direct, or, before communication be had, renew the assault from the opposite quarter. – In the mean time attention was directed to every provision our circumstances permitted to alleviate the condition of our wounded soldiers and officers, to the decent interment of the dead, not omitting in either respect all that was due to those of the enemy.

About 10 A.M. on the 23d a heavy fire was heard in the opposite quarter. Its magnitude and continuance, as well as other circumstances, did not permit a doubt that the general was conducting a main attack, and that his orders for my co-operation (having to travel a circuit of some six miles) had miscarried, or failed to reach me by means of the numerous cavalry of the enemy. Under these convictions the troops were instantly ordered to commence an operation which, if not otherwise directed, I had designed to execute in part, under favor of the night. Two columns of attack were organized, to move along the two principal streets, leading from our position, in direction of the great plaza, composed of light troops slightly extended, with orders to mask the men whenever practicable; avoid those points swept by the enemy’s artillery; to press on the first plaza, Capella; to get hold of the ends of streets beyond, then enter the buildings, and by means of picks and bars break through longitudinal section of the walls; work from house to house, and, ascending to the roofs, to place themselves upon the breast height with the enemy. Light artillery by sections and pieces, under Duncan, Roland, Mackall, Martin, Hays, Irons, Clarke, and Curd, followed at suitable intervals, covered by reserves to guard the pieces and the whole operations against the probably enterprises of cavalry upon our left. – This was effectually done by seizing and commanding the head of every cross street. The streets, were, at different and well chosen points, barricaded by heavy masonry walls, with embrasures for one or more guns, and in every instance well supported by cross batteries. These arrangements of defence gave to our operations at this moment a complicated character, demanding much care and precaution; but the work went on steadily, simultaneously, and successfully. About the time our assault commenced, the fire ceased from our force in the opposite quarter. Disengaged on the one side, the enemy way enabled to shift men and guns to our quarters, as was soon manifested by accumulation of fire. At dark we had worked through the walls and squares, and reached to within one block of the great plaza, leaving a covered way in our rear – carried a large building which towered over the principal defences, and during the night and ensuing morning, crowned its roof with two howitzers and a six pounder. – All things were now prepared to renew the assault at dawn of day, when a flag was sent in, asking a momentary suspension of fire, which led to the capitulation upon the terms so honorable to our arms. – As the columns of attack were moving from the Palace hill, Maj. Munroe, chief of artillery, reached me with a ten inch mortar, which was immediately advanced to the plaza, Chapel, put in position masked by the church wall, its bed adjusted as rapidly as possible, and by sunset opened upon the great

Each of the officers named either headed special detachments, columns of attack, storming parties, or detached guns, and all were conspicuous for conduct and courage. My attention has been particularly directed by General Smith to the gallant conduct of Lieutenant Gardner, 7th infantry, during the assault upon the city, on which occasion he threw himself in advance, and on the most exposed points, animating the men by his brave example. Particular attention has also been called to Lieutenants Nicholls, (brothers,) Louisiana volunteers, as having highly distinguished themselves by personal daring and efficient service. The officers of brigade and regimental staff were conspicuous in the field, or in their particular departments. Lieutenants Hanson, (commanding,) Vandorn, aid-de-camp, 7th; Lieutenant Robinson, 5th (quartermaster's department,) on the staff of General Smith, Lieutenant and Adjutant Clarke, 8th infantry, staff, 1st brigade; Lieutenants Benjamin, adjutant artillery battalion; Peck, ordinance officers, artillery battalion; G. Deas, adjutant 5th; and Page, adjutant 7th infantry, are highly commended by their respective chiefs, to the justness of which I have the pleasure to add my personal observation. In common with the entire division, my particular thanks are tendered to assistant surgeons Porter (senior,) Byrne, Conrad, DeLeon, and Roberts, (medical department,) who were ever at hand in the close fight, promptly administering to the wounded and suffering soldier. To the officers of the staff, general and personal, more especially associated with myself – Hon. Col. Balie Peyton, Louisianna troops, who did me the honor to serve as aid-de-camp; Captain Sanders, military engineers; Lieutenant Meade, topographical engineers; Lieutenants E. Deas, Damets, and Ripley, quartermaster's and commissary's staff, and Lieutenants Pembleton; 4th artillery, wood, 8th artillery; my aids-de-camp – I have expressed the greatest obligation. In such diversified operations; during the three days and nights, they were constantly in motion, performing every executive duty with zeal and intelligence only surpassed by daring courage in conflict. I beg to commend each to special consideration.

On the 25th, in conformity with the articles of capitulation, the citadel was taken possession of by a command consisting of two companies of each regiment, and one section of each battery, second division. General Smith was directed to take command of this corps, and conduct the ceremony, which duty he executed with delicacy to the unhappy and humiliated foe.

You will receive lists of captured munitions of war; lists of such as were surrendered have already been handed in. It is a source of high gratification that we have been able to accomplish such fortunate results with so moderate a sacrifice of gallant men. Annexed is a return of killed and wounded, exhibiting dates, actions, and circumstances.

When every officer and every soldier, regular and volunteer, has, through a series of harassing and severe conflicts, in the valley and on the mountain, in the street and on the house top, cheerfully executed every service and complied with every exaction of valor and patriotism, the task is as difficult as delicate to distinguish individuals; and yet it will always happen, as it has always happened in varied scenes of battle and siege, that fortune presents to some those opportunities which all would have seized with gladness and avidity. It is my pleasing and gratefully duty to present to the consideration of the general in chief, and through him to the government, the distinguished conduct of Brigadier Gen. Smith, colonel of rifles, Brevet Lieut. Col. Childs, artillery battalion; Col. Hays, Texan riflemen; Brevet Lieut. Col. Duncan, horse artillery, and Captain C. F. Smith, second artillery, commanding light troops first brigade.

My thanks are also especially due to Lieut. Col. Stamford, 8th, (commanding first brigade;) Major Munroe chief of artillery, (general staff;) Brevet Major Brown, Captain J. R. Vinton, artillery battalion; Captain J. B. Scott, artillery battalion, (light troops;) Major Scott commanding, and Captain Merrill, 5th; Captains Miles, commanding, Holmes, and Ross, 7th infantry; and Captain Scriven, commanding 8th infantry; to Lieut. Col. Walker, (captain of rifles, Major Chevalier, and Captain McCulloch of the Texan, and Captain Blanchard, Louisiana volunteers; to Lieutenants Mackall, (commanding battery,) Roland, Martia, Mays, Irons, Clarke, and Curd, horse artillery; Lieutenant Longstreet, commanding light company, 8th; Lieutenant Ayres artillery battalion, who was among the first in the assault upon the Palace, and who secured the colors. Each of the officers named either headed special detachments, columns of attack, storming parties, or detached guns, and all were conspicuous for conduct and courage. My attention has been particularly directed by General Smith to the gallant conduct of Lieutenant Gardner, 7th infantry, during the assault upon the city, on which occasion he threw himself in advance, and on the most exposed points, animating the men by his brave example. Particular attention has also been called to Lieutenants Nicholls, (brothers,) Louisiana volunteers, as having highly distinguished themselves by personal daring and efficient service. Lieutenants Hanson, (commanding,) Vandorn, aid-de-camp, 7th; Lieutenant Robinson, 5th (quartermaster's department,) on the staff of General Smith, Lieutenant and Adjutant Clarke, 8th infantry, staff, 1st brigade; Lieutenants Benjamin, adjutant artillery battalion; Peck, ordinance officers, artillery battalion; G. Deas, adjutant 5th; and Page, adjutant 7th infantry, are highly commended by their respective chiefs, to the justness of which I have the pleasure to add my personal observation. In common with the entire division, my particular thanks are tendered to assistant surgeons Porter (senior,) Byrne, Conrad, DeLeon, and Roberts, (medical department,) who were ever at hand in the close fight, promptly administering to the wounded and suffering soldier. To the officers of the staff, general and personal, more especially associated with myself – Hon. Col. Deas, Damets, and Ripley, quartermaster's and commissary's staff, and Lieutenants Pembleton; 4th artillery, wood, 8th artillery; my aids-de-camp – I have expressed the greatest obligation. In such diversified operations; during the three days and nights, they were constantly in motion, performing every executive duty with zeal and intelligence only surpassed by daring courage in conflict. I beg to commend each to special consideration.

We have to lament the gallant Captains McKavett, 8th infantry, an officer of high merit, killed on the 21st, and Gillespie, Texas volunteers, on the 22d. The latter eminently distinguished himself while leaving his brave company at the storming of the first heights, and perished in seeking similar distinction on a second occasion. Captain Gatlin and Lieutenant Porter, 7th; Lieutenants Russel, 5th, and Wainright, 8th infantry, and Lieut. Reece, Texas riflemen, received honorable, happily not mortal, wounds.

The following non-commissioned officers are reported as having highly distinguished themselves; Sergeants Hazard, 4th, and Dilworth, 3d artillery; Quartermaster Sergeant Henry, 7th infantry; Cross, company C; Rounds Bradford, (color sergeant,) and Magg, company E; Barley, company I; and Ballard, 7th infantry.

In the several conflicts with the division, the enemy's loss is ascertained to exceed four hundred and fifty men; four 9 pounders, one 12 pounder brass gun, one 24 pound howitzer, and two national (garrison) standards captured.
On the 21st ultimo I was ordered with my second regiment to the support of General Worth; but, on arriving at the spirited officer (General Worth) whose military genius guided their valor and conducted to victory. by the reflection that the merits of that gallant band are fully appreciated by yourself, as well as by the talented and high source of exceeding gratification to me, as a Texans; as well as an American – a gratification which is greatly heightened officer. An official account of his bold and successful attack upon the upper part of the city has, no doubt, been already General Worth; and I am proud that it had the honor in co-operating in all the brilliant operations of that distinguished General Quitman, however, a brave and excellent officer, will do justice to the merits of his own men. Colonel Davis, of me also to a public acknowledgment of the good conduct of the command with which I had been ordered to co-operate. Your order, towards the close of the day. They retired with reluctance, from a perfect confidence in their ability to continue their onward movement, and to hold the city as far as they might extend their capture. Our loss, under the circumstances, was surprisingly small, being only one killed and five wounded. That of the enemy is not known; but we have reason to believe that it was considerable, not only from their own acknowledgments, but also from signs of blood, as well as from the fact that our men seldom fired except with great deliberation, and only where an object was in view.

I have no observations to offer upon the events of the day, further than to express my unbounded admiration of the indomitable courage and perseverance exhibited in the attack; and to reiterate the regret experienced by men at being called upon, in height of success and confidence, to retire from the field of their operations. A sense of duty constrains me also to a public acknowledgment of the good conduct of the command with which I had been ordered to co-operate. General Quitman, however, a brave and excellent officer, will do justice to the merits of his own men. Colonel Davis, of that command, I am told, was the first to receive and return the shot of the enemy, and was among the last to retire from the contest. I had the pleasure of his company during the greater part of the fight, and am proud of the opportunity of bearing testimony to his gallant conduct. I beg leave also, under the authority of General Lamar, to compliment Lieut. Thomas, of the artillery, and his brave men, for the bold advance and efficient management of the gun under his charge. When ordered to retire, he reloaded his piece, fired a farewell shot at the foe, and returned, (we hope without
In the distribution of honors among my own people, I am sensible of the responsibility of the task, and of the great difficulty of executing it to the satisfaction of all. That some should accomplish more than others is a law of nature. It may be the result not so much of superiority in physical strength and other adventitious circumstances. But on occasions like the present, where all did their duty, and did well, it would seem to be proper and just that their fame should be a common one. For this reason, and other considerations, I must avoid the indulgence of individual eulogy altogether, except so far as it may be inseparable from an exposition of the conduct of my staff which I feel bound to make, inasmuch as I am in some degree responsible to the public for their behavior. Major Clarke, my junior aid, who had rendered himself useful to me on many occasions was an active officer, conducted himself in battle with the true spirit of the soldier, and had the honor of being the first in the regiment to enter the city. – He was rapidly followed by Mr. Walter Winn, (a worthy gentleman, and soldier of San Jacinto,) who was connected with my military family as the secretary of Gen. Lamar. During the hottest of the fire, he was frequently by my side, and also acted with Major Clarke in the transmission of my orders, in the face of many perils. General Barleson, my senior aid, had accompanied the command of General Worth, and acquired fresh laurels for himself, and added new luster to the arms of Texas. General Lamar, my division commander, (acting also as adjutant,) was mainly instrumental in causing my troops to be called into requisition. He had accompanied General Quitman in the occupancy of a point in the lower part of the city, where the battle commenced; and it was at his suggestion that a messenger was dispatched for my command. He was found in active co-operation with the Mississippi and Tennessee troops, but rejoined my regiment on its arrival, and acted, during the balance of the fight, with the Texans. Fully satisfied throughout with the conduct of each, I take this method of returning them my sincerest thanks, as well as my best wishes for their welfare; and beg leave also to embrace the opportunity of tendering my gratitude and admiration to the whole force under my command – officers and soldiers – for the important services rendered their country, and the noble manner in which they have sustained the honor and chivalry of their state.

In doing justice to the living, let us not be forgetful of the dead. Among the fallen in my command, we have been called upon to mourn the fate of a young officer who was the brightest ornament of the service, the soul of honor, and the pride of chivalry. He had long been employed by the government of Texas in defence of the western frontier, as the commander of a corps of mounted rangers; and probably no officer ever performed his duty with more activity and efficiency, or with more satisfaction to the country. He possessed nothing of the rough habits, ignorance, and presuming forwardness which is usually supposed to attach to the frontier soldier. He was an educated man, and a gentleman by nature; quiet in his manners; amiable in temper; just in his dealings; and strictly moral in all his habits. During his connexion with the present campaign, his deportment was such – so marked by a happy union of modesty and bravery, and dignity with obedience – as to win the hearts of all and constitute him the chief favorite of the army. He followed the fortunes of General Worth, shared his brilliant career amidst the shouts of victory. Though feeble in frame, the inspiring energies of his mind enabled him to keep in advance of his comrades; so that in the storming of the Bishop’s hill he was the foremost man and the first victim upon the ramparts of the foe. He was buried where he fell – upon the loftiest summit – and the mountain that encloses his remains will stand an eternal monument of his glory – it will be known in history, and long frequented by his grateful countrymen, as the grave of Gillespie.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. PINCKNEY HENDERSON,
Major Gen. Comd’g Texas Volunteers.

Major Gen. Zachary Taylor, Commd’g the Army of Occupation.

NRR 71.224 December 5, 1846 traders to Santa Fe proceeding to Chihuahua

SANTA FE TRADERS.

The St. Louis Republican of the 10th instant says. – Our information from Santa Fe advises us of the departure of the traders from Missouri for Chihuahua, about the 20th September. They expect to find Gen. Wool in possession of Chihuahua by the time of their arrival. But we know, by accounts direct from Gen. Wool’s command, that he did not expect to reach that city before the latter end of December. It is very possible, therefore, that if they persevered in entering Chihuahua, they may have been subjected to much inconvenience, if they were not deprived of their goods, and themselves made prisoners. NRR 71.225 December 12, 1846 report of Mexican privateers fitting at Cuba

ANOTHER WAR BREWING. –

Mexican privateers.
The New Orleans Delta says: "We are informed that about forty commissions have been taken out; that four vessels are already prepared for the service at St. Jago, and others are being prepared as rapidly as is practicable. – That the government is cognizant of these facts, and that is generally believed by those who are presumed to be acquainted with the intentions of the government, that the ports of Cuba will be opened to prizes that may be captured by privateers. We are not prone to yield to authenticated reports of matters of so grave a character, and we should not publish this statement, if we were not satisfied it was founded on the best authority in the city of New Orleans in regard to matters transpiring in Cuba and Mexico." NRR 71.226 December 12, 1846 arrest of Mark H. Parkenson at New Orleans for holding intercourse with the Mexican government

NRR 71.226 December 12, 1846 news of Gen. Stephen Watts Kearny on his way from Santa Fe to California
NNR 71.226 Col. Alexander William Doniphan detained for want of provisions, no money, treasury draughts at heavy discounts, predictions, provisions on the way to Santa Fe NNR 71.226 Col. Philip Saint George Cooke, with the regiment of Mormon infantry, leaves Santa Fe for California

Santa Fe, October 18, 1846. – General Kearney has gone (or rather started) to California. Whether he will be able to reach there by the route he has taken, is a matter of doubt and speculation amongst the knowing ones of the country. He has taken no more men than will serve as an escort – the conquest having already been made by Lieut. Col. Fremont, aided by the Pacific squadron. Conquests in California or New Mexico are a mere matter of parade – resistance being out of the question. The poor devils neither know nor care anything about the government of either the United States or Mexico.

Our men have money – government drafts being uncurrent, and the disbursing officers having nothing else to offer. They have sent to St. Louis to have $100,000 in specie brought out, but it will be towards spring before it arrives, if it arrives at all.

Col. Brenton’s remarks about the issue of this war office currency were perfectly correct; and they are now hawked about Santa Fe at ten per cent. Discount, and no buyers at that. In the mean time, the first of November – the time with the volunteers are to be paid, according to law – is rapidly approaching. – One hundred dollar drafts – which is the lowest denomination – are not a convenient kind of funds for soldiers, even if they were at par. I happened to be at the office of the quartermaster to-day, and found his sergeant trying to buy six mules for the Mormon battalion, for which the Mexican asked $75 each. – He finally (after consulting with a trader) agreed to take $100 each in government checks! Whether or not they were purchased, I am not able to say. I mention these things merely to show the shortsighted policy of this hard-money administration.

We look forward with gloomy anticipation to the future. There are not provisions enough in the country, including all that are now here or expected to last beyond the first of February. The country cannot furnish the deficiently, even were there funds to buy it. Three thousand armed men in a state of starvation is a mass not easily kept in subordination, particularly when a large portion of them came out as armed emigrants to California – a region which none of them (save the Mormons) will see in the service of the United States. If they go in the spring, they will go on their own hook. Mark this prediction.

Not a word has been heard from below, and nothing is known as to the movements or whereabouts of Gen. Wool. We have a thousand and one reports in circulation – none of which are believed – except that Mr. Maguffin, a trader, has been robbed below by the Indians. All the traders are waiting in a state of anxious suspense, fearing to advance, and neither able nor willing to return.

The Mormons under Capt. Cook left this morning for California.

[We are pleased to hear that there was an abundance of provisions for the army at Bent’s Fort, although it was with great difficulty that they could be transported from that point to Santa Fe. The baggage wagons and teams were in a broken down and wretched condition. When one day out from Santa Fe, Lieut. Elliot was met with the advance of a train of provision wagons, and this supply would be amply sufficient until more could be obtained from the depot at Bent’s Fort. NRR 71.240 December 12, 1846 Panuco captured
NNR 71.240 troops arrive at Tampico
NNR 71.240 Saltillo occupied by Gen. William Jenkins Worth
NNR 71.240 Gen. Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna's movements

TAMPICO.

The U. S. brig Porpoise, Capt. Hunt, left the squadron at Tampico, all well, on the 22d November, and arrived at Pensacola on the 1st inst.

PANUCO, was taken possession of by Capt. Tatnall, in the steamer Spitfire, in which he ascended the river. – Not a Mexican in arms to be seen. No opposition was made. The fort was taken possession of. It mounted 16 guns, which, as they could not be transported to Tampico, were spiked, and their carriages broken.

U. S. troops were arriving at Tampico daily. Business was brisk, and the Mexicans appeared pleased with the change of government.

The U. S. sloop of war St. Marys, left Tampico on the 28th November; landed Adju. AUSTIN, 3d artillery at the Rio Grande, on the 30th, and reached the mouth of the Mississippi on the 1st inst.

The steamer Neptune arrived at Tampico on Sunday, 22d November, from Brazos St. Jago, with 450 regular troops, under the command of Col. Gates, and the steamer Sea, with 200 more troops, on the 23d, when the town was formally handed over to the army. Fort Andonega was immediately garrisoned, under the name of FORT CONNER, and armed with two long eight pounders. A battery of two 42-pounder carronades, called Fort Ann, in honor of Mrs. Chase, lady of the late American consul at Tampico, commands the Altamira road. Besides these, some field pieces are mounted on the house tops. The town of Tampico is already in a good state of defence.

Saltillo had been abandoned, and there is no doubt that it is now in the possession of the advance guard of the army under Gen. Worth.
The state of Mexico is represented to be even worse than ever. Santa Anna lately made an address to his troops, apparently to extract from them an invitation to install himself at the head of the government. He was disappointed, however, at finding that his oration was received in profound silence, and immediately afterwards started with all his cavalry on a secret expedition, some think to cut off one of the divisions of our army – which he will not be likely to find. The most probable conjecture is, that he is gone to Mexico to control the action of the new congress.

The two regiments which evacuated Tampico revolted when they got to San Louis Potosi, and were disbanded. They were opposed to Santa Anna. Great dissentions prevailed at San Louis Potosi – army about 16,000, and in a state of starvation; four different factions among them, as follows: Santa Anna, Arista, Herrera, and Paredes. The recent election in Mexico was much in favor of ex. President Herrera, who it was generally believed at Tampico would be the president. [KMK]

MONCLOVA TAKEN. – Gen’l. WOOL, proceeding with about 2600 men, when within 100 miles of Monclova, was met on the 26th October by a formal protest from General Lopez, governor of the department, against his further invasion of the Mexican territory, informing him of the armistice that was entered into between Generals Taylor and Ampudia at Monterey, and alleging that he should consider any further advance of our forces as an infraction of the same.

General Wool sent word to General Lopez, in reply, that he was aware of the existence of the armistice alluded to; that his government, whose orders he was obeying, construed its terms differently from the interpretation which General Lopez had given it; that he was determined to continue his march, and would do so with the least possible delay. He did so, and on the 30th halted four miles north of Monclova. To this place General Lopez came quickly out, attended by an escort. He politely welcomed Gen. Wool to Coahuila, and offered him a peaceable surrender of the city of Monclova, explaining, at the same time, that the protest which he had previously forwarded to him was drawn up and dispatched in the discharge of what he believed to be his duty to his own government; but that, so far as he and the civil authorities of the city were concerned – and there was no military force in the place – they would receive the General and his command as friends, and in return they looked for the treatment of friends from them. General Wool then encamped his men where they were – a most favorable location – and with his staff and a detachment proceeded on, took possession of the city, and raised the American flag over the citadel. Excellent and comfortable quarters were selected for himself and staff.

On the second of November Captain Davis left with dispatches for Washington, taking Monterey in his route, having information to communicate to Gen. Taylor also. The health of Gen. Wool's command he represents as remarkably good, their march a most agreeable one, and through one of the finest grain, corn, cotton, sugar, and pasturage countries that he ever saw, or can well be conceived.

Although reports were rife that the country was infested with Mexican banditti and treacherous Indians, Capt. Davis left the camp with only two Mexican guides, and arrived safely in Monterey on the 8th ultimo. There he found things pretty much in repose, Gen. Taylor awaiting dispatches from Washington. The camp was still sickly, and among those who were not convalescing as fast as desirable is Gen. Butler. His wound is still painful to a degree.

LATER – Mr. A. L. Daunoy, furnished the following – which we find in the Picayune of the 4th inst.

On the 6th November arrived at Monclova, found General Wool and army encamped, his army in fine condition; remained at Monclova until the 14th, then started with an escort with dispatches for Gen. Taylor; found the road for 100 miles a perfect desert; destitute of water and arrived at Monterey on the 19th; ascertained that Gen. Taylor had left for Saltillo, 70 miles. Lieuts. Franklin and Dashields, with the dispatches left for Saltillo with the same escort, on the 19th. The distance from Monclova to Monterey is 180 miles, thence to Saltillo 70 miles, whilst from Monclova to Saltillo it is but 180 miles, water plenty and corn in abundance, and no doubt General Wool will advance direct from Monclova to Saltillo.

Mr. Daunoy thinks that General Wool and Army are now at Saltillo. He (Mr. D.) left Monterey on the 19th ult. Eleven miles from Monterey met a train of sixty wagons. On the 21st, met another train of fifty wagons, escorted by four companies, having two long 18 pounders. Dr. Hawkins along with the train. [KMK] movements of Santa Anna were, for a time, involved in still more profound mystery. Letters published from writers in our squadron, represented that he had left San Luis Potosi at the head of a body of cavalry, whether for the purpose of restoring his own authority at the capital, or with the view of making a dash at some point in the rear of General Taylor, the writers could not agree in opinion. The impression appeared to be cherished by some of our journals, that Santa Anna was playing his cards with a view to a speedy peace, according to a supposed bargain made at Cuba, with U. States agents, conceding the invaded provinces to the U. States, pocketing the two millions of the proposed secret service fund, and depending upon the U. States government to sustain him in the government of Mexico. They predicted these opinions partly upon the suspicious looking facts, that Santa Anna had ordered the evacuation of Monterey, before he heard of the engagement there; that he subsequently ordered the important pass near Saltillo, and that place itself to be abandoned, - still later, he had withdrawn all the troops from Tampico, and left the American squadron to occupy the place without opposition, – and now, that he appears to be about to leave San Luis Potosi to an easy conquest.

The intelligence received by last night's mail must somewhat unsettle these impressions as to Santa Anna’s movements and designs. City of Mexico dates to the 17th November, two weeks later than our previous accounts, furnished a correspondence which took place between General Taylor and Santa Anna, published by the latter in the Mexican papers, which indicates anything rather than concession, and shows that he must have been at San Luis Potosi on the 10th November. The Mexicans were under the impression that General Taylor would advance on San Luis Potosi early in November, and a corresponding activity was evinced to prepare for defence.

Urgent appeals to the approaching congress, are published in the Mexican journals, to make Santa Anna dictator, for the purpose of repelling "the barbarians of the north." [KMK]

Headquarters of the Army of Occupations,
Monterey, Nov. 5, 1846

SIR: In the convention agreed upon on the 24th September it was conceded that the American forces should not pass a stipulated line before the expiration of eight weeks, or until they should receive orders or instructions from their government. In conformity therewith I have the honor of apprising you that my government has directed me to terminate the suspension of hostilities, and accordingly I consider myself at liberty to pass the designated line after the 13th instant, by which date I presume this communication will have reached you.

I have been informed that several Americans, who were taken prisoners at China and other points, are no at San Luis, detained as such. I trust you will deem it an act of justice to release these men and allow them to rejoin the forces under my command.

When the convention was entered into to which I have referred, I entertained the hope that the terms in which it was conceived would open the way for the two republics to agree upon an honorable peace; and, acting upon this conviction, I at once released the prisoners of war who were in my power; among them were three officers.

At that time I did not know that there were any American prisoners who had been sent into the interior. I trust that my conduct will be deemed a sufficient ground to justify you in yielding to this request and to the dictates of humanity towards the American prisoners who I am told are at San Luis.

In case Major Graham, the bearer of this communication, reaches your head quarters, I take the liberty to commend him to your courtesy, and I shall be pleased to receive by him your reply to this communication, whatever it may be. I have the honor to be, with the greatest respect, your obedient servant,

Z. TAYLOR
Major General of the Army of the U. States.

To Gen. D. Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna, Commander in chief Liberating Republican Army
San Luis Potosi, Nov. 10, 1846

Senor General – At 10 this morning, by an official communication of the Governor of Coahuila of the 8th inst., I received your letter of the 5th, apprising me of your intention, by order of your Government, of breaking the convention agreed upon at Monterey, on the 24th of September last, and passing on the 13th of the present month the line therein designated, by which date you supposed I should receive your communication.

Believing that the terms stipulated in said convention should be religiously observed by both parties, I had taken no step which should tend to vacate it; but in view of the obligation you deem imposed upon you by the orders of your government, I confine myself by replying that you can, when it pleases you, commence hostilities, to which I shall correspond accordingly.

In regard to the American prisoners, let me say that there are only seven of them at this post, a list of whom is... annexed; and, relying upon your representation in regard to the release of several Mexicans, I have determined to respond to your generosity by doing the same to the seven referred to, whom the commissary of this army will supply with $70 for their sustenance upon the road.

You remark that when the convention was entered into at Monterey you entertained the hope that the terms in which it was conceived would open the way for the two Republics to agree upon an honourable peace.

Laying out of the question whether that convention was the result of necessity or of the noble views now disclosed by you, I content myself with saying, that from the spirit and decision manifested by all Mexicans, you should banish all idea of peace while a single North American in arms treads upon the territory of this Republic, and there remains in front of its ports the squadrons which make war upon them.

Nevertheless, the extraordinary Congress will assemble in the capital towards the end of the present year, and this angust body will determine what it shall judge most suitable for the honor and the interests of the nation.

Major Graham has not arrived at my quarters. Had he done so, he would have been received in the manner due to his rank and employment, and in conformity with the wishes expressed to me in his behalf by you.

I have the honor of offering you the assurances of my distinguished consideration. God and Liberty.

ANTONIO LOPEZ DE SANTA ANNA.

The following is a list of the prisoners whom Sergeant Mariano Hernandez conducted to San Luis Potosi, and who have been set at liberty by General Santa Anna:

NRR 71.241 December 19, 1846  Gen. Zachary Taylor visits Saltillo
NRR 71.241 Gen. Winfield Scott's purposes

We have no later news from General Taylor than was inserted in our last. Gen. Worth had taken possession of Saltillo, and General Taylor had left Monterey to visit that place, and make a reconnoisance. He was to be back in a few days.

From "the Army of the Centre," under General Wool, we are without later intelligence, but furnish interesting details of his movements, &c., not before given. The report of the taking of Chihuahua was premature.

From the "Army of the North," under General Kearny, we furnish interesting details to which we refer.

We have no intelligence from General Scott, since he sailed from New York for New Orleans. – Dispositions are making to move a large portion of the forces that have been posted at different points in General Taylor’s rear, in the direction of Vera Cruz, upon which it is believed that a formidable assault is to be made both by land and water, as speedily as the requisite material can be contracted for the purpose. Amongst those, we find it mentioned that a number of flat bottom boats are being constructed at different ship yards east of us, with unusual dispatch. The St. Louis Iron works have received orders for 1,000 tons of bombshells in the same haste.

General Patterson has reached Tampico, and taken command. About 2,000 troops had arrived there. [KMK]

MORE VOLUNTEERS, has been called into service by the President. An additional regiment is required from Pennsylvania. [KMK]

NRR 71.241 December 19, 1846 state of affairs at Santa Fe

FROM SANTA FE. – The letter from which our correspondent quotes below, is from Col. Doniphan, commanding the Missrs. Editors: - Through the kindness of a friend in town, I am permitted to make a few extracts from a letter just received from one of the commanding officers at Santa Fe, which brings us news to the 21st October. If you have not been apprised of the facts by some of your correspondents at Santa Fe already, the information herein contained may be of some interest to your readers. He says: "We have established a civil government here, and all things wear the appearance of profound peace and entire satisfaction on the part of the people – but to a close observer, it is evident that it is all hypocrisy; indeed it could be nothing else. A people conquered but yesterday, could have no friendly feeling for their conquerors, who have taken possession of their country – changed its laws and appointed new officers, principally foreigners. Yet, such is their cunning and hypocrisy, that they partially imposed on Gen. Kearney up to that very day of his departure; but there are so many troops here now, that their good or bad feeling is a matter of perfect indifference. On yesterday, we obtained what we deemed pretty correct information from El Passo del Norte, that Magoffin, Dr. Connelly, Col. Owens and Glasgow, were retained there as prisoners, by the troops, but were treated very respectfully, yet not permitted to go to Chihuahua or return. They had gone in advance of their wagons, and will lose nothing, and will only be detained until orders can be obtained for their release. Our regiment is under marching orders for Chihuahua, and would have been off before to day, if Gen. Kearney had not sent back orders, after he had got ten days from here, requiring us to go into the Eutaw and Navijo countries, and bring both these wars to a close before we left here. We have made a permanent treaty with the Eutaws – Major Gilpin having penetrated far into their country. Our whole regiment will march into the Navijo country immediately; this lies between the Del Norte and the waters running into the Pacific. Major Gilpin goes up the Chanas; Lieut. Col. Jackson up the Puerto of the west, (there being two of them;) and Gen. Doniphan (our command) up the Junes. As soon as we return, we will start with the traders to Chihuahua. Col. Price and all his regiment and separate battalion, will remain here this winter. To-day, John P. Campbell, of Springfield, arrived here, and brings our first positive information that 1000 infantry were on their way for this point, and that our provision trains were all breaking down and giving out, and that few of them could reach here this winter. If this is the case, starvation will be the inevitable consequence. No provisions can be had there. We have not ten days provision at present. Hon. Willard P. Hall left with Captain Cook, for California."

Fearful of the great treachery of the Mexicans and their dealings, particularly with the traders, so far as confiscation of their goods and deprivation of personal liberty are concerned, we will look very anxiously for further news from that quarter, and when we receive any, I will again apprise you of it. There are many rumors afloat here, but as they are not well authenticated, I will not make mention of them.

Yours, in great haste.

The editor of the Independence Expositor says that there has been another loss of provision wagons and teams, on the route to Santa Fe. The Indians surrounded the train, and drove off a large number of mules with perfect impunity – the men not having ammunition enough to protect themselves from the attack. The Expositor makes some serious charges about the manner in which things have been managed in this department of the army, at Fort Leavenworth.

All the papers from the upper part of this State contain letters from Santa Fe, of late date, and all of them refer with much solicitude to the prospect of a scarcity of provisions. A letter of the Palmyra Courier, written on the 11th October, says that Col. Doniphan is unable to get off, for want of money to purchase provisions on his route south, and the Quartermaster has not the provisions or means of transportation for a regiment. "It will take almost all the means of the different departments here to fit out the Mormon battalion for California, and should the regiment of Infantry ordered here arrive, there will be serious apprehensions of suffering for want of provisions this winter, as the country can furnish but little, and that in cattle. The soldiers are now upon part rations, expecting supplies daily from Bent's Fort." "The Paymaster has has no money to pay the troops, having been disappointed in his expectations of selling drafts to the traders, to meet the claims of the soldiers."

"A short residence here satisfies the most curious, who visit this far famed town of mud houses, filthy streets, and still more filthy people. The Mexicans show but little disposition to mix with the Americans, and are evidently not satisfied with the powers that be. Many of them, and among them the most wealthy, have left and are daily leaving. The inter course is confined to the lower class, who find ready sale and good prices for what little corn and meat they have to sell. The fandangos – the only public amusement here, are generally free to all – are a promiscuous assembly of whites, blacks and copper-colored, and but a grade higher than a Negro dance in Missouri, and not as amusing. The dreams of rich signors, with beautiful, languishing signorettas, brunettes with black eyes, &c., vanish into dried up, half-breed Indians and Spaniards, in blankets, and swarthy, mulatto, slip-shod wrenches, without modesty or regard to common decency. If we remain here, we will have a dreary time this winter; but we hope for better luck, and having come this far, think we deserve it."

W. C. Remington writes to the editor of the Platte Argus, under date of the 12th October, that "there is no money here to pay off the troops, except checks and they are worse than nothing, as there appears to be no silver in the country. The pay masters brought some money with them, but they retain it for the use of the officers to buy them provisions." The apprehended scarcity of provisions is also noticed. Mr. Remington says that the Mexican population are leaving Santa Fe daily, for what reason no one knows, but it is supposed that they have sold all their provisions to the Americans, and are compelled to leave or starve. "To say the best of them, they are a miserable race of beings, and the volunteers consider themselves disgraced by coming so far to fight such a degraded set of men.

Another letter in the Paris Mercury, dated on the 14th October, says: "The general impression is, that Price's
This is the poorest country I have ever seen; the natives raise nothing except in the bottom of streams, where they can irrigate the land over by throwing up dams, and the bottoms will not bring as good corn as our poorest uplands — I would say about six bushels to the acre, and wheat in the same proportion. — They raise a few onions and red pepper, which constitute all the vegetables they use. Onions are worth 6 ¼ cents a piece, and corn $3 per bushel. They sell every thing they have, and never think of tomorrow. We will produce a famine here among the Mexicans before spring. I had a conversation with the men who brought the express from California, and they are well acquainted with the country. They say that it is just such a country as is about Santa Fe, except that corn will not grow so well there as here; and I have been informed by many others to the same effect. Admit this to be true, and I cannot see what the United States want with a country which it would be an enormous expense every year to keep. We would be compelled to maintain an army here to keep down the Mexicans, and protect them from the Indians; and a war with these mountaineers would cost the government more than the Florida war. — As for revenue, we could never raise any here to support government; the great mass of the people are in the most abject poverty. They come to our camps and gather up the scraps of meat and bread, which we have thrown out and trampled under foot for two or three days; many of them will eat of a dead horse! [KMK]

A SKIRMISH. — A letter from Capt. Calhoun, of the Georgia Volunteers, dated at Monterey, October 12th, and published in the Savannah Republican, states that a skirmish took place between some of the Georgians and a small force of the Mexicans on the 11th of October. A part of the Georgia regiment, on their way from Camargo to Monterey, had encamped about six miles from the latter place, with a heavy train of wagons and mules loaded with provisions for the army. Early after night fall, it was ascertained that a party of Canale’s men were in a neighboring rancho. They were attacked by a detachment under Lieut. Horne, of the Sumter volunteers, and ten prisoners and some of the baggage of Canales were taken. Canales had just left the rancho to arrange to assault for the night. One Mexican was killed, and the number wounded is not known. None of the Americans were killed or wounded.

One of the Havana papers states that news had been received at the city of Mexico on the 7th ult., that the Gulf squadron off Vera Cruz was nearly destitute of coal and was suffering greatly from scurvy, and that the war had already cost the United States sixty-five million of dollars. The Mexican journals say that if hostilities are prolonged, the Republic must triumph; particularly if the Americans are harassed and cut up in detail by skirmishes and flying attacks. — This probably had relation to the following incident which we have from our own army.

Gen. Rincon died at Jalapa on the 11th October.

The Mexican press contains the most absurd stores — such for instance, as that, out of 1,800 American troops that Matamoros, 1,500 were prostrated by yellow fever. [KMK]

TOUCHING INCIDENTS. If there be virtue in Monuments, humanity should rear a pile, lofty as the Bishop's Palace, to the victm who bled at her shrine, as detailed by a correspondent of the Louisville Journal, thus:

"Camp Monterey, October 7, 1848

"Hungry and cold I crept to one corner of the fort to get in the sunshine and at the same time to shelter myself from the bombs that were flying thick around me. I looked out, and, some two or three hundred yards from the fort, I saw a Mexican female carrying water and food to the wounded men of both armies. I saw her left the head of one poor fellow, give him water, and then take her handkerchief from her own head and bind up his wounds; attending one or two others in the same way, she went back for more food and water. As she was returning I heard the crack of one or two guns, and she, poor good creature, fell; after a few struggles all was still – she was dead! I turned my eyes to heaven and thought, "Oh God, and this is war!" I cannot believe but that the shot was an accidental one. The next day, passing into another fort, I passed her dead body. It was lying on its back, with the bread and broken gourd containing a few drops of water. We buried her amid showers of grape and round shot, occasionally dodging a shell or twelve pounder, and expecting every moment to have another grave to dig for one of ourselves. [KMK]

A PROCLAMATION OF COMMODORE STOCKTON, GOVERNOR OF CALIFORNIA.

I, Robert F. Stockton, Commander-in-chief of the U. States forces in the Pacific Ocean, and governor of the territory of California, and Commander-in-chief of the army of the same; do hereby make known to all men, that having by right of conquest taken possession of that territory known by the name of Upper and Lower California, I do now declare it to be a territory of the U. States, now under the name of the territory of California.

And I do by these presents farther order and decree, that the government of the said territory of California shall be, until altered by the proper authority of the U. States, continued in manner and forms as follows: that is to say:

The Executive power and authority in and over the said territory, shall be vested in a governor, who shall hold his officer for four years, unless sooner removed by the President of the U. States. States, until the decision of the President can be made known thereon; he shall commission all officers who shall be appointed to offices under the laws of the said territory, and shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed.

There shall be a secretary of the said territory, who shall reside therein, and hold his office for four years, unless sooner removed by the President of the United States; he shall record and preserve all the laws and proceedings of the Legislative Council, hereinafter constituted, and all the acts and proceedings of the governor in his Executive Department; he shall transmit one copy of the laws of one copy of the executive proceedings on or before the first Monday in December in each year to the President of the United States; and at the same time two copies of the laws of the speaker of the house of representatives, for the use of congress. All officers of cities, towns, departments or districts shall be elected every year by the people, in such manner as may be provided by the governor and legislative council.

The legislative council of the territory of California shall hold its first session at such time and place in said territory as the governor thereof shall appoint and direct; and at said session, or as soon thereafter as may by them be deemed expedient, the said government and legislative council shall proceed to locate and establish the seat of government for said territory, at such place as they may deem eligible, which place, however, shall thereafter be subject to be changed by the said governor and legislative council; and the time and place of the annual commencement of the session of the said legislative council thereafter, shall be on such day and place as the governor and council may appoint. Burning of the Mexican brig Creole

On the night of the 26th November, about midnight, the U. S. brig Solmers, then lying at Green Island, four or five miles distant from Vera Cruz, sent a boat with Lieut. Parker, Passed Midshipman Robert Clay Rodgers, and J. R. Hynson, with five men, and burnt the Mexican brig Creole, moored to the castle of San Juan. They also succeeded in capturing seven Mexican prisoners. – No one except Passed Midshipman Hynson, who was burnt by firing his pistol into some powder to set the brig on fire – he is doing well.

_Expediton south_. On the morning of the 2d December, Com. Perry sailed from Tampico on an expedition not known, with the following vessels of war: steamship Mississippi, steamer Vixen, sloop John Adams, and schnrs. Bonita and Petrel. A correspondent of a New Orleans paper writes that their probably object is to attack, and if practicable, take possession of the ports of Tobasco, Sisal, and Laguna. The capture of Alvarado, it is stated, will not be attempted again until the attack can be made both by land and sea. For this purpose a land force of 1,500 or 2,000 men is deemed necessary, as the garrison has been strongly reinforced since the last demonstration by the fleet upon that place. Campeachy will remain unmolested in consequence of the friendly disposition by the people towards the U. States, and their repugnance to a reunion with Mexico.

Tampico, Dec. 3. This city is well garrisoned by our troops under Col. Gates, and that gentleman is delighted with his new quarters. The greatest activity has been carried on here by the officers of the army and navy for several days, in fortifying all the assailable points, and we are now ready to meet all the force that Mexico can send against us. The occupation of this place by our navy and army, has caused the greatest alarm in Santa Anna’s army at San Luis Potosi, and his troops are daily deserting.

The Forward left Tobasco river on the 21st November – all quiet. Left at that place, U. S. steamer McLane, Capt. Howard, for the purpose of blockading said port; officers and crew well. [KMK]

Accurate table of killed and wounded in Battle of Monterey unavailable

Fifteen hundred volunteers said to be buried on the Rio Grande

Diminution of the Baltimore battalion

_The Killed and Wounded at Monterey_. – The U. S. Surgeon General announces in the Union, that he has not yet received an official list of the names of the killed and wounded at the several assaults on Monterey, and that he has given up hope of being able to furnish fuller or more accurate lists of them than have been given to the public through the papers.

_Volunteers_. – We find it stated in one of the latest letters published from an officer on the frontier, that at least 1500 volunteers have been buried on the banks of the Rio Grande.

_The Baltimore Battalion_ that numbered 683 when it reached the Brazos could only muster at last dates 477. Making the total loss 206. [KMK]

Loss of the United States sloop of war Boston, capture of Panuco

_Naval Journal_

_loss of the Boston – Official Report_. Island of Eteuthera, November 16th, 1846 – Sir: It is my misfortune to be under the necessity of reporting to the department the loss of the United States sloop Boston, under my command.

On Saturday evening last, at 8 o’clock, the ship was in the lat. of 26 degrees 20 minutes north, and longitude 76 degrees 35 minutes west.
From this position it was my intention to reach the parallel of Abaco light house, and then haul in for “Hole-in-the-Wall” passage.

I therefore steered SSW, until half past 1 o’clock A. M. when a light was seen bearing SSW, ½ W. – As it was possible that this might be Abaco light I steered south in order to counteract the effects of a stronger westerly current than already allowed.

We had light winds during the night, and the deep sea and hand leads were in constant use.

At 4 hours 35 minutes A. M. when about to haul in for the “Hole-in-the-Wall” passage, we experienced a hard black squall, with rain from the northward, which, notwithstanding all our exertions, swept the ship upon the bank of this island, but she immediately passed into deeper water, when an anchor was let go. Such was the violence of the sea and the wind, however, that the ship was swept upon the north point of this island, the sea making a breach over her. It was not until the ship was on shore that we could see the land in any direction.

I now cut away the masts, and, as all hope of saving the ship was at an end, proceeded to land the property on board, the greater part of which I hope to save.

I trust that the department will perceive that the "Boston" has been driven on shore owing to circumstances beyond my control; and in order that the matter may be thoroughly investigated, I respectfully request that I may be brought before a court of inquiry, or a court martial, on my return to the United States, and there answer for my conduct throughout the whole of my short and unfortunate command.

The officers and crew generally, I am happy to add, are in good health. I have the honor to be, most respectfully, your obedient servant,

G. F. PEARSON, commander.

Prize money. A letter from an officer in the U.S. squadron off Tampico says- "We took an estimate of the prize money accruing on the various prizes taken at Tabasco and this place. It amounts to $220,000- half of which $110,000, goes to the government; so the navy is at last doing something for itself." [KMK]

Midshipman Simpson. A fact worthy of observation occurs in the attack upon Tabasco by Com. Perry. The Mexican flag staff was cut down by a shot from one of our guns. It is said the gun was directed by passed midshipman Simpson; and it may be thought accident. We have reason, however, to believe that it could be done again and again. Passed midshipman Simpson is the class of midshipmen who were passed last summer by Com. Kearney and Perry, and Captains McCauley, McKeever, and Mayo, who constituted a board of examiners at the naval school in this place. We are told that such was the precision of experiments in target by the young men of the school, as to call forth from the board the highest commendation, and it is said of Com. Kearney, that he said he had not only ever seen such precision, but stated that he had never heard of such. [KMK]

The Six Nations. Oneidas, & c. – The circumstances of withdrawing the detachments of the regular army, from our extensive Indian frontier, for the purpose of carrying on the Mexico war, leaves an awful responsibility for the safety of frontier settlers, as well as for the protection of the miserable remnants of once formidable tribes of Indians that nothing but the presence of disciplined military authority has been found adequate to protect, so far as they have been protected, from the rapacity of marauders and outlaws that never fail to hover on the confines of civilization. A letter dated November 20, from the neighborhood of Fort Scott, in the Osage nation, published in the St. Louis Republican, gives the most distressing accounts of the exposed state of the frontier left with a mere handful of soldiers, and threatened continually with bands of predatory Indians, whose rude passions have been inflamed by the wars of the white men, raging around them. What is far more to be lamented, and denounced by every independent man who has a particle of respect for justice and the honor of his country, we find detailed in regard to the poor half civilized, half christianized Indians lately removed by the government from Western New York, as detailed in the following paragraph:
"We have on our border, and near us, an unfortunate band of badly treated Indian emigrants. They are portions of the Six nations of New York. They were sent here by the government, according to treaty stipulations. Their treatment, suffering and conditions cannot be described. I have said they were from New York. They were brought hither by the government agents in June last, but with promises that money should be paid them on their arrival here. By the treaty, they were to have houses, fields, mills, churches, school houses and other comforts erected for, and extended to them. But up to this time, they have not received a dollar of money, nor has a cabin, to say nothing of a house, been erected. No churches nor school houses have been prepared, nor has a field been opened. The consequences are easily told. Of the whole number, more than one half have been consigned to their mother earth - while those who remain are borne down by sickness and the loss of so many friends. The government is responsible for this destitution and affliction. The people of the Six nations have seen better days, and something besides the government ration was necessary to their comfort, and was provided for in the treaty. As yet, the government authorities have not responded to an appeal made by them, through their agent, while other nations, before and since their emigration, have had moneys paid to them. There is something wrong in the proceedings towards these wretched Indians, and some one should be made to suffer, and account for their wrongs. I appeal to Benton, Crittenden, Sevier, and other senators, to move an investigation in this matter. The interposition of the independent press is invoked, and I ask the whole country to see that the stain is removed from the national honor." [KMK]

Rumors relative to superseding the commanding generals by appointing a lieutenant general, Gen. Robert Armstrong or Thomas Hart Benton considered for post, Com. Charles Stewart's appointment as commander of the Gulf Squadron also being reconsidered, review of results of the campaign, glimpse at the future [KMK]

The route of General Wool's Army Captain G.T.M. Davis, aid to Brigadier General Shields, and bearer of dispatches to the President, who arrived in this city on Saturday evening, has favored us with the following very interesting of his journey through Mexico from Monclova, via Monterey.

"I left Monclova on the 2d of November, and crossed to Monterey, a distance of 288 miles, through a section of country infested with Indians and Rancheros, with no other escort than a Mexican guide and a servant The trip was performed in six days, on horseback, meeting with no interruption except at the town of Sabinos, about 130 miles from Monterey. The interruption was temporary, the Alcalde allowing me to resume my journey with but a few minutes delay.

"I left Monterey on the 11th, and was detained at the Brasos several days in consequence of no steamer leaving for N. Orleans.

"On the 30th of Oct. the center division, under Gen. Wool, the advance of which was commanded by Brigadier Gen. Shields, encamped four miles north of Monclova. Within an hour after we had pitched our tents, Gen. Lopez, the governor of the province of Coahuila, of which Monclova is the capital, accompanied by an escort of about twenty principal citizens, rode out to the encampment and called upon Gen. Wool. He informed the general that no resistance would be made to him taking military possession of Monclova, but, on the contrary, our column would be received and treated as friends. On the 31st, Gen. Wool, accompanied by his staff and an escort consisting of two squadrons of the 1st and 2nd dragoons, rode into Monclova and took nominal possession of the same. One of the best furnished houses in the place was tendered to Gen. Wool as his headquarters, which, in the event of his making his headquarters in the city, he would accept. The health of the entire column was excellent, and the condition of the men, notwithstanding their long march, as good as could be desired.

"The strength of the column is 2,600, rank and file; and consists of the 1st and 2d regiments of Illinois volunteers, commanded by Colonels Hardin and Bissell; Col. Yell's regiment of Arkansas cavalry; Major Conneville's battalion, composed of three companies of the 6th infantry, and Capt. Williams company of Kentucky volunteers; Capt. Washington's battery of flying artillery; and two squadrons of the 1st and 2d dragoons. The march from the Presidio de Rio Grande at Monclova, a distance of 204 miles, was made in eleven marching days, though somewhat retarded in their progress by an immense provision and baggage train, about 250 in number. The column was highly favored with excellent weather, and with one of the best natural roads ever passed over by and army.

"The towns through which the column passed after crossing the Rio Grande were, Presidio de Rio Grande, Nava, San Fernando, San Rosa, and Monclova. Presidio de Rio Grande is situated upon a beautiful and fertile plain, five and a half miles from the Rio Grande; it contains a population of 2,000 inhabitants, and has no public buildings in it save two Roman Catholic churches. Twenty-five miles from Presidio de Rio Grande you reach the town of Nava, containing 700 inhabitants. It is surrounded by exceedingly fertile country, and corn in great abundance is produced in this region. In fact, the whole country between the above two places is very fertile, and most admirably adapted to agricultural pursuits. Between the two points there is no water, except what is conducted through artificial channels. Twelve miles from Nava is the town of San Fernando, containing from 3,500 to 4,000 inhabitants. It is one of the neatest built towns through which I passed in Mexico, and is abundantly supplied with water, a beautiful little river watering it on both sides.
In the vicinity of this town also the soil is of excellent quality and the production of corn and sugar-cane large. Cotton is also produced here, but not in very large quantities. Seventy miles from San Fernando, we came to the town of San Rosa, with a population from 3,000 to 3,500 inhabitants. It is situated immediately at the base of a beautiful range of mountains, bearing the same name as the town. Their notoriety in Mexico arises from the fact that they possess some of the richest silver mines in that Republic. In consequence of the unsettled state of that government, these mines have not been worked for some years, as their productions were immediately seized by the government to replenish its exhausted treasury. I was informed by a Dr. Long, of Pennsylvania, who for thirty years had resided in San Rosa, that the mines near the town, when last worked by the Mexicans, yielded at least half a million of silver per annum. By the application of American skill and industry no question can arise but, from the richness of extend of the veins, they could be made to produce a million per annum. During the periods these mines were worked the town of San Rosa was in a flourishing condition, and its inhabitants in prosperous circumstances. But since they have ceased working them the town has deteriorated, and its citizens, to a great extent, became impoverished. At the end of the first day’s march after we left San Rosa, the Alcalde and several of the principal citizens of San Rosa followed our column, and gave to Gen. Wool and Shields a dinner. The Alcalde also proposed to Gen. Wool to issue a pronunciamiento in favor of the government of the United States, provided that he (Gen. Wool) would sustain them in it. But, for reasons best known to himself, he declined the proposition.

“Monclova is the next place we reached, and where the column still was when I left. It is situated at the base of a beautiful and extensive range of mountains, called the Monclova mountains, but which, in reality, are nothing more than a continuation of the San Rosa chain of mountains. It contains about 4,500 or 5,000 inhabitants, is situated on a fertile and extensively cultivate plain, and is in the midst of what is called the granary of Northern Mexico. Corn and wheat are produced in great abundance, and the whole country abounds with cattle and the finest mutton. In no part of Mexico yet traversed by our army could a large body of men by better or more abundantly subsisted than in the region of Monclova. “The road from Presidio de Rio Grande to Monclova was over a section of country that was generally level, with the exception of a short distance between San Fernando and San Rosa. The second day’s march after we left San Fernando we crossed a small chain of mountains called the St. Joseph’s. They were from two to three hundred feet high, and filled with extensive beds of the finest limestone rock. After passing this chain of mountains some twenty miles, we crossed two very rapid streams called the Alamos and Sabino. The former is about seventy yards wide, the latter between eighty and ninety yards, and the distance between them about five miles. The depth is from three and a half to four feet, with the most rapid currents I ever encountered in my life. The water is as pure as crystal, and delightful to taste. Both of these rivers have beds of large sized pebble-stones, and abound with the finest fish. At a point not many miles distant from where the column crossed these two streams, they mingle their waters into one common channel, which finally empties itself into the river Salado. The river Salado is also a beautiful stream, upon the left bank of which stands Guerreo, a flourishing town of 5,000 inhabitants. The Salado empties itself into the Rio Grande, which, in fact, is the principal receptacle of all the small streams over which our army has passed during their invasion of Mexico. After crossing the Sabino, we came in view of the San Rosa mountains, which lay to the right of us, and in our immediate view, during the whole of the residue of our march until we reached Monclova. It will thus be seen that our army as yet has not crossed any prominent or extensive range of mountains in Mexico. The height of the San Rosa mountains is variously estimated at from 1,500 to 3,000 feet, and a part of them is a continuous range of beautiful peaks, presenting a view which baffles description. The timber through this whole section of country is very scarce, the principal production being muskot. Considering, however, the extreme mildness of the climate and the uniformity of temperature, there may be sold to be sufficient to supply all immediate wants.

“The latitude of Monclova, derived by actual observation from two astronomers in our column, is 26 56. Oranges, figs, lemons, and grapes are produced in abundance in that vicinity and vegetables that would grow in any country could be produced here by taking the trouble to put the seed into the earth. Monclova is a very old town, and is in a rather dilapidated condition. Its public buildings are several Catholic churches and extensive stone barracks, capable of garrisoning some ten of twelve hundred troops.

“Notwithstanding the professions of friendship towards us on the part of Lopez, the governor of the province, the inhabitants were very perceptibly far more hostile towards us than those of all the rest of the towns through which we passed. This arises from the fact that it influential citizens are generally strong centralists, favorable to a monarchical form of government; while those of the other towns are as strongly inclined towards a republican form of government.

“In my journey from Monclova to Monterey, I passed through several towns, descriptions of which I am only precluded from giving through fear of wearying your patience.

“The towns through which I passed between Monclova and Monterey were Candella, Flascalla, Biloadama, Sabinos, and Aqualeras. Beyond this last town I struck the main road leading from Camargo to Monterey at Serlavo.

“The distance from Saltillo to San Luis Potosi is estimated at 300 miles; from Monterey to Tampico 150 miles, from Tampico to San Luis Potosi 350 miles.

Yours Respectfully,

Geo. T.M. Davis, Aid-de-camp.

A few lines from an old friend, especially when written from the seat of war, I trust may not prove unacceptable to you.

On the 30th of last month Gen. Wool's column encamped four miles south of this city, the whole army coming up in fine condition and excellent health. On the day following, accompanied by his staff and a small escort of dragoons he went to the city and took nominal possession of the same, and on Wednesday of this week, on his way to a new encampment, selected south of this place, he intends marching the entire column through Monclova and take actual military possession of the same. Thus it will be seen that the ancient capitol of Coahuila is in the actual possession of our arms, without the slightest resistance having been made on the part of the Mexicans. How long we shall remain here is involved in some uncertainty. The officers commanding that battery of artillery, and the squadrons of the 1st and 2nd dragoons, have required that some two weeks be given them to recruit their horses. Added to this is a rumor which receives credence at headquarters, that General Kearny has sent a detachment of his column that has taken Chihuahua without resistance. Should subsequent information confirm this report as to the movement of Gen. Kearney, then all the anticipated good of this column, on its present destination, will have been realized, and the only alternative left for us will be to form a junction with Gen. Taylor, at Saltillo, or march on our own hook directly upon San Luis Potosi. His last step has been objected to by Gen. Taylor until after the expiration of the armistice. The strong probabilities, therefore are that we shall not move from Monclova before the 25th of this month at least.

Col. Bissell's regiment of Illinois volunteers will be up tomorrow evening, the advance having already reached here. They are in fine health and condition, and have made a very rapid march with a view of overtaking us, previous to our advance from this place.

Monclova contains a population of between four and five thousand inhabitants, many of whom are intelligent and wealthy citizens. The leading spirits among them, however, are strong Centralists, and make no concealment of the hostility of their feelings towards us and our Government. Many of them assert that if peace is not consummated during the pendency of this armistice, a vast amount of blood will yet have to be shed and a large number of lives sacrificed, before they will submit to the dismemberment of a foot of their territory this side of the Nueces. I am satisfied that the liberal policy of our government towards the Mexicans, in the prosecution of this war, is not appreciated by them, and that unless that policy is changed, so far as to subsist our army upon them, at a reasonable price for their produce, this war will be protracted unnecessarily for months.

This column is now in what is regarded as the granary of Northern Mexico. Wheat is produced in considerable quantities, and flour manufactured from it is of an excellent quality. Corn is not only abundant, but may be regarded as a drug among them in this immediate vicinity. The highest rate it commanded, even when peddled out in the single peck, was not to exceed fifty cents the bushel, but the moment we appeared among them it was put up to a dollar. For this there is no other excuse on earth, except a disposition on the part of the Mexicans to extort from us, believing that our government has sent its armies into Mexico to bribe them into submission by paying extortionary prices for everything we purchase from them, rather than conquer them by a force of arms. The officers have demanded of General Wool that he establish a tariff of prices and insist upon forage and subsistence being furnished us, as far as they have it to spare, at those rates, and, from what I can ascertain today, he will be driven to a line of policy which his own judgement and experience should have dictated, without any such demand being made upon him by his officers.

Their wheat is of good quality, which they dispose of by the mule load. The charge six dollars a load, which comprises two sacks, containing in the aggregate, from three hundred to three hundred and twenty pounds. Not anticipating we would want any of it they did not raise the price of it before General Wool made a formal requisition upon Gov. Lopez, for a given quantity, to subsist his men while here. Lopez replied that is should be furnished. There is small mill in the vicinity of Monclova, constructed on the plan of Gentry's patent, which we have taken possession of, and it will be kept continually running, in grinding flour for the army, while we remain at Monclova. The last train of wagons, with provisions, that we expect to receive from Lavacca, is now on its way hither. That depot will then be abandoned by the subsistence department, and our entire reliance for provisions will be by opening a communication with General Taylor, and drawing them from Camargo, and by obtaining them in part from the country that we march through. Here there is no difficulty whatever in procuring all the beef, wheat, and corn that we may desire, for our subsistence and the forage of the horses.

We have an immense and unnecessarily large train of wagons - numbering over two hundred and fifty - when nearly any other officer in the Army above the grade of a corporal would have been enabled to have gotten along with half the number. If we are compelled to go to Chihuahua by the nearest and most direct route, this train, as well as the artillery, will have to be left behind, as the route will admit of no other kind of transportation than by pack mules. On the other hand, if Gen. Wool persists in dragging at his heels this immense wagon train, and the artillery, then we will be driven to go through Durango, which is the only route admitting transportation by wagons, and which will nearly double the distance we will have to travel - making it between nine and ten hundred miles. You will, therefore, agree with me, that it will turn out a most fortunate thing for the government of the United States, if it be true that Gen. Kearney has taken Chihuahua, as it will save millions of expense that will otherwise accrue, if this whole column is sent there. Most of the officers in the army ridicule, without stint or mercy, this expedition, notwithstanding it is evidently the favorite one with the controlling powers at Washington.

The country in this vicinity is beautiful, and the soil of the most desirable quality for all agricultural pursuits. Of the character of the wheat, I have already spoken; and the corn cannot be surpassed, in my judgement, in any section of This column, though comprised of as able, well disciplined, and brave a body of men as were ever mustered into service, is, notwithstanding, in a most unfortunate condition. It arises from the little confidence reposed in Gen. Wool, and the peculiar faculty he possesses in finding fault, and gaining the ill will of every officer in his column. This state of feeling is applicable to both regulars and volunteers. So marked has been his unwarranted course of conduct towards Col. Harney, that some ten days since he asked and obtained leave to be relieved from duty under Gen. Wool, and to be sent to Gen. Taylor to report for duty. Col. Harney is not in Monclova and leaves in the course of a week for Monterey. His separation from us, has caused universal expressions of regret on the part of both officers and men throughout the entire column; and the treatment he has received from Gen. Wool received equally as united a condemnation. As an officer, none stood higher in the command; and in the event of our encountering the enemy, he was looked up to with far more confidence than Gen. Wool. Yet no one blames him for the course he has felt himself compelled to pursue, although his loss to our column is sensibly felt and universally expressed.

A Missouri Republican of the 6th September found its way into our camp a few days since, and never was a popular work of romance sought after with more avidity than it was by all the Suckers. It was read and reread, until if fairly tumbled into pieces from being handled; and when it was gone, there was a general lamentation even among those who had read it once, but were anxious to read it again. The officers have come to he determination to hire an express, and send him into pieces from being handled; and when it was gone, there was a general lamentation even among those who had read it once, but were anxious to read it again. The officers have come to he determination to hire an express, and send him

Gen. Wool has been ordered by Gen. Taylor to occupy forthwith the town of Parras, a small but beautiful place seventy miles northeast of Saltillo. Gen. Wool would have no opposition at Parras as the inhabitants were prepared to receive him peaceably. His troops are represented to be in the finest health and discipline. [AKS]

The ultimate plans of Gen. Taylor had not of course been fully developed, but sufficient was known to render it quite certain that something like the following outline was to be adhered to. He had received intelligence from the government of the call for additional troops. He would therefore occupy all the posts, towns, &c., either immediately or remotely, on the line of operations to Tampico.
Lieut. Col. Riley now occupies Mount Morales with the 2nd Regiment of U. S. Infantry. Gen. Taylor would himself take up his line of march for Victoria, where rumor has it, Santa Anna has 10,000 choice troops. This city is indispensably necessary to Gen. Taylor, in order that he may secure his lines of communication in an attack upon San Luis Potosí. Santa Anna knows its importance, and will no doubt resist its possession by our troops. But I shall not speculate. Gen. Taylor intended to march, as soon as provisions could be hastened up—which would probably be the 10th December—with the 3rd, 4th and 7th Infantry, the dragoons under Col. Harney, who had arrived at Monterey, Bragg's battery, and two regiments of volunteers, which latter had not been designated.

It would seem that Gen. Taylor himself attached some importance to the rumor of Santa Anna's 10,000 troops, as he heads in person the expedition against Victoria. After taking this point, which he most assuredly must do, it is thought he will make no further demonstration until desired reinforcements reach him from Tampico. [AKS]

NNR 71.264 12/26/1846 Gen. William Orlando Butler's wound

Should Gen. Butler's health admit of it, he will be left at Monterey in command, otherwise Col. Smith, of the rifles, will be detained for that purpose. Gen. Butler's wound was not improving; indeed it is said to be getting worse. The air of Monterey is considered unfavorable to wounded invalids, and the surgeons have advised that all such should leave the country if practicable. [AKS]

NNR 71.264 12/26/1846 Gen. Gideon Pillow's health improved

Gen. Pillow goes back from this place to take command in Gen. Patterson's column, which marches for Victoria. Gen. Pillow was on his way home. But owing to letters received from above, developing something of the future operations of the army, as well as letters from home rendering it unnecessary for his return, he goes back to his command. His health, too, is greatly improved. [AKS]

NNR 71.264, December 26, 1846 rumor of Gen. Antonio Canales having taken sixty baggage wagons

Dec. 11th.-A rumor which needs confirmation, but which was believed generally, however, reached this place three days ago, stating that sixty government wagons, with provisions, specie, &c. for our army had been captured by Canales somewhere between Camargo and Mier. No particulars stated. Whether this be true or not, I understand that it is not improbable, as the incautious and unguarded way in which the trains too often move would render their capture no difficult thing.

From what I see and hear in certain quarters, I am more and more inclined to believe that Santa Anna intends to harass Gen. Taylor, and that a stand will be made against him that will require fighting, and not long first. [WFF]

NNR 71.264 12/26/1846 Gen. Robert Patterson's command retiring to the mouth of the Rio Grande en route to Tampico

In closing I will add that Maj. Gen. Paterson had left Camargo with the Alabama and Illinois regiments, and was conveying these troops down to the mouth of the Rio Grande, intends to go to Tampico by water. Having duly reported his intentions to the commanding general, an express was despatched and arrived in time, ordering General Patterson to go to Tampico by land. Gen. P. and staff have arrived at Matamoros. [AKS]

NNR 71.265 December 26, 1846 letter of "Gomez" from Monterey

Monterey, Mexico, Nov. 11th, 1846

Within a day or two past, we have all been on the "qui vive," arising from the arrival of Major Graham with dispatches to Gen. Taylor from Washington, disapproving of, and terminating the armistice, and directing an immediate renewal of hostilities, and vigorous prosecution of war. General Taylor was somewhat surprised at the disapproval of the government of the terms of the armistice, especially as he had informed them, that under no circumstances whatever could he have moved his army an inch beyond Monterey, short of the sixty days, the term during which the armistice was to last. The locofocos would have been glad to have raised a shout over this action of Mr. Polk, had not their mouths been closed by the consideration that two of three commissioners who fixed upon and settled the terms of capitulation, were distinguished leaders of their party—Col. Davis, a member of Congress from Mississippi, Governor Henderson, from
The distance from Saltillo to San Luis Potosi, is generously estimated from three to four hundred miles. I am inclined to the opinion, that it is about three hundred and fifty miles. Most of this march will be through a country very difficult to subsist an army in a large portion of which is watered by artificial means. Ten miles a day is a fair estimate of the distance the army will average in marching between the two points. So that, taking into consideration that January and February are the two wet months in this country, no fight or collision between the two armies can reasonably be looked for, earlier than the last of March, or the forepart of April. If it be true that Tampico is in the possession of American forces, and a communication is immediately opened between there and Saltillo, sufficiently protected to allow our drawing subsistence from there, instead of Camargo, it would greatly facilitate our operations beyond saltillo, and more especially, if it also turns out correct, that the river above Tampico is navigable for some seventy five or eighty miles.

The impression prevails here in the most intelligent and best formed circles, that the Mexican Government will make its last attempt at resistance at San Luis Potosi, and that if (as they will be) they are defeated there, they will then come to our terms, in establishing peace once more between the two nations. I estimate the Mexican character in a different light, and arrive at the opposite conclusion expressed by the majority in this city. I believe that if defeated at San Luis Potosi, they will fall back within the walls of the city of Mexico, and that the invasion and conquest of this country is only to be achieved by wading through fields fertilized with carnage. Had the entire Mexican force at Monterey been taken prisoners, deprived of their arms, and treated as enemies of our country, a different state of things would at this time have existed. But allowing nearly five thousand of the flower of their regular army to withdraw with their small farms, furnished the enemy a nucleus around which they have rapidly gathered a force of twenty two thousand to resist our arms. Incapable of estimating or appreciating a magnanimous act, our indulgence and liberality towards them is construed into fear, or the result of compulsion; and that they will only fall back for the time being, that they may attack our drawing subsistence from there, instead of Camargo, it would greatly facilitate our operations beyond saltillo, and more especially, if it also turns out correct, that the river above Tampico is navigable for some seventy five or eighty miles.

Ampudia, by surrendering in this city and capitulating, has terminated his military career forever in Mexico. To escape violence at the hands of his own men whom he led to battle, it became necessary for Gen. Worth and one or two others to escort him out of the city. And he only then succeeded in reaching Uadalagra (pronounced Wetherlagara) where he was seized by his own countrymen, incarcerated within the walls of a prison, where he will remain until he is tried and cashiered, or shot as a traitor to his country. During the whole battle of Monterey, he never made his appearance upon the field, but remained safely immersed in the large Catholic church on the main plaza, from whence he gave his orders, as the commander-in-chief of the Mexican forces. I mention this, to show you that the surrender of Monterey by Ampudia, met with everything else but the favor or approbation of either his army or his government.

Maj. Gen. Butler, it is said, is to be left here with his division, to garrison and protect our interests in this city. This has created a great deal of dissatisfaction among the volunteers, and caused no little excitement among the portion of them at least. In his division is the regiment of Kentuckians that were here at the battle in September, and who were the only volunteers on the ground but what participated in the dangers and the glory of that fight. They are exasperated beyond description, at being left behind again, where there is a moral certainty that, by advancing with the main army, they could have an opportunity of displaying their valor in an engagement with the enemy. They have accordingly sent word to Gen. Taylor that under the circumstances, if they are not taken forward and allowed to participate in any future battle that may be fought, they will mutinize to a man and return to their homes. To me it looks like the most short sighted policy, to throw a large body of volunteers together to garrison any town or city. Those at all acquainted with their temperament and habits in life cannot be insensible to the fact that this is the very worst service that can be assigned them. That is a duty, which should in the man be assigned to the regulars, whose rigid discipline peculiarly adapts them to that service, while the volunteers should be led forward and placed in front of the fight. The situations of some, and open speculations of others, that in the heat of a battle they would be found incompetent to the contest, has been repudiated by their undaunted bravery, and valorous achievements in the battle of Monterey. Where there is a regiment of regulars, or a regular officer, that would have led a regiment to charge up on a fort containing double their numbers and a large piece of ordnance, with nothing but rifles without bayonets? Yet it was done by the Mississippians, and the enemy was driven from their fort, who surrendered it to the valor and bravery of the volunteers. It is therefore looked upon and regarded here, as a studied design, to reverse the order of things, and leave the volunteers behind to garrison Camargo, Mier, Seralvo, and Monterey, while the regulars to a man are to be pushed forward that the brows of their commanders alone may be decked with the laurels of valorous deeds. By this species of injustice, its participators may hope to crush forever the volunteer system, and thus increase the necessity of enlarging the forces of a mercenary soldiery; but they will in the end, when it is too late to remedy the evil, discover they have reckoned without their hosts. Nearly a majority of the states in the Union, have volunteers in Mexico. The outrage, injustice and indignities that have been visited upon them during this whole campaign, will not go unredressed. And if, when the progress of this war shall come to be the subject matter of investigation before the people of our nation, when its horizon is once more encircled by the bow of peace, the regular army shall find itself on the verge of destruction, hurled thither by the by the whirlwind of public indignation; they can console themselves with reflection that during the war with Mexico, they aroused the storm, the peltings of which they are then encountering. This is no idle speculation. It is based upon realities that not only exist, but which pervade every volunteer force in this country. They are only restrained from giving vent to their indignation through the public prints, from one end the Union to the other, by the restrictions of the articles and regulations of war, that for the time being fetter them in an unrestrained expression of opinion.

Under instructions from Washington Gen. Patterson has been directed to fit out immediately an expedition that will march against Tampico. Although every exertion has been made on his part to leave at the earliest possible moment, he has encountered nothing but obstacles from those departments filled by regular officers, through which alone he can complete his arrangements and commence his march. The reason for this is obvious. According to the new Army Register, he is one of the classified gentlemen, whose military existence is only to last pending this war; and with the incubus hanging upon him, of being a volunteer, but little regard is to be paid to his wants, though striving to obey the orders of his government. His perseverance and determination will, however, yet overcome all difficulties thrown in his way, and his friends here say that in a few days he will be in motion. Brigadier General Pillow, it is supposed, will accompany the expedition, and General Marshall, of Kentucky, be left at Camargo in command of that post. The principal part of gen. Patterson's command will be composed of volunteers; but what regiments he designs taking, I have not been able to ascertain in this city. It may be that if it be true that the naval forces have taken Tampico, that the capitulations of this expedition is at an end, although a force to guard the place and protect the depot that it is contemplated establishing there, will become indispensable.

Intelligent Mexicans in this city, assert with great confidence, that after General Taylor retires from Monterey, and his forces are divided between this place and Saultillo, an effort will be made to repossess themselves of this hitherto impregnable position. They also express themselves that as sure as such effort is made, it will be crowned with success. It is needless to say, that no apprehensions are entertained upon that score by general Taylor; and if the Mexicans desire to see this ancient city laid waste, and its inhabitants driven off like chaff before the wind, to shelter and refuge in the caverns of the mountains that overhang and surround their city, let them take up arms against general Butler and his Division, that will be left to protect and garrison this place. No flag of truce will avail them. Neither will armistice or capitulations be left them, behind which they can retire when over powered and conquered by our forces. The perversion given by them, of the motives that prompted general Taylor to listen to their proposition for an armistice and capitulation in September last, cuts off every hope of any repetition of it, in the event of a renewal of hostilities on the plains of Monterey. I question whether any thing short of extermination, would satisfy our forces, if the Mexicans dare to venture an attack upon Monterey with a view of repossessing it.

Captain Randolph Ridgely, of the 3d artillery, confessedly one of the most valuable officers in the army, and universally esteemed here by all who knew him, died a few days since from a fracture in the skull, caused by being thrown from his horse. He was one of the most finished horsemen in the army, which caused the more astonishment among his friends at the happening of the accident. He lingered three days, during which entire period he lay perfectly senseless, recognizing neither persons nor things. His remains were laid alongside those of his valiant comrades who fell on the 21st, 22d, and 23d of September. Around them all, a beautiful enclosure of faced stone has been reared, in the center of the front wall of which, a large square monument is being built. A stone with appropriate inscriptions will adorn the monument, about midway of its height, the whole the work of those who participated in the battle that caused the death of the fallen, to whose memory the work is reared. The place where their remains rest, and where this work is done, is immediately fronting the headquarters of general Taylor, at the encampment four miles from the city. The health of the troops generally is excellent, most of the sickness being among the wounded.

GOMEZ.

[KMK]
Ere this reaches you, you will doubtless, have heard of the taking of Tampico by our naval forces, without expending an ounce of powder. The reception of the news here has entirely changed the aspect of things; the depot of subsistence will be changed from this point to Tampico, so far as the main force under gen. Taylor is concerned. The steamer Sea, with a portion of the 2d artillery, was sent round from this place to Tampico on the 20th instant, with a view ascending the river as far as practicable, and to be ready to transport troops and subsistence to its head waters as fast as they can reach here. It is asserted, with much confidence, by those who profess to have knowledge of the navigation of the river, that boats can ascend it some two hundred miles above Tampico. Should this information prove to be correct, upon actual experiment, it will enable the government of the United States to make its provision depot within one hundred and fifty miles of San Luis Potosi. This would greatly accelerate the movements of gen. Taylor, and enable him to make an attack upon San Luis Potosi- now, the strong post of the Mexicans- at least a month earlier than he anticipated previous to that point being secured by our forces.

The movements here have been attended with a great deal of expedition. This morning at 9 o’clock, the steamship Neptune was dispatched to Tampico with several companies regulars under the command of Col Gates, 2d artillery; and others will be sent forward in a day or two. The whole number of regulars shipped from here to day on the steamers Sea and Neptune is seven hundred and fifty.

The steamer Brownsville arrived at the mouth this morning, four days from Camargo, having left there on the 17th instant. By her I learn that Capt. McLean, the bearer of dispatches from Washington, reached Gen. Taylor in the night of the 11th inst. They were of such a nature as to change his previous plan of operations. The idea of making Saltillo his instant. By her I learn that Capt. McLean, the bearer of dispatches from Washington, reached Gen. Taylor in the night of the 11th inst. They were of such a nature as to change his previous plan of operations. The idea of making Saltillo his starting point has been abandoned, and the order directing gen. Worth to move on the 12th instant for Saltillo, countermanded. At present, everything will remain in statu quo at Monterey, until it has been positively ascertained how far up the river from Tampico a subsistence depot can be established. That determined upon, Gen. Taylor will march the main body of his forces directly to that point, and remain there until he takes up his march to move directly upon San Luis Potosi, and from thence he will have but one hundred and fifty miles to march his army, previous to paying his respects to Santa Anna. The Mexican force which he will have to meet and conquer, will not be less than thirty thousand. This assertion is based upon information, upon which you can place the most implicit reliance.

The movements here have been attended with a great deal of expedition. This morning at 9 o’clock, the steamship Neptune was dispatched to Tampico with several companies regulars under the command of Col Gates, 2d artillery; and others will be sent forward in a day or two. The whole number of regulars shipped from here to day on the steamers Sea and Neptune is seven hundred and fifty.

The health of the volunteers from the mouth to Camargo, continues to be bad. From a careful estimate, made by several officers in command of different regiments, it has been satisfactorily ascertained that not less than fifteen hundred volunteers have made their graves upon the banks of the Rio Grande. Many place the number still greater than this, but Heaven knows the estimate of the officers is sufficiently appalling without increasing it. The dissatisfaction among them is very great at their being left in a wholly inactive condition; and this excitement is by no means diminished at their seeing company after company of regulars, and new recruits at that, sent forward to Monterey and Tampico, who have just landed from the United States, while they who have been buffeting the diseases of this climate for nearly four months, are left behind, to be victims of disease and death. If the United States call for more volunteers, those who respond to the call are fools, unless they stipulate, before leaving home, and bring orders to that effect from those who respond to the call for nearly four months, are left behind, to be victims of disease and death. If the United States call for more volunteers, those who respond to the call are fools, unless they stipulate, before leaving home, and bring orders to that effect from Washington, that they shall at once be put into active service.

The steamer McKim, which came in on the 19th from New Orleans, brought the glorious and gratifying news of the great whig victory achieved in the Empire State. It has thrown the locos in this region into a perpetual shake of fear and ague, and they are astonished that the war is not more popular with the people of N. York. Some of them think it looks mighty like making old “Rough and Ready,” president, and they swear that it is too bad that the administration should get up this war with Mexico, expressly for the purpose of making capital for themselves and the whigs are about depriving them all the thunder of it. But enough of politics. The grimaces of my Polk friends have been so terrible since the arrival of the news, that their curses against the whigs are so ferocious, that I could not avoid indulging in a few reflections touching their wailings.

There is now lying off here about: fifty sail of vessels, most of which are in the employ of the government, transporting subsistence and forage from New Orleans. Several vessels, loaded with government stores, have lately been wrecked, or come here with their cargoes in a damaged state. On Monday, the 23rd instant, lieut. French, the acting commissary at this post, has a large sale of damaged stores. Among the items enumerated in his advertisement I notice two thousand three hundred barrels of flour, and eight hundred barrels of bread. There are a number of speculators here with a view of attending the sale, and from present appearances there will be little or no loss.

The edict has already been issued against the admission of all liquors, or goods of any kind, into Tampico. Even settlers are prohibited from landing goods there, unless called for by the military commander of the post. In time, the notice of major Gardner is, that Tampico is under the most rigid system of martial law. These troops have been sent here without any orders whatever from Washington, or any of the commanding generals in Mexico. It is, as I understand it, the voluntary act of the officer in command at Point Isabel. This regiment was destined for gen. Taylor at Monterey, and their transportation to Tampico may meet with his approbation.

correspondence of Gen. Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna

MEXICAN CORRESPONDENCE.

Consulate of the United States of America.
Mexico, April 26, 1846

Sir: I have the honor to enclose herewith, a printed plan, and copy of the communication of General Santa Anna, addressed to a friend in Mexico, dated 8th of March, to which is added a note under date of the 8th of April last, relating to the political regeneration of Mexico. This plan has been secretly circulated amongst the leaders of the federal party, and adopted by them; a revolution to put this plan into operation was to have commenced in Vera Cruz on the first of this month; but owing to some differences of opinion, which took place among the chiefs at the time, the thing failed to be carried into effect. Not withstanding, General Alvarez, who was in the plan, and who was to have acted simultaneously, in concert with the movement intended to have commenced at Vera Cruz, afterwards made a pronunciamento in the south of this department, for the deposition of the present government, and to place in its stead for the present, a triumvirate composed of Generals Santa Anna, Herrera, and Rincon, to occupy the seat of government until a free election could be made of a president by the people. If this pronunciamento, intended to have been commenced at Vera Cruz, has gone into effect, it would have been followed by nearly all the departments; but this failing to take place, the departments have not involved in this affair; although a very great majority of the people are strongly opposed to the present order of things, and would be willing by any means in their power to lend their aid to destroy the present government, which they are satisfied are working for the establishment of a monarchy, and intend to call in foreign intervention to secure and maintain the same.

It is the opinion of many of the liberals, that if the congress meet (which is to be the 1st of June) they will establish a monarchical form of government, and will call in foreign aid. This act, they then think will have the semblance of legality; it is, therefore, their desire that this government, may be put down before the meeting of said congress, that no foreign power may have such pretext to intermeddle in their affairs.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

JOHN BLACK

To the Hon. James Buchanan, Secretary of State, at Washington.

NRR 71.270-271 December 26, 1846, plans of Gen. Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna Translation of General Santa Anna’s plan.

The inhabitants and the garrison of the town of, being impressed with the urgent necessity of sustaining the republic, in the serious peril to which it is now exposed, and considering –

I. That from the period when the constitution freely and spontaneously provided for the republic by itself, ceased to exist, those since formed have not been compatible with the wants and wishes of the majority of the nation.

II. That from this have arisen the continual agitations which have afflicted the country, until it has at length been torn in piece; and after its evils from without have been studiously aggravated, some spurious Mexicans have considered themselves authorized to endeavor to subject it to the most shameful vassalage, attempting to invite a foreign prince to govern it, with the title of monarch.

III. That in order to prepare the way for this, they have dared to deny the sovereignty of the people, by summoning a congress in which special care has been taken to bring together elements the most strange, but the best adapted for consummating the disgrace of the nation.

IV. That we cannot assent to the meeting of the said congress, without thereby giving a pretext for assuming the will of the nation, which is pretended to be represented, in favor of calling in European intervention, and thus supporting the parricide project of the administration now established in the capital of the republic.

V. That the establishment of a monarchy in the nation would involve not only the dissolution of our army, which the new monarch would not suffer to subsist, as he could confide in no other troops than those whom he should bring with him, but also the absolute subjection of the Mexicans, who would be excluded from all public employments, in order to give place to the courtiers or countrymen of the sovereign charged with governing us.

VI. That this would render illusory the benefits of the independence for which we sacrificed our blood and fortunes, in order to obtain the right to govern ourselves, with reference to our respective interests.
VII. That as these overwhelming evils cannot be averted unless we immediately establish our government in a manner more comfortable with the will of the majority of the nation, in order to give stability to the fundamental code, and, under its benign influence, to develop our great elements of power and wealth.

We have resolved to proclaim, and do hereby proclaim, the following plan for the real regeneration of the republic.

Article 1. The people and garrison of the town of disavow the summons [to a congress] issued on the 27th of March last, by the so called president ad interim and his ministers, as being a direct attack upon the sovereignty of the nation, and issued with the evident object of making the nation appear to call for a monarchy, with a foreign prince to govern it.

Art. 2. Instead of the congress summoned by the said decree, another shall be assembled, composed of representatives chosen by the people, according to the electoral laws under which the congress of 1824 was chosen, which body shall be charged to provide a constitution for the republic, and to adopt for it a form of government, such as it may consider best, with the exclusion only of the monarchial form, which the nation detests, and to settle everything connected with the question of Texas, and the other frontier departments.

Art. 3. Within four months after the occupation of the capital of the republic by the liberating forces the congress mentioned in the preceding articles shall be assembled; to which end it shall be the duty of the general in chief to issue a decree of summons in the terms herein indicated and to take other measures for the conduct of the elections, with the utmost freedom possible.

Art. 4. The existence of the army is guarantied, giving to it all the attention which is due to the meritorious military class of a free people.

Art. 5. All persons shall be declared traitors to the nation who shall attempt to impede the assembling of the said congress, or to attack it by placing obstacles to the liberty of its members, by dissolving or suspending its sessions, or who shall endeavor to oppose the constitution which it may establish. NNR 71.272 December 26, 1846, Mexicans determined to defend their country

MEXICAN WAR – Latest.

The French journal published at New York, professes to have information of the election tot he Mexican Congress, of a large portion if not of a majority of member who are in favor of concluding peace with the U.S. How they have obtained such information, even if true is a mystery. Certain it is, nothing that we have from Mexico looks of that case. On the contrary, everything indicates a determined spirit to defend their country. Even Yucatan, the last to join in the fray, on their legislature recently assembling, promptly ratified their re-annexation to Mexico. [RLK]

NNR 71.272 12/26/1846 formidable Mexican force assembled at San Luis

The Mexican represent the army at San Luis at 25,000 strong, with 52 pieces of Artillery-24 pounders; 5000 additional troops expected daily. "The powder of powder and the stores of balls and other missiles are said to exceed belief. Every piece of iron that can be found is converted into pikes or other deadly weapons. In one storehouse alone there are two hundred mechanics working day and night, mounting guns and manufacturing munitions of war. There are five hundred more at work on their fortifications, which are being strengthened in every possible manner. One thousand women, filled with enthusiasm in the national cause, had come down to the camp from San Diego and Tlascala, to aid in making articles for the soldiers, and working on the fortifications. In one store there has been sold 16,000 daggers, bought by the country people, both men and women — in every direction we see them making lances, sharpening swords, and fixing firearms, and other warlike arrangements." [AKS]

NNR 71.272 12/26/1846 Gen. Antonia Lopez de Santa Anna at a grand review of the troops

Santa Anna had a grand review of the whole army on the 13th November. It is described as a magnificent pageant. So overpowered was he by the boundless enthusiasm which greeted him as he passed along the lines that his feelings overcame him, and tears rolled down his swarthy cheeks, amid the prolonged hussas of the various regiments, and cries of "Victory or Death!" "God and Liberty!" "Long live Santa Anna!" "We will beat the Yankees this time!" &c. &c. Provisions were pouring into the camp in immense quantities. Language is said to fail in attempting a description of the formidable preparations making at San Luis. There was to be the last great struggle. There, say the newspapers, will the fate of Mexico be decided. Fears were entertained, however, that even then the fortunes of war would be against them, and accordingly, preparations are going on to defend the road to the capital. Forts were being erected at various points, and passes were being strengthened very rapidly. One large fort is building at Tlascala, another at Santiago. [AKS]
Santa Anna's evacuation of Tampico is defended on the ground of his inability to resist the vessels of war; and that port being one in which the yellow fever rages fiercely eight months in the year, the editors predict that it will become a grave for thousands of Americans, as it was for the invading Spaniards. [AKS]

The burning of the American steamer at Tampico, the wreck of so many United States vessels on the coast, and the loss of prizes taken at Tabasco, are matters which the Mexican editors record with joyous exclamations. Various accounts are given of the Mexican vessel of war Creole, under the walls of San Juan d'Ulloa. The battlement of San Miguel saw the United States boat approach the fort, but mistook it for a boat from the British steamer, and made no alarm. Others allege that an alarm was given, but the officers of the fort would not fire for fear of killing their own people. Other versions are given of the affair. The fort begins to be an object of suspicion among the Vera Cruzanos, who seems to think it less formidable to the Americans than they did formerly.

On the 21st November, a brig and merchant packet, part of the prizes captured at Tabasco, were wrecked near Alvarado, and of nine Americans on board five were drowned and four were saved.

But no further accounts of the capture and massacre of the 150 Americans at the City of Angels; dates from the Pacific are to the 11th. [AKS]
